It only remains to consider the question whether petitioner's right to the writ was adjudicated in his favor by the decree of Judge Dantzler, from which there was no appeal. Judge Dantzler held that the claim should be paid, and that the writ should be issued whenever there should be funds in the treasury; but he refused to order it issued at that time, holding as a fact that the actual appropriation had been exhausted. No relief was given, and hence there was no judgment in favor of the petitioner. Manifestly the Treasurer and Comptroller General could not appeal, because no order or judgment had been made against them. No appeal would lie from Judge Dantzler's expression of opinion that the claim was just, and that the writ of mandamus should issue if there were any funds in the treasury. An indication of opinion as to what judgment would be rendered under a different state of facts, or should be rendered in the future, is not a judgment, and is not binding on the parties. Van Fleet's Former Adjudication, § 27; 24 A. & E. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 792; Child v. Morgan, 51 Minn. 116, 52 N. W. 1127.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the petition dismissed. Rehearing refused.

HUGUENOT MILLS v. GEORGE F. JEMPSON & CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 29, 1904.)

CORPORATIONS—ULTRA VIRES CONTRACT—PARTNERSHIP CONTRACT—SALES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—REPRESENTATION OF FIRM BY PARTNER—EVIDENCE.

1. A corporation which had formed a partnership with an individual contracted to sell to defendant goods purchased in part with corporate funds, and on defendant's refusal to receive the goods the corporation, in its own right, and as assignee of its partner, sued for breach of contract. Held that, though the corporation's contract of partnership was ultra vires, this defense could not be raised by defendant, who was charged with knowledge that plaintiff could not enter into a legal partnership, and will be held to have dealt with plaintiff and its partner as joint owners of the property.

2. Where the particular goods were not fixed by a contract of sale, but were to be selected from samples by the customer of the purchaser, and after such selection were to be taken from the warehouse stock and shipped to the customer, the contract of sale was executory, and hence the seller of the goods could maintain an action for damages for refusal of the buyer to accept the goods.

3. In an action by the seller of goods under an executory contract to recover for the buyer's breach, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time the buyer refuses to accept the goods.

4. Where an executory contract for the sale of goods was evidenced by a letter from the buyer, written in response to the bill sent to him by the seller, it is not obnoxious to the statute of frauds.

5. The fact that a partner was acting for his firm in signing certain letters may be shown by parol.

6. Evidence that a partner, as an individual, separate from his partnership relation, acted as purchasing agent for third persons, is not competent on the question whether, in a particular instance, he acted for the firm, there being no evidence that the person with whom he dealt knew that he was also purchasing agent for persons other than the firm.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; Purdy, Judge.

Action by the Huguenot Mills against George F. Jempson & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

McCullough & McSwain, for appellants. Haynsworth, Parker & Patterson, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The supplemental and amended complaint alleges that at the times therein mentioned, the plaintiff, a corporation, and Herbert Rountree were "partners (or associates in business) under the name of the Greenville Commission Company"; that in November, 1900, the defendants agreed to buy from the plaintiff and Rountree, as such company, 80 bales of goods known as "Granger Plaids," at 8½ cents per yard, payable within 10 days, the goods to be billed up and sold for shipping instructions to be given by the defendants; that 30 bales were ordered out and paid for, and the defendants directed the remaining 50 bales to be billed to Gus Blas Dry Goods Company, of Little Rock, Ark., but both that company and the defendants have declined to receive the goods or pay for them; that after the contract was made the market price of the goods declined greatly in value, and the sellers, as the Greenville Commission Company, were damaged by the defendants' breach of contract to the amount of $500; that since the commencement of the action, Rountree has assigned all his interest in the claim for damages to the plaintiff. The defendants, in their answer, deny all the allegations of the complaint; allege that the plaintiff, being a corporation, could not enter into a copartnership, and had no power to contract or be contracted with in that capacity; and allege further that the contract falls within the statute of frauds, being for the sale of merchandise at a greater price than $50, and not evidenced by any note or memorandum in writing, signed by the parties to be charged or their agents. At the trial the defendants demurred orally on "the ground that it [the complaint] does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the plaintiff sues as assignee of the Greenville Commission Company, an alleged partnership existing between the Huguenot Mills, a corporation chartered under the laws of the state of South Carolina, and one Herbert Rountree, and under the charter of the Huguenot Mills and the law a partnership cannot exist between the said Huguenot Mills and the said Herbert Rountree, and the alleged contract was therefore ultra vires."

In the first exception, the defendants allege that the circuit judge erred in overruling the demurrer. The general proposition is well established that a corporation cannot enter into a valid partnership agreement. This implies that such an agreement, made by the corporation, even with the assent of all the stockholders, may be annulled at the instance of the state. It implies that an agreement made by the officers may be annulled or disregarded by the stockholders, and that the officers who embark the corporate funds in such an enterprise would be liable for losses resulting to the corporation as for a breach of trust. It implies that the stockholders could require the officers to take a conveyance from the corporation of its interest in property acquired by an attempted partnership of this kind, and restore the funds used in its purchase. But it does not imply that the corporation does not acquire, as against the outside world, part ownership of property bought in part with corporate funds in the progress of an attempted partnership business. An incident of ownership is the power of sale, and the power to sell implies the power to hold those who agree to buy to perform their agreement or pay damages for its breach. To illustrate, it cannot be doubted, if in this instance the stockholders had brought an action to have the business closed up as ultra vires, the court would have ordered the assets sold, and the contracts for purchases from the concern enforced by suit for the benefit of the corporation. To such suits it would have been idle for those who had purchased or contracted to purchase to deny the corporate right to own and sell the goods. If this were a suit in a partnership name, the defendants' demurrer would stand on a very different foundation, for the question would then be whether the joint owners could recover when they had sold as an alleged partnership. Even then we think the defendants could not deny the validity of their obligation on that ground. 5 Thompson on Corporations, § 5838; Connolly v. Union Pipe Co., 184 U. S. 544, 22 Sup. Ct. 431, 48 L. Ed. 679; Bank v. Hammond, 1 Rich. Law, 288; Harvester Co. v. Donahue (Minn.) 12 N. W. 854. In the case really presented the corporation sues alone in its own right and as assignee of Rountree. The defendants are charged with knowledge that the plaintiff could not enter into a legal partnership (Pearce v. R. R. Co., 21 How. 441, 16 L. Ed. 184), and that in the contract to purchase they were dealing with the plaintiff and Rountree as joint owners of the property, who as such had a right to sell it. For this reason they cannot now dispute the validity of the contract of purchase, or the liabilities which fell upon them when they repudiated it. The demurrer was therefore properly overruled.

Substantially the same question was made by a motion for nonsuit and in requests to charge. It follows that the first exception as to the demurrer, the first exception as to the refusal to grant a nonsuit, and the first, second, fourth, and fifth exceptions to the charge cannot be sustained.

The defendants' next position is that the motion for nonsuit should have been granted, because the testimony showed that there had been an actual sale and symbolical delivery, and therefore the plaintiff, holding the goods only as bailee for the defendants, could not sue for damages for breach of the contract, but only for the price the purchasers agreed to pay. The complaint is for breach of an executory agreement to purchase. It is true that Rountree testifies he regarded the goods belonging to the defendants as soon as he made the contract of sale, but his mere opinion can have no weight in fixing the nature of the contract. It is perfectly clear from the letters of buyer and seller that the specific patterns and the particular pieces were not fixed by the contract of sale, but were to be selected from the samples by the customer of the purchaser, and after such selection were to be taken from the warehouse stock and shipped to such customer. The contract, if any, was therefore executory. 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. 1054. Hence, when the purchaser refused to receive, the seller could retain the goods and sue for damages. 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. 1113; Millar v. Hilliard, Cheves, 153.

This being an executory contract, and the seller having a right to retain the goods and account for the market price at the time of the breach by the purchaser, the seller was under no obligation to actually resell. He did not resell at the time of the breach, and is not claiming damages for the difference between the price obtained at a resale and the contract price, but for the difference between the contract price and the market price at the date of refusal. The law as to resale therefore has no application. The measure of the seller's damages for breach of an executory contract for the sale of goods is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time the goods ought to have been accepted by the purchaser. Stack v. R. R., 10 S. C. 97; Millar v. Hilliard, supra. The reason for applying this measure of damage is that the seller has the right to put the goods on the market after the contract is broken, and obtain the market price. 2 Benjamin on Sales, § 1117. But he cannot sell until the date for acceptance has passed, because until that time the purchaser has the right to take the goods. By the same reasoning, where the exact time for delivery is to be afterward fixed by the purchasers, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market value at the date of refusal to receive; for such refusal necessarily implies a refusal to fix a time, and there is then a complete breach of the contract. In refusing the nonsuit and in charging as to the measure of damages the circuit judge took the correct view of the law on the subject.

The evidence as to the difference between the contract price and the market value at the date of purchaser's refusal to accept might well have been more definite, but it was sufficient to sustain a verdict. Rountree testified: "The market weakened immediately after I made the sale, and continued to decline. It went down from four cents to three and three-eighths; went down as low as three cents. The day I made the trade with George F. Jempson & Co., it was four cents." The defendants offered no testimony to rebut this statement, and we think the jury could well infer that the witness meant the decline to three cents took place immediately after the contract of sale. There was therefore no error of law in refusing the motion for a new trial.

The executory contract was evidenced not only by the conversation between Jempson and Rountree, but by the letter of Jempson written in response to the bill sent to Jempson & Co. by the Greenville Commission Company. The contract is therefore not obnoxious to the statute of frauds. It is true the letters were signed "G. F. Jempson" and not "George F. Jempson & Co.," but it was competent to show by parol that Jempson was acting for the firm in signing the letters. Bulwinkle v. Cramer & Blohme, 27 S. C. 876, 3 S. E. 776, 18 Am. St. Rep. 645; Benjamin on Sales, p. 252. The issue as to whether he was acting for himself or the firm of Jempson & Co. in making the contract was fairly submitted to the jury.

There was no error in excluding the testimony of George F. Jempson as to his private arrangements with the Gus Bias Dry Goods Company and other customers, of which the plaintiff had no notice. George F. Jempson, as one of the partners of Jempson & Co., was empowered to contract for the firm. The question was whether he so acted in this matter as to justify the sellers in believing they were contracting with the firm. If he did, the partnership would be bound. The controlling inquiry is, what intention did Jempson express to the sellers by words and acts, not what his unexpressed will was. The fact that as an individual, separate from his partnership relation, Jempson was a purchasing agent for others, might have some bearing in ascertaining whether he, in his inner consciousness, had an intention to contract for the firm or as an individual purchasing agent; but, there being no evidence that the sellers knew he ever acted in the latter capacity, proof that he did so act could have no effect in ascertaining whether the sellers had a right to infer from his words and acts that he intended to contract for the firm of which he was a member.

All the exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court affirmed.

RHODES v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 20, 1904.)

CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF COUNSEL—JURY—QUASHING ARRAY—APPEAL—WITNESSES—COMPETENCY—FELLOW SERVANTS.

1. A continuance will not be granted because one of the counsel for the applicant is confined in the hospital, the result of an operation, where the illness of the counsel was in contemplation for some time previous to his going to the hospital, and there were other counsel on the record, one of whom had taken part in a trial of the case at a preceding term.

2. The fact that the clerk of the board of county commissioners, instead of the county auditor, the county treasurer, and the clerk of the court, prepared a list of electors from the taxbooks, which was canvassed and revised by the proper officers, was a mere irregularity, and an insufficient ground for quashing the array.

3. An order refusing to quash the array of jurors on grounds held to be mere irregularities is not appealable under Code Civ. Proc. § 344.

4. In an action by an administrator, evidence by defendant as to a conversation between him and deceased in relation to deceased being informed as to contents of certain bulletins is inadmissible under Code Civ. Proc. § 400.

5. A conductor of a train and the employees under his direction are not fellow servants.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; J. A. McDonald, Special Judge.

Action by Lizzie D. Rhodes, administratrix of George T. Rhodes, against the Southern Railway Company and P. I. Welles. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

B. L. Abney, Jos. W. Barnwell, and Robt. Aldrich, for appellants. Bates & Simms, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages based upon the alleged negligence of the defendants. In the first paragraph of the complaint it is alleged that the Southern Railway Company is a corporation operating a railroad from Batesburg, S. C., to Hardeeville, S. C., and that the defendant P. I. Welles is the superintendent of his co-defendant, and as such was in charge of said railroad in behalf of the Southern Railway Company.

The second and third paragraphs of the complaint are as follows:

"(2) That upon the 26th day of August, A. D. 1901, one George T. Rhodes was and had been engaged and employed by said defendant as a conductor of the said defendant, and in charge of one of the freight trains operating between said points as aforesaid; and, being so engaged and employed, upon said day, and in discharge of his duties as such conductor on said train, and whilst at the station of Salley's, undertook, in pursuance of his said duties, to have the freight destined for said place unloaded thereat, among which freight was a cotton gin of considerable size and weight. And the said defendants had only provided, for the purpose of unloading said freight, certain skids, consisting of two in number, which were extended from the freight car as aforesaid to the platform at said station of Salley's, and which said skids were under the charge of the defendants' depot agent at said place, and upon these skids the train hands on said train were compelled to attempt to unload said gin in said way.

"(3) That whilst in the midst of unloading said cotton gin the same careened and toppled over to the ground, and while so doing struck the said George T. Rhodes, who, in discharge of his duty, was standing by, and fatally wounded him; and the plaintiff avers that the cause of said careening and falling of said gin was that the defendants had not furnished proper appliances for the unloading and loading of the freight of said character, and that the skids were not of the same size and thickness, but, on the contrary, one was thinner than the other; and when the heavy gin above described was attempted to be unloaded upon said skids of uneven thickness, the weight of the said gin on the side of the thinnest skid made said skid give more than its companion, which said giving, and the gin not, therefore, upon the same level, caused the said gin to careen and topple over; and the said defendants, not having also provided sufficient help by way of hands and laborers to unload said gin, were unable thereby to prevent the result stated, or to obviate the same by making up in physical help what was lacking in such defective appliances aforesaid."

The other allegations are formal.

The answer of the defendants denied the material averments of the complaint, and set up the defense of contributory negligence. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $10,000.

The defendants appealed, and their first exception is as follows: "Because it is respectfully submitted that his honor, the special judge erred in forcing, and that it was an abuse of his discretion to force, the case to trial, in spite of the illness of the defendants' counsel in charge of the case, and in spite of the declaration of the counsel who was forced to try the case that he had no opportunity to prepare for the trial of the same." The action was commenced in September, 1902, but was not reached on the docket at the fall term of that year. At a special term held in December of the same year the case was heard, but the result was a mistrial. No civil cases were tried at the following March term, and a special term was requested by the Barnwell bar in April, 1903. A roster was arranged by the bar for this special term, and this case, amongst others, was set for trial at that term. On the 22d day of April, 1903, Mr. Barnwell, the leading counsel for the defendants, wrote to the plaintiff's attorneys, requesting a continuance of the case on account of his inability to attend the court by reason of the necessity for a surgical operation on his leg, which confined him in the hospital for a number of weeks. The plaintiff's attorneys did not see their way clear to grant his request. His honor stated the following reasons for refusing the motion for a continuance of the case: "Well, gentlemen, the whole matter rests very strongly on my sympathy, and I regret very much that Col. Barnwell is ill, and has undergone an operation, and if I conceive it my duty, I would consider it a pleasant duty to grant his request. Two weeks ago the same motion was made. At that time I stated that ample time would be given to prepare for counsel if Col. Barnwell could not be present. I don't think the case of Varn v. Green applies, because both of the counsel were ill and incapacitated. Here the illness was in contemplation of counsel for some time previous to his going to the hospital, and there were other counsel upon the record in the cause, one of whom—Col. Aldrich—had already taken part in the trial of this case at a preceding term, and therefore familiar with the case. Two weeks had been given the counsel to procure the papers and to get ready for trial, and therefore, under all of the circumstances of this case, I do not think the case to be one where it would be a proper exercise of my discretion to grant the motion." The duty which was devolved upon his honor the presiding judge of deciding the motion for a continuance was of great delicacy. Ordinarily, an order refusing such motion is not appealable. An appeal lies only when there has been an abuse of discretion. The reasons assigned by the presiding judge in refusing the motion satisfy this court that there was no abuse of discretion.

The second exception is as follows: "Because, it is respectfully submitted, that his honor erred in refusing to quash the panel of jurors upon the following grounds: (a) That the jury list of 'qualified electors' was not prepared by the county auditor, the county treasurer, and the clerk of the court of common pleas in Barnwell county, where said case was tried, as is required by law, but by the board of county commissioners and the clerk of the board of county commissioners; and that subsequent adoption and ratification of the acts of the said board of county commissioners and clerk by the said county auditor, county treasurer, and clerk of the court of common pleas did not cure such illegal preparation of said list. (b) That the jury list required by law to be deposited with the ballots in the jury box was not so deposited, but was found outside of the said box, uninclosed, in the office of the clerk of said court. (c) That what purported to be said jury list, when found, did not consist of one list, but of two jury lists. (d) That the said jury lists were made out from the list of taxpayers, and not from the qualified electors, as required by law."

We will first consider subdivision "a." The plaintiff introduced in evidence the affidavit of the county auditor, county treasurer, and clerk of the court, in which they stated: "That each of said commissioners, being exceedingly busy with the manifold duties in their respective offices, at their own expense employed R. C. Roberts, Jr., the clerk of the county supervisor, to make a list of the qualified electors of said county, under the provisions of the Constitution, between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-five years, and of good moral character, and to furnish to the said commissioners for their action the said list, which was duly done by the said clerk. That upon the said names being furnished to the said commissioners by the said clerk the said commissioners inspected the same, and passed upon the qualifications of the persons whose names appear upon the said list; and the said board, upon the said investigation, judicially found that the said names included not less than one from every three of such qualified electors, under the provisions of said Constitution, and, as far as their judgment advised, such parties are of good moral character and between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-five years, and living within the said county of Barnwell; and that the same, in the judgment of the said defendants, are all otherwise well qualified to serve as jurors, being persons, in their opinion, of sound judgment, and free from all legal exceptions. That throughout the whole transaction the said R. C. Roberts, Jr., exercised none of the functions of this board, but only acted in pursuance of his employment as a clerk in the preparation of the lists of said qualified electors, and in no manner desired, nor did he usurp, any of the prerogatives of the said board, or relieve the said board of any of their liabilities or responsibilities to the public under the law with reference to the drawing of said jurors. That the said board itself judicially passed upon the qualifications, as aforesaid, of each of the said electors, and their names were only placed in the jury box after their said fitness had been so determined. That upon the list of jurors so selected being accepted by the said board, they caused the names of the electors so accepted to be written, each on a separate paper or ballot, so as to resemble each other as much as possible, and so folded that the names written thereon, in their judgment, were not visible on the outside, and placed them with the said list in the regular jury box. * * * And in all other particulars the said jury box has been kept securely locked with three separate and strong locks with keys, etc., as required by law; and that at the same time the said deponents placed in a special apartment in the said jury box, known as the 'tales box,' the names of not less than one hundred nor more than four hundred of such persons whose names appeared on the said lists as reside within five miles of the courthouse, and the names of such persons were likewise placed in the said jury box."

The fact that the clerk of the board of county commissioners prepared a list of the electors from the tax books, which was canvassed and revised by the proper officers, was a mere irregularity, and therefore an insufficient ground for quashing the array of jurors. In the case of State v. Massey, 2 Hill, 379, the defendant appealed upon the ground that the jury list had not been made from the tax returns according to the act of 1799. After citing the provisions of the act, the court used this language: "This is purely directory to public officers in the discharge of their duty. If they fail to discharge it, and the jury is drawn from the old list, it does not vitiate the array, nor is it any objection to the polls. The jurors are still boni et legales homines." 2 Hawk P. C., book 2, c. 48, § 14. The party is not prejudiced if the jury for his trial are from the vicinage, the district where the offense is committed, and have all the other legal qualifications. It will be observed that the act does not declare a venire issued for jurors drawn from the old list to be void; nor does it direct the array to be quashed. It was not intended to secure any right, benefit or privilege to the defendant. It was merely to regulate the drawing of the jury in such a way as to divide the duty of serving upon the jury among the inhabitants of a district." In Thompson & Merriam on Juries, sectional page 184, it is said: "Statutes which prescribe the time and manner of selecting the general list, as described, are generally treated as directory. The primary object which they have in view is the just apportionment of jury duty among the citizens of the county or other jurisdiction, rather than the preservation of the rights of litigants. If the names of persons not qualified for this duty get inadvertently into this list, and if such names are drawn as members of the panel for a particular term, persons having litigation at that term have a complete remedy by challenging for cause any member of the panel as being disqualified or partial. The general rule, therefore, is that irregularities in the general list constitute no ground for challenging the array. Thus, if the officers charged with such duty fail to make the list as required by law, and the jury, in default of such list, is drawn from the old lists, this does not vitiate the array, nor is it a cause of challenge to the polls. If the jurors are qualified individually, the parties to suit are not prejudiced."

Subdivision "b" will next be considered. In refusing the motion, the presiding judge said: "As to that list not being in the box, it appears from the facts of the case that it was left in the clerk's office. The clerk of the court, and perhaps the other member of the board, thought it was in the box. It was introduced in open court, and appears to be regular." This was only another irregularity, and is disposed of by what was said in considering subdivision "a."

The same may be said of subdivision "c."

Subdivision "d" is disposed of by the fact that the presiding judge found as a fact that the lists were made out from the qualified electors.

The third exception is as follows: "Because it is respectfully submitted that his honor erred in declaring that the requirements of the statutes that the jury list should be prepared by the county auditor, the county treasurer, and the clerk of the court, and that the list should be deposited in the jury box, and that there should be only one list, and that the jury list should be made out from the list of qualified electors, were mere irregularities, and that the requirements of the statute on the subject were purely directory." This exception is disposed of by what has already been said.

The fourth exception is as follows: "Because it is respectfully submitted that his honor erred in ordering the case to trial over the objection of the defendants' attorney, after service of written notice of appeal from the ruling of his honor, with regard to the challenges to the panel of jurors, such notice of appeal, it is submitted, operating as a supersedeas." The law is well settled in this state that an appeal from an appealable order acts as a supersedeas. Hammond v. R. R., 15 S. C. 10; Le Conte v. Irwin, 23 S. C. 106; Elliott v. Pollitzer, 24 S. C. 81; Simonds v. Haithcock, 26 S. C. 595, 2 S. E. 616; Bank v. Stelling, 32 S. C. 102, 10 S. E. 766; Capell v. Moses, 36 S. C. 559, 15 S. E. 711; State v. Ry. Co., 45 S. C. 470, 23 S. E. 385; Alston v. Limehouse, 61 S. C. 1, 39 S. E. 192. Was the order made by his honor the presiding judge, refusing to quash the array of jurors, appealable? In Wait's Ann. Code, 669, it is said: "It is not the policy of the Code with reference to appeals to allow a review of intermediate orders, unless they are such as in effect terminate the action and prevent a judgment, from which an appeal will lie, or unless upon appeal from final judgment." In Capell v. Moses, 36 S. C. 559, 15 S. E. 711, Mr. Chief Justice Pope uses this language: "As to the third exception, relating as it does to a right of appeal from an interlocutory order, this is not usual, and yet in some exceptional cases it is admitted. The distinction seems to arise in those matters where the circuit judge commits some error of law that will prejudice the appellant in his trial, and which error of law goes to the root of the matter. * * * It is in only exceptional cases that this court views with approval an appeal from an interlocutory order, for it is usually far better to await the coming here upon an appeal from a final decree or judgment, at which time it is competent for this court to review alleged defects or errors, not only in the final decree or judgment, but also at the same time to consider alleged errors in intermediate or interlocutory orders." It will be thus seen that it is not the policy of the law to regard with favor appeals from interlocutory orders. Section 344 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court in the cases mentioned in section 11. The second, third, and fourth subdivisions of that section are wholly inapplicable, and therefore need not be set out. The first subdivision is as follows: "The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction for correction of errors of law in law cases and shall review upon appeal: (1) Any intermediate judgment, order or decree in a law case involving the merits in actions commenced in the court of common pleas * * * and final judgments in such actions: provided, if no appeal be taken until final judgment is entered, the court may, upon appeal from such final judgment, review any intermediate order or decree, necessarily affecting the judgment not before appealed from." We have hereinbefore shown that the grounds of the motion to quash the panel of jurors were mere irregularities. They did not involve the merits of the action, and the order refusing the motion was not appealable. The court therefore had the right to proceed with the trial of the case.

The fifth exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in ruling out the evidence of Mr. P. I. Welles as to a conversation between himself and George T. Rhodes, plaintiff's intestate, showing why the said intestate should have had knowledge of the bulletins issued by said P. I. Welles giving demerits to one of the conductors of the Southern Railway Company for loading heavy goods over long skids from the main track, on the ground that conversations between the intestate and said superintendent and defendant P. I. Welles were not competent; whereas it is submitted that such conversations, being against the interest of said intestate, were competent and admissible as declarations against his interest." In the case of Norris v. Olinkscales, 47 S. C. 488, 25 S. E. 797, the court, having under consideration section 400 of the Code of Civil Procedure, uses this language: "It describes four classes of persons and three characteristics of testimony. The four classes of persons are these: (1) A party to the action or proceeding; (2) a person having an interest which may be affected by the event of the trial; (3) a person who has such an interest, but which has been in any manner transferred to, or has in any manner come to, a party to the action or proceeding; (4) an assignor of a thing in controversy in the action. The three characteristics of the testimony are these: (a) In regard to any transaction or communication between the witness and a person deceased, insane, or lunatic; (b) against a party prosecuting or defending the action as executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, or survivor of such deceased person, or as assignee or committee of such insane person or lunatic; (c) when the present or previous interest of the witness may in any manner be affected by the testimony or by the event of the trial. It will be thus seen that, to justify the exclusion of testimony under this proviso of section 400, it should be shown to the satisfaction of the trial judge, first, that the witness belongs to one or more or to all of the four classes of persons whose testimony may, under certain circumstances, be excluded; and, secondly, that his testimony partakes of not merely one or two of the disqualifying characteristics classified under 'a,' 'b,' and 'c,' but that it possesses all three of those characteristics." The witness was a party to the action. The testimony offered was in regard to a communication between the witness and a person deceased. The testimony was against a party prosecuting the action as administratrix of such deceased person, and the present interest of the witness might be affected by the testimony, or by the event of the trial. These conditions rendered the testimony inadmissible.

The sixth exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in not charging the following request of the defendants, to wit: 'That one of the risks which an employé takes in entering into the employment of another is the risk of the negligence of a co-employé or fellow servant employed in the same department with himself and on the same piece of work; and if the jury find from the evidence that the injury to plaintiff's intestate was caused through the negligence of such co-employé or fellow servant, who was not a superior agent or officer to the intestate, or a person having the right to control or direct the services of the intestate, and was not a servant upon a different train of cars, then the railroad company is not responsible for such negligence, and the jury must find for the defendants, on the ground that the question of assumption of risk had not been pleaded by the defendants; whereas it is submitted that the request was based upon the defense that the negligence, if any, was that of a co-employé, which could have been set up without being specially pleaded under the general denial of negligence on the part of the defendants in the answer." This exception cannot be sustained, for the reason that the conductor and the employés under his direction and control did not sustain to each other the relation of fellow servants. Boatwright v. R. R. Co., 25 S. C. 128; Coleman v. R. R. Co., 25 S. C. 446, 60 Am. Rep. 516; Hicks v. R. R., 63 S. C. 559, 41 S. E. 763.

ADAMS v. SOUTH CAROLINA & G. EXTENSION R. CO.

PLEADINGS — AMENDMENT TO CONFORM TO PROOF — NEGLIGENCE — SEPARATE ALLEGATIONS — FAILURE OF PROOF — NONSUIT.

1. A motion during trial to amend pleadings to conform to the proof should not be denied where the amendment does not work a surprise on the opposing counsel.

2. In an action for personal injuries, in which plaintiff charges several acts of negligence, nonsuit should not be granted for failure of the evidence to support one charge if there is evidence to support the others.

Woods, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Dantzler, Judge.

Action by Lillian S. Adams, as administratrix of estate of Ernest L. Adams, against the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company. From order of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. W. Lewis, for appellant. Geo. W. S. Hart and N. W. Hardin, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. Ernest L. Adams, while employed as and in service as a brakeman on a freight train owned and operated by the defendant railroad company, was killed at or near Catawba Junction, S. C., on the 24th day of November, 1900. The plaintiff was duly appointed the administratrix of his estate, and as such brought her action against the railroad company under what is known as "Lord Campbell's Act" to recover damages alleged to be $20,000 in favor of said Lillian S. Adams, as the widow of said intestate. In her complaint, omitting the caption and the formal parts relating to the corporate character and location of the defendant railroad company, and that part alleging the grant of administration to the plaintiff, also the date of the death of intestate, she alleges as follows:

"(5) That while in the employment of said defendant company on said date in said capacity, while at Catawba Junction, in York county, he was called upon by the officers and employés of said road in authority over him to assist in the handling, management, and shifting of the freight train on which he was employed as aforesaid, and which was being so handled, managed, and shifted under the direction and by the orders of the conductor of said train.

"(6) That while engaged as set forth in the preceding paragraph, and while engaged in making (under orders to him from the conductor) what is known as a 'flying switch,' the said Ernest L. Adams, without fault on his part, but through the negligence and carelessness of the said railroad company, its agents, employés, and officers, was projected and thrown upon the tracks of said railroad company in front of the engine operating and pulling said train, and then and there crushed to death by the wheels of said engine, the same being operated by the agents and employés of said defendant company.

"(7) That the work and labor of making said 'flying switch,' in which the said deceased was engaged under orders to him from the conductor of said train at the time of his negligent killing by said railroad company, was an extrahazardous, careless, and negligent handling of said train by the officers and employés in authority over said deceased, and was not necessary nor incident to the proper and reasonably safe management and operation of said train nor the switching of the cars thereof, and which, on account of its dangerous nature, risk, and exposure to which it subjects employés of railroads, is prohibited by a large majority of the railroads operating in this country. Plaintiff, in this connection, further shows and alleges that the said deceased was totally unfitted to perform the work required of him in assisting in making said 'flying switch,' and his unfitness for this work was well known to said railroad company, its officers and agents, before and at the time he was ordered to do said work.

"(8) That the work of assisting in making said 'flying switch' was not within the scope of the duties for which said Ernest L. Adams was employed as flagman, but, owing to the negligence of the said railroad company in failing to provide for said train the number of brakemen necessary to properly operate it, and the number required by the laws of this state to be supplied to a train of the size and having the number of cars that were in said train, whose duty it would have been to have made such 'flying switch,' instead of deceased, the said Ernest L. Adams was ordered by the conductor of said train to do said work; and while doing the same, without fault on his part, but through the negligence of the said railroad company, its agent and officers, in the particulars above set out, the defendant met his death as aforesaid.

"(9) That by the negligent killing of said Ernest L. Adams this plaintiff, she being the beneficiary for whose benefit and in whose behalf this action is brought, by the negligent killing as aforesaid, by the loss of companionship and support of said deceased, and the great mental anguish to which she has been subjected by reason of said killing, and the loss of said deceased, has been damaged in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, payment of which has been demanded of defendant and the same refused, and now remains unpaid."

The answer of defendant admits its corporate character and location; that Ernest L. Adams came to his death at the time and place set out in the complaint; that plaintiff is the administratrix of his estate. But it avers that Ernest L. Adams came to his death from his own gross carelessness and recklessness, or through misadventure, and then denies all other allegations in the complaint.

The action came on for trial before Judge Dantzler and a jury at a special term of the court of common pleas of York county held on the 3d day of February, 1903. At the close of plaintiff's testimony the defendant moved for a nonsuit. During the argument for that motion the plaintiff moved the court to be allowed to amend his complaint by striking out the word "flying" wherever it occurred in the expression "flying switch," so as to make the allegations of the complaint correspond with the proof. The motion to amend was refused, and an order for nonsuit was granted. The order for nonsuit was as follows: "The above-entitled action came on to be tried before me and a jury. At the close of plaintiff's testimony defendant moved for a nonsuit on two grounds: (1) That there was no testimony that the deceased, Ernest L. Adams, was engaged at the time that he met his death in making a 'flying switch,' as alleged in the complaint. (2) That, apart from the ground first stated, there was no evidence of any kind of negligence on the part of the defendant as a cause of the death of the plaintiff's intestate. The motion for nonsuit by Messrs. Geo. W. S. Hart and N. W. Hardin, attorneys for the defendant, is granted, with leave to the defendant to enter judgment for costs against the plaintiff."

From this order the plaintiff has appealed upon the following grounds:

"(1) In that his honor erred in refusing to allow the plaintiff to conform the pleadings to the proof by striking out the word 'flying' wherever it occurred in the amended complaint in the expression 'flying switch,' the error being that said motion should have been allowed because the variation between the pleadings and the proof was not material, and did not mislead the defendant; the proof being that the plaintiff's intestate came to his death while engaged in making a switch for the railroad company, although the same was not a 'flying switch.'

"(2) For error in holding that the plaintiff could not recover in the absence of evidence tending to show that the deceased came to his death while making a 'flying switch,' and that the plaintiff was limited strictly to the allegations of the amended complaint that the negligence of the railway company was in making a 'flying switch,' and holding by indirection, at least, that that was the only ground of negligence charged against the defendant in said amended complaint.

"(3) For error in failing to hold that the amended complaint set out negligence on the part of the defendant railway company in two particulars, namely, that the railway company was negligent in requiring the plaintiff to make a 'flying switch,' and, second, that the amended complaint charged also that the railway company was guilty of negligence in projecting and throwing forward the deceased upon the tracks of said railway company in front of the engine operating and pulling said train, and then and there crushing to death the deceased by means of the wheels of the said engine, as shown by the allegations of the sixth paragraph of the complaint.

"(4) In holding that there was no evidence of any kind of negligence on the part of defendant causing the death of plaintiff's intestate; whereas it is respectfully submitted that the testimony of W. A. Graham afforded some testimony sufficient to go to the jury to show that the plaintiff's intestate, while standing upon the pilot of the engine, was, through the negligence and carelessness of the engineer operating the engine, thrown forward upon the tracks of said company, and crushed to death by the engine operated by the engineer.

"(5) For error in granting nonsuit when there was some evidence, at least, of negligence on the part of the defendant company."

We will now pass upon these exceptions.

1. We think that there was error in refusing to allow the plaintiff to amend his complaint so as to have the allegations of the complaint conform to the proofs offered. As soon as the plaintiff's second witness (Mr. Graham) testified that they (the train hands under his direction) were endeavoring to put three freight cars upon the switch track so as to take one from the others, but that they were not attempting to make what is known as a "flying switch," Mr. Lewis, as plaintiff's attorney, at page 21 of the "case," said, "The term we have used in the complaint is a misnomer;" and when the circuit judge said, "I just wanted to know what a 'flying switch' was," Mr. Lewis again said, "That is simply a misnomer." It seems to us that the court and the opposing counsel then and there were apprised of the mistake made by plaintiff's counsel—that there was then developed a difference between the allegations of the complaint and the probata. Counsel for the respondent at no time announced that the amendment, if granted, would work any surprise to him. It seems to this court that this point is fully covered by the two cases, Booth v. Langley Co., 51 S. C. 412, 29 S. E. 204, and Mew v. R. R. Co., 55 S. C. 90, 32 S. E. 828. In the first case just cited a little nine year old girl was injured by defective machinery in a factory. In her complaint she described that the spinning frame assigned to her, the plaintiff, was defective; whereas it turned out in the testimony that it was not the spinning frame assigned to her that was defective, but that assigned to another. This court held that, when the plaintiff asked leave to amend, it was error in the circuit judge to refuse her motion. So, also, in the second action cited, where the question was, did the circuit judge have power to allow an amendment to the complaint during the trial so as to allow the allegations of the complaint to conform to the testimony during the trial? this court held that the circuit judge had the power, and cited sections 190, 191, 192, and 194 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and also Booth v. Langley Co., supra, as supporting this power of amendment. This exception is sustained.

2. We think there was error as pointed out in the second exception. The plaintiff was not limited by the allegations of the complaint to negligence in the "flying switch." There were other grounds of negligence in the complaint. This exception is sustained.

3. The third exception is sustained. A careful scrutiny of the complaint discloses that the plaintiff relied also upon the negligence of the railroad company in having its engineer to stop its train so suddenly as to throw plaintiff's intestate on the track, where its engine crushed the intestate to death.

4. We think the fourth exception is well taken. Certainly Mr. Graham's testimony was material when he described how the intestate was thrown, by the sudden reversing of the engine, upon the railroad track, and then crushed to death. The plaintiff was entitled to have this testimony go to the jury.

5. We have already virtually passed upon this exception. It is sustained. By what we have said we do not mean to say what weight, if any, the jury shall attach to this testimony, only that there was some testimony.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed and a new trial had.

WOODS, J. (dissenting). I concur in the view expressed by the Chief Justice that the plaintiff was entitled to amend, but I think the judgment of nonsuit should be sustained on the ground that there was no evidence that the death of plaintiff's intestate was caused by the negligence of the defendant. As appears from the evidence offered by plaintiff, Adams was run over and killed by the engine while engaged in shifting cars as brakeman. There were two different ways in which he could have performed this duty in comparative safety; but without orders from his superior, and contrary to the custom of the crew with which he was working, he, of his own volition, chose the most dangerous method, and undertook to couple cars with a lever while standing on a narrow platform or ledge attached to a moving locomotive. It is not clear whether he fell before the engine was reversed, or in consequence of the jar produced by reversing. But, assuming the fall was produced by the jar, as alleged by plaintiff, he was well aware that the engineer would necessarily reverse in order to carry the engine back from the switch to the main track. There is not the slightest evidence that the engineer reversed without warning, or before Adams had time to get down from the dangerous position he had assumed. As it seems to me, the only inference that can be drawn from the testimony is that the deceased lost his life by misadventure in a position of great danger, which he had taken voluntarily and negligently.

JOHNSON, LYTTLE & CO. v. SPARTAN MILLS.

MASTER AND SERVANT—PAYMENT OF WAGES—ORDER PAYABLE IN MERCHANDISE—RECOVERY OF MONEY JUDGMENT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS.

1. Code 1902, §§ 2719, 2720, declare it unlawful for any corporation, person, or firm to issue or circulate for payment of wages any order, check, memorandum, or evidence of indebtedness payable otherwise than in lawful money of the United States, unless the same is negotiable in cash or in goods, at the option of the holder, at the store or other place of business of such firm, etc., or at the store of any other person on whom such paper may be drawn. The act provides that it shall not apply to agricultural contracts or advances made for agricultural purposes, and provides a penalty against the officers or agents of any person, firm, or company engaged in manufacturing or mining. Held, that where a check redeemable in merchandise was issued by a manufacturing corporation to its employé as a credit, and not in payment of labor, the employé could not maintain an action to recover a money judgment on the check.

2. Such act does not violate the constitutional provision guarantying equal protection of the laws.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Purdy, Judge.

Action by Johnson, Lytle & Co. against the Spartan Mills. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The decision on circuit is as follows:

"The defendant is a corporation engaged in cotton manufacturing in Spartanburg county, in this state, and the plaintiffs are merchants in the same county. The plaintiffs commenced eight actions in the magistrate's court against the defendant, asking judgment for the sum stated in each complaint, and aggregating about $716. As the same principle is involved in all of the cases, and the same testimony will be applicable to all, it was agreed that the testimony taken in one case should answer for all the cases.

"The complaints in each case are similar, and each, in substance, is as follows: After setting out the copartnership of the plaintiffs, they allege that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum stated in each complaint, with interest from March 12, 1902, for certain redeemable brass or metal checks held by and belonging to them, and issued by the defendant, aggregating the amount stated in the complaint, and which were presented to the defendant for payment on March 12, 1902, a regular pay day, and payment refused, in violation of an act of the General Assembly of this state appearing at page 746 of the Acts of 1901. The defendant appeared and put in a general denial, and pleaded the unconstitutionality of the act referred to, alleging that it is in violation of both the state and federal Constitutions. The magistrate gave judgment in each case in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant excepted upon the various grounds set out in its notice, which it is unnecessary to repeat in full, as the notice is in the record; but it may be said that some of the exceptions impute error to the magistrate in assuming that the checks were issued in payment for labor, and in not holding that the act was unconstitutional, in that it does not give all persons the equal protection of the law, does not apply to all laborers, and it takes property from a citizen without due process of law, and limits and interferes with the liberty of the citizen, in that it prevents him from freely and in his own way entering into contracts with others, when this liberty is allowed to all persons engaged in agricultural pursuits; that the magistrate erred in deciding that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment in money equal to the amount of the checks, and erred in not holding that the plaintiffs, if entitled to judgment at all, could only recover the value of the checks, payable in merchandise and not in money, and erred in not holding that the plaintiffs could not sue the defendant at all, because the act fixes the penalty for its violation, and erred in holding that judgment could be obtained against the defendant for any sum other than for the penalty provided by the act. The act is entitled 'An act to protect laborers in their wages, and to repeal inconsistent acts,' and the body of the act is found in the first volume of the Code of 1902 (sections 2719 and 2720), as follows:

"Sec. 2719. It shall not be lawful for any corporation, person or firm in this state to issue, pay out or circulate for payment for the wages of labor, any order, check, memorandum, token or evidence of indebtedness, payable in whole or in part otherwise than in lawful money of the United States, unless the same is negotiable in cash or in goods, wares or merchandise or supplies, at the option of the holder, at the store or other place of business of such firm, person or corporation, or at the store of any other person on whom such paper may be drawn, where goods, wares or merchandise are kept for sale, sold or exchanged; and the person who, or corporation, firm or company which, may issue any such order, check, memorandum, token or other evidence of indebtedness, shall, upon presentation and demand, within thirty days from date of delivery thereof, redeem the same in goods, wares, merchandise or supplies, or in lawful money of the United States, as may be demanded by the holder of any such order, memorandum, token or other evidence of indebtedness: provided, that if said corporation, person or firm engaged as specified in this section have a regular pay day once in every thirty days, then said corporation, person or firm shall not be required to redeem such token or evidence of indebtedness in cash until the first pay day after the same becomes payable, as herein provided, and such token or evidence of indebtedness shall be presented for payment in cash only on such pay day: provided, that the provisions of this section shall not apply to agricultural contracts or advances made for agricultural purposes.

"Sec. 2720. Any officer or agent of any corporation, or any person, firm or company engaged in the business of manufacturing or mining in this state, who by themselves or agent shall issue or circulate in payment for wages of labor any order, check, memorandum, token or evidence of indebtedness, payable in whole or in part otherwise than in lawful money of the United States, without being negotiable and payable at the option of the holder in goods, wares, merchandise, supplies or lawful money of the United States, as required by section 2719, or who shall fail to redeem the same when presented for payment within thirty days from date or delivery thereof, by the said company or its agent at his or their office or place of business, in lawful money of the United States, or who shall compel or attempt to coerce any employee of any such corporation, shall forfeit to the employee $50, to be recovered in court of competent jurisdiction.'

"It should have been stated that the checks in question have on one side of them the statement that they are issued for the convenience of employes, and on the other side that they are payable in merchandise at the Spartan Mills.

"The first question that presents itself under the exceptions is whether any other person than the laborer or employe has a right to sue. The contention of the plaintiffs is that the word 'holder,' as used in the statute, refers to any person who may have the custody of the checks at the time they are presented for payment, while the defendant contends that the act, as shown by its terms and by its preamble, is intended solely for the protection of laborers. It is proper, and oftentimes necessary, to refer to the preamble of an act in order to assist in the construction of its terms, and, upon referring to the preamble in this case, it is designated 'An act for the protection of laborers,' and the only thing in the act that points to any other conclusion is the use of the word 'holder' in the body of the act, which, taken by itself, will indicate that it had reference to the person who had possession of the check. When we take into consideration the preamble of the act, from which we gather its purport and purpose, and consider that, with the main body of the act, and with the concluding clause of section 2720, we come to the conclusion that the terms 'holder,' 'laborer' and 'employee' are all used in the same sense—in fact, bear but a single meaning, and all point to the person who performs the labor. This is manifestly so, for the reason that the Legislature can have no intention to protect outsiders dealing with the laborer, but its manifest intention was to protect the laborer dealing with his employer. But suppose that this should not be so; what rights would the holder of the check have? He would have clearly such rights as the statute gave him, for, when a statute undertakes to make a declaration concerning any subject, that is the whole on that subject. Here it has undertaken to say that 'it shall not be lawful for any corporation, person or firm in this state to issue, pay out or circulate for payment for the wages of labor, any order, check, memorandum, token or evidence of indebtedness, payable in whole or in part otherwise than in lawful money of the United States, unless the same is negotiable and redeemable at its face value, without discount in cash or in goods, wares or merchandise or supplies at the option of the holder * * * While it makes the declaration that this shall not be done, yet at the same time it does not declare such contract to be void and not enforceable, nor does it provide that, in the case of the failure to carry out the requirements of the act, the holder of the check, memorandum, or token shall have the right to recover a judgment based upon such check, memorandum, or token. Then whence does this right arise? The plaintiff in this case alleges that the defendant became indebted to the plaintiffs for certain brass checks issued and redeemable under this act. Now, in order to become indebted to the plaintiffs, there must have been some contract, express or implied. There was no express contract on the part of the defendant to pay these checks in money, and there was no implied contract to pay them in money, because an implied contract of indebtedness could not be inferred from the nature of the check itself, which expressly says that the same shall be payable in merchandise, and there are none of the elements of an implied contract in the transaction, and, as stated, the statute does not give any right to the holder to bring an action against the defendant in case of his failure to pay in money. The act was designed to protect the laborer, by preventing the employer from issuing these tokens in payment for labor, and then coercing the laborer to take the same in merchandise instead of money, and it was not designed to enable such persons as might deal with the laborer to come in and take the place of the laborer, and insist on a right not created in his favor. It will be noted in these cases that the laborers themselves are not complaining, and there is no testimony whatever from any of them as to the manner of acquiring or parting with these checks. The magistrate, in his report, says that there was no question that these checks were issued in payment for labor, but that is not borne out from the testimony, for the statement of Mr. Montgomery, the treasurer of the mill, is as follows: 'Q. Mr. Montgomery, was any contract ever made between the mill and any of its employes for the payment by the mill to its operatives for their labor in checks? A. No, sir. Q. So, then, you never issued the checks to any of the operatives of the mill in payment for their labor? A. No, sir. Q. I want to ask this, Mr. Montgomery: Was it not true that these checks would frequently be issued before the labor was performed? A. Yes, sir; we issue checks to people before they ever go into the mill.' Mr. Montgomery then goes on to illustrate how the checks were issued and the books kept.

"If it should be conceded that the act in question is a valid exercise of the legislative power, and that its provisions will extend to the plaintiffs in this case, as to holders of the checks, then what rights would they have? The act itself says that it shall not be lawful to issue any check payable other than in the manner prescribed in the act, viz., other than in money or merchandise, but in this case the defendant has done what the act says it must not do—it has issued checks redeemable in merchandise—and the plaintiffs have purchased them and have paid for them in merchandise, and now they invoke the aid of the act to enable them to get payment in money. Since the defendant has violated the terms of the act, and made a contract other than as provided for under its terms, the remedy of the holder (conceding at this point that the holder has any remedy) would be to present the checks and demand merchandise, and then, if his demand for merchandise were refused, he might bring his action for damages, alleging his damages to be the value of the merchandise which was refused to be furnished. But in this case no such action can be brought, for the reason that the plaintiffs have prevented the defendant from carrying out the contract in this manner, by refusing to take the merchandise, and, as has been before stated herein, there is no penalty provided for this, other than that created in favor of the employé.

"But the greatest stress is laid upon the exception that the statute is unconstitutional, in that it violates the provisions both of the state and federal Constitutions. The provisions of these Constitutions are practically identical, and their terms are so well known that they need not be repeated. Our Supreme Court has recently passed upon this question in a full, clear, and elaborate manner, in the case of Porter v. Railroad Company, 63 S. C. 169, 41 S. E. 108, 90 Am. St. Rep. 670, and one of the latest, if not the latest, decisions on the subject by the United States Supreme Court is the case of Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 22 Sup. Ct. 431, 46 L. Ed. 679, and our own court is thoroughly in accord with the principles laid down in this case. In Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., decided March 10, 1908, the court says: 'What may be regarded as a denial of the equal protection of the laws is a question not always easily determined, as the decisions of this court and of the highest courts of the states will show. It is sometimes difficult to show that a state enactment, having its source in a power not controverted, infringes rights protected by the national Constitution. No rule can be formulated that will cover every case. But upon this general question we have said that the guaranty of the equal protection of the laws means that no person or class of persons shall be denied the same protection of the laws which is enjoyed by other persons or other classes in the same place and under like circumstances. * * * The fourteenth amendment, in declaring that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, undoubtedly intended not only that there should be no arbitrary deprivation of life or of liberty, or arbitrary spoliation of property, but that equal protection and security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights; that all persons should be equally entitled to pursue their happiness and acquire and enjoy property. * * * And it also states that 'The equal protection of the laws is a pledge of the protection of equal laws,' and further: 'The fourteenth amendment required that all persons subject to legislation limited as to the objects to which it is directed, or by the territory within which it is to operate, shall be treated alike, under like circumstances and conditions, both in the privileges conferred and in the liabilities imposed.' 'Due process of law and the equal protection of the laws are secured if the laws operate on all alike, and do not subject the individual to an arbitrary exercise of the powers of government.' And again: 'All such regulations, and those of like character, so long as they proceed within reasonable limits and general usage, are within the discretion of the state Legislature, or the people of the state in framing their Constitution.' And again, in reference to classification, the court says: 'The difficulty is not met by saying that, generally speaking, the state, when enacting laws, may, in its discretion, make a classification of persons, firms, corporations, and associations, in order to subserve public objects.' For this court has held that classification 'must always rest upon some difference which bears a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect to which the classification is proposed, and can never be made arbitrarily and without such basis. * * * But arbitrary selection can never be justified by calling it classification. The equal protection demanded by the fourteenth amendment forbids this. * * * No duty rests more imperatively upon the courts than the enforcement of those constitutional provisions intended to secure that equality of rights which is the foundation of free government. * * * It is apparent that the mere fact of classification is not sufficient to relieve a statute from the reach of the equality clause of the fourteenth amendment, and that, in all cases it must appear not only that a classification has been made, but also that it is one based upon some reasonable ground—some difference which bears a just and proper relation to the attempted classification, and is not a mere arbitrary selection.'

"If we add to the foregoing the well-known principle that everything must be taken in favor of the constitutionality of an act—that it will not be declared to be unconstitutional except it be shown to be clearly in violation of some constitutional provision, either state or federal—we have before us the principles upon which the validity of the act in question must be determined. In declaring that the provisions of this act shall not apply to agricultural contracts or advances made for agricultural purposes, and in providing a penalty against the officers or agents or any corporation, or any person, firm, or company, engaged in the business of manufacturing or mining in this state, is the act simply classifying in a proper manner those persons or subjects, and operating upon them properly as a class, or has it made an arbitrary selection in reference to them, and in excluding all others? There should be some reason for excluding agricultural contracts or advances made for agricultural purposes from the provisions of the act, and there should be some reason for subjecting officers, agents, persons, firms, companies, and corporations engaged in manufacturing and mining to the penalty prescribed by the act.

"What reason can be given for this? A man, with the members of his family, might go in the early part of the year to work on a farm as farm laborers, and the farmer would be permitted, if he thought proper to do so, to hand out to this man and his family checks or other tokens of indebtedness for labor, and, after they were received, the persons receiving them, or the persons who might trade for them, would be compelled to take them in merchandise; while, on the other hand, the same person, with the members of his family, after the crop is made and carried to the Spartan Mills, for instance—the defendant here—and sold to it, could enter into the employment of the defendant, undertaking to labor, and if they saw fit to take checks as a matter of accommodation, from which to obtain credit at the store of the defendant, or in payment for labor, they could on any pay day come and change their contract, and demand payment in money. The same avenue is open to the farmer who employed them in the summer time, to obtain the money through the great commercial arteries of the country, and settle with them at stated periods, as is open to the defendant. Then why protect one and deny the equal protection of the laws to the other? Where is the reason for it? Can it be said that the defendant has better facilities for obtaining money? Is it more wealthy than the farmer who employs labor? If this be so, it can be answered that one farmer may have two or three times as much as his next door neighbor, who is also a farmer, and that, as long as there is a difference in temperament and intellect, some men will be poor and others rich. And yet the law knows no difference. It operates on rich and poor alike.

"It is contended by the defendant that not only does the act in question operate unequally upon persons in the same class, similarly situated, but that it denies the same rights and privileges granted to others, in that it allows certain persons and classes of persons similarly situated to make any kind of contracts that they may think proper, and denies this right to others. As a general proposition, all persons who are capable of consent can enter into a contract, based upon a real consideration, touching a legal subject-matter, and the courts will enforce contracts which have these elements, and will not undertake to make contracts between the parties. The act in question prohibits issuing, paying, or circulating for payment for the wages of labor, any order, check, memorandum, or token, unless the same be redeemable in cash, goods, wares, or merchandise, but excludes from its operations the persons named, and imposes a penalty upon some of those who violate its terms, and does not subject others, although they may be similarly situated, to the same penalty. In reference to corporations generally, it would be perfectly competent for the Legislature to declare certain restrictions concerning the management and government of the corporation, because the corporation, being the creation of the Legislature, is subject to its control, but it would have to make an enactment that would operate upon all corporations of a similar class in like manner. Here manufacturing and mining corporations have been arbitrarily selected, and made the subject of a penalty for doing an act which other corporations similarly situated may do with impunity. The act prevents persons from selling any article or property and taking payment in labor, and prevents laborers from acquiring property by their labor, if one of them should see fit to contract to sell his property for labor, and the other to receive property in payment for labor.

"If the act in question be allowed to stand, then no person in this state could enforce any contract for the sale of any property or article with any laborer, other than an agricultural laborer or a laborer taking agricultural advances, for, no matter what may be the form of the evidence of indebtedness—no matter whether the laborer has agreed to take payment in land, houses, cattle, or merchandise—he can repudiate his contract at pleasure, and come up and say that he must be paid in money, which is a direct contravention of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no law shall be passed to impair the obligation of a contract, and directly interferes with the liberty of the citizen in acquiring and disposing of property. And in this view of the case the act would be unconstitutional even without the exemptions, but with the exemptions, and the imposition of the penalty on certain persons, firms, and corporations, it is clearly unconstitutional.

"Take, for instance, another result, if this act be allowed to stand. Under the act in relation to business corporations in this state, suppose that the defendant here should decide to issue an increase of its capital stock, and a large number of shares were thrown on the market, and having, as it has, a large number of employes, it desired to encourage these employes to take stock and become interested in the workings of the mill, and that those employes had no other means of paying for their stock than by their labor; the statutes provide that such subscriptions may be paid in money, property, or labor. And suppose that the employes enter their subscriptions payable in labor, and that at the end of each month, until the price of the subscription has been worked out in labor, the officers of the corporation should give to such laborer a memorandum stating, 'This certifies that A. B., the holder thereof, is entitled to $10 for labor performed, payable only in subscription to the capital stock of the Spartan Mills, in accordance with the terms of its subscription.' Here the laborer has performed labor for a corporation. Here is a memorandum or token issued in payment for labor, and, if the construction of the act contended for be given to it, the laborer could come, and on any pay day violate the terms of his subscription, and demand and compel the defendant to pay in money, instead of giving him stock for his subscription.

"According to the views that we entertain of the statute, and of the law applicable thereto, the plaintiffs herein could have no right, as a holder of the checks, to a 'money judgment.' The act was not intended for their protection, and their remedy, if they had any remedy at all, was simply to receive the goods; and, having been offered the goods, they have no right to sue in this case.

"And further, the act in question is unconstitutional, in that it violates both the terms of our own Constitution and of the Constitution of the United States, in abridging the liberty of the citizen to contract and be contracted with—to acquire and enjoy his property. It impairs the obligations of contracts, and denies the equal protection of the laws to the citizens of our state.

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the exceptions be sustained, and the complaints in each of the said cases be, and they are hereby, dismissed, with costs."

From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal on the following exceptions:

"(1) That his honor erred in holding that the terms 'holder,' 'laborer,' and 'employee,' in the act entitled 'An act to protect laborers in their wages, and to repeal inconsistent acts,' incorporated as sections 2719 and 2720 of the Code of 1902, are all used in the same case, with but a single meaning, to wit, the person who performs the labor. The error being that there is nothing in the act to point to such conclusions, or to indicate that any other meaning was intended to attach to 'holder' than its usual and ordinary one, to wit, the person holding the checks.

"(2) That his honor erred in holding that the act does not provide that, in case of failure by the employer to carry out the requirements thereof, the holder of the check shall have the right to recover a judgment based upon such check. The error being that the act specifically provides that the holder, whoever he may be, shall have the right to demand, and that it shall be the duty of the employer to pay, such check in money; thereby enacting a cause of action in favor of the holder against the employer upon such right of the holder and such violated duty of the employer.

"(3) That his honor erred in holding that the magistrate's finding that there was no question that the checks were issued in payment for labor is not borne out from the testimony. The error being that his honor only considered a part of Mr. Montgomery's testimony, and not the whole of it; and his testimony conclusively showing that the labor of the employe bought and paid for the checks, and that the checks bought and paid for the labor; it making no difference whether the checks were delivered in advance of the labor rendered or subsequent thereto; the agreement of the parties being that the checks were to be paid for by labor, or vice versa; there being an interchange of labor for checks, or checks for labor.

"(4) That his honor erred in holding that the plaintiffs cannot recover, for the reasons that the defendant violated the act in issuing checks redeemable in merchandise only; the remedy of the plaintiffs being, if they have a remedy, to present the checks and demand merchandise, and, upon demand being refused, to bring their action for damages in the amount of the value of the merchandise, but that in these cases no such action could be brought, because that plaintiffs prevented the defendant from carrying out the merchandise contract by refusing to accept the merchandise. The error being, it is respectfully submitted, that such holding is argument in circle, and bases the defendant's nonliability to plaintiffs solely upon the defendant's violation of the right of plaintiffs under the statute to require the labor to be paid for in money, and that his honor's conclusion is in direct conflict with the terms of the statute.

"(5) That his honor erred in holding that the said act is unconstitutional for the reasons stated by him, because in violation of the United States Constitution and the Constitution of South Carolina, in abridging the liberty of the citizen to contract and be contracted with, and to acquire and enjoy his property. The error being that the reasons stated by his honor for such position are not sustained by the act, and do not lead to the conclusion reached by him.

"(6) That his honor erred in holding that the act in question is unconstitutional, because impairing the obligation of contracts, and denying the equal protection of laws to citizens of the state. The error being that the reasons stated by his honor for such conclusions are not sustained by the act in question, and do not lead to the conclusions reached by him. The exception of agricultural contracts and advances made for agricultural purposes does not render the act unconstitutional, because such exception rests upon a difference bearing a reasonable and just relation to the act, and not made arbitrarily. The said act accords to every person or class of persons the same protection of law that is enjoyed by other persons or classes under like circumstances. Farm laborers occupy a peculiar relation to their employers, and, to a large extent, are dependent upon the output of a farm for their remuneration. In a majority of instances they receive their pay at the end of the year in part of the crops, and not in money. They have a lien upon the crops made by them for their wages by statute. Farm laborers' products are not sold as fast as made, as in cases of other laborers, and are not reduced to cash. To require payment of farm labor in cash, and not by credit, would necessitate a revolution in the methods of farming in the state; and at the time of the passage of said act there was already in force in this state an act prohibiting the issue of plantation checks, designed for the protection of this special class of labor, which act is incorporated in volume 2 of the Code of 1902, as section 358, and plantation laborers being further protected in their contracts by sections 2715 and 2716 of volume 1 of said Code."

Stanyarne Wilson, for appellants. O. P. Sanders, for respondent.

JONES, J. We affirm the judgment of the circuit court upon this ground: The circuit court has found, as matter of fact, that the testimony does not bear out the conclusion of the magistrate that the checks in question were issued in payment for labor. This being an appeal in a case at law, the finding of the circuit court on a question of fact is not reviewable. We do not think that it can be said that the only inference from the testimony is that the checks were issued in payment for wages of labor. One of the plaintiffs (Mr. Lytle) testified that, when he demanded payment of the checks in cash from the assistant treasurer of the mills, he said he would redeem them in goods, but not in cash; that he did not issue them for labor, but that they were issued for the convenience of the operatives and the store. The assistant treasurer, Mr. Montgomery, testified that the checks were sold to the operatives, and a charge made of them against the operatives on the storebooks of the company as merchandise checks; that on the regular pay days, which were the 12th and 27th of each month, the operatives would be paid for their labor the balance due after deducting the store account; that no contract was ever made between the mill and any of its employes for the payment of their labor in checks; that no checks were ever issued to any operative in payment for his labor; that checks were frequently issued before any labor was performed; that it was optional with the employes to buy checks or coupon books, or have merchandise charged. This was the substance of the testimony on this point, and it cannot be said that the circuit court committed error of law in holding, upon the testimony, that the checks were not issued in payment of labor. Since the undisputed testimony was that these metal checks were redeemable on their face only in merchandise at the store of the defendant, and that defendant offered and stood ready to redeem them in merchandise, and plaintiffs refused to accept same, plaintiffs cannot recover in this action. Plaintiffs claim the right to recover because of the statute cited, but have failed to bring themselves within the terms of the statute, as the holders of checks issued in payment for labor.

Under this view, it is immaterial to the disposition of this case whether the act in question is constitutional or not, and defendant is not in a position to assail the constitutionality of the act, since the record does not show a case arising under the act. Inasmuch, however, as the circuit court has declared sections 2719, 2720, Civ. Code, unconstitutional, and the matter has been strenuously argued before us, and an expression of our view is deemed important, we will not withhold consideration of the question. The view of the circuit court is presented in the circuit decree, which, with the exceptions thereto, is herewith reported.

In the first place, as this is not an action to recover any penalty imposed under section 2720, quoted in the decree of the circuit court, a consideration of such section is not involved. The plaintiffs' action is based solely upon section 2719, and our consideration should be confined to that. As to that section, it is contended that the proviso "that the provisions of this section does not apply to agricultural contracts or advances made for agricultural purposes" renders the act unconstitutional. The authority mainly relied on to sustain this view (Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 22 Sup. Ct. 431, 48 L. Ed. 679) does not appear to us to be at all conclusive. Under the Illinois trust act condemned in that case, all, except producers of agricultural commodities and raisers of live stock, who combine their capital, skill, or acts for any of the purposes named in the act, to destroy competition and control prices, may be punished as criminals, while agriculturalists and live stock raisers, in respect of their products or live stock in hand, are exempted from the operation of the statute, and may combine and do that which if done by others would be a crime against the state. As was stated by this court in Simmons v. Telegraph Company, 63 S. C. 430, 41 S. E. 521, 57 L. R. A. 607: "Legislation is not unequal or discriminatory, in the sense of the equality clause of the Constitution, merely because it is special or limited to a particular class. The decisions of the United States Supreme Court establish that the Legislature has power to make a classification of persons or property for public purposes, provided such classification is not arbitrary and bears reasonable relation to the purpose to be effectuated, and that the equality clause is not violated when all within the designated class are treated alike. In the case of Barbler v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923, the court said: 'Class legislation, discriminating against some and favoring others, is prohibited, but legislation which in carrying out a public purpose is limited in its operation, if within the sphere of its operation it affects alike all persons similarly situated, is not within the [fourteenth] amendment. * * * Neither the amendment, broad and comprehensive as it is, nor any other amendment, was designed to interfere with the power of the state—sometimes termed its police power—to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the state, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity.' In Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 5 Sup. Ct. 730 [28 L. Ed. 1145], the court said: 'The specific regulations for one kind of business which may be necessary for the protection of the public can never be a just ground of complaint because like restrictions are not imposed upon the business of a different kind. The discriminations which are open to objection are those where persons engaged in the same business are subjected to different restrictions or are held entitled to different privileges under the same conditions.' In the case of Railway v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. 1161 [32 L. Ed. 107], the court affirmed the constitutionality of a Kansas statute imposing upon railroad corporations future liabilities for damages to employes by negligence of their fellow servants, notwithstanding no such liability existed against any other person or corporation, because the court considered that the legislation met a particular necessity, and all railroad corporations, without distinction, were made subject to the same liability."

In the case of St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Mathews, 165 U. S. 1, 17 Sup. Ct. 243, 41 L. Ed. 611, which accords with McCandless v. R. R. Co., 38 S. C. 116, 16 S. E. 429, 18 L. R. A. 440, it was held that a statute making railroad companies liable for property destroyed by fire communicated from their locomotives did not violate the fourteenth amendment, even though the liability did not depend on any negligence of the railroad company. Let it be noticed that in the two last named cases the classification for the imposition of special liability was not affected by the fact that there were other common carriers operating with steam, which might communicate fire, or whose employes might sustain injuries through the negligence of their fellow servants; thus showing that a classification need not include all engaged in a general business, as the business of carrying freight and passengers, but may simply embrace a more limited class, who carry freight and passengers in a particular way or by particular instrumentalities.

So, in the case of Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780, the court sustained, as not violative of the fourteenth amendment, a Utah statute forbidding the employment of workmen for more than eight hours per day in mines and in the smelting reduction, or refining of ores or metals, although, no doubt, it would be easy to point out in Utah other occupations wherein it might be proper and advisable to prescribe limitations of the hours of labor. It is no fatal objection to a classification that it is not perfect, that it is unwise, that it is inexpedient. To be obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment, the classification must be manifestly unreasonable, without basis or any reasonable difference or distinction among the objects of classification—with respect to the purpose of classification, must be arbitrary. The solution of this question in many cases is confessedly difficult and delicate, and it must always be borne in mind, as a vital principle, that a statute should not be declared unconstitutional unless it is a clear, unmistakable violation of the fundamental law.

In the case of Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606, 23 Sup. Ct. 169, 47 L. Ed. 323, the court held that the California Constitution (article 4, § 26), avoiding the contracts for the sale of shares of corporate stock on margin, did not violate the equal protection of the law because the provision strikes only at some, and not all, objects of possible speculation. In delivering the opinion of the court in that case, Mr. Justice Holmes uses these wise and appropriate words: "While the courts must exercise a judgment of their own, it by no means is true that every law is void which may seem to the judges who pass upon it excessive, unsuited to its ostensible end, or based upon conceptions of morality with which they disagree. Considerable latitude must be allowed for difference of view, as well as for possible peculiar conditions which this court can know but imperfectly, if at all. Otherwise a constitution, instead of embodying only relatively fundamental rules of right, as generally understood by all English-speaking communities, would become the partisan of a particular set of ethical or economical opinions, which by no means are held semper ubique et ab omnibus."

The meaning of the proviso to section 2719, as I suppose, is that the provisions of the section shall not apply to agricultural labor contracts, or advances for agricultural purposes made to laborers. I think there are substantial reasons why the Legislature deemed it proper to insert the proviso. In the first place, a previous statute (section 358, Cr. Code) had already made provisions for the protection of farm laborers. That statute provides: "Any person or persons who shall offer to any laborer or employee at the time when the wages of such laborer or employee are due and payable by agreement, unless otherwise provided for by special contract, as compensation for labor or services performed, checks or scripts of any description, known as plantation checks, payable at some future time, or in the shops or stores of employers, in lieu of lawful money, shall be liable to indictment and punishment by a fine not exceeding $200, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year or both, according to the discretion of the court: provided, the word 'checks' herein shall not be construed so as to prohibit the giving of checks upon any of the authorized banks of deposit or issue in this state." So, also, provision for the protection of farm laborers are made in other statutes, as in sections 2715, 2717, vol. 1, Code. The object of both statutes quoted, construed together, is to protect all laborers from coercion by employers to compel laborers to receive, as wages for labor, goods, wares, or merchandise, or supplies, in lieu of lawful money. It is true, there is a distinction between the two statutes, in this: that persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or mining may incur a penalty for refusing to redeem checks issued in payment of wages in lawful money, even though the laborer may possibly have contracted to receive his wages in whole or in part in goods, etc., whereas persons engaged in agriculture incur no penalty for paying, or offering to pay, the wages of farm laborers in goods, etc., provided a special contract with the laborer authorizes payment of wages in that way. But this distinction is reasonably based upon differences in the general conditions surrounding farm labor as a class, and manufacturing and mining laborers as a class.

The testimony shows that no contract between the manufacturer in this case and the laborer was made by which the laborers were to receive their wages in goods or merchandise checks, and I venture to say that it is rarely, if ever, the case for manufacturing or mining establishments to contract to pay wages otherwise than in money. But from the nature of the business, and the large number of employes, it is no doubt necessary to have regular pay days at reasonable intervals, usually twice per month, as in the case of defendant mill. Naturally, many operatives, by reason of their necessities, would frequently want means of providing for themselves and families before the arrival of pay day; hence arose the practice of issuing checks or coupon books, or some form of credit by which the operatives could secure supplies in advance of pay day; said checks or coupons being in certain denominations, and redeemable at the mill store in merchandise. Here arose an opportunity for apprehension, in enabling an unscrupulous employer to take advantage of the necessities of the laborer, and demand extortionate prices for the merchandise. The statute seeks to remove this inequality between the employer and employé by making such checks, etc., negotiable and redeemable in cash under specified conditions and at stated times. Such legislation was undoubtedly intended to meet what was regarded an evil particularly affecting laborers in mills and mines, for which no remedy had been devised, as in the case of farm laborers. Farm laborers having previously been classified for purposes of legislation in their protection, and there being no suggestion that such classification was unreasonable, it could hardly be said that legislation designed to protect other laborers is void for unreasonableness, merely because a distinct class already provided for is excluded from the statute. A very different situation was presented to the court in Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., supra. It must be remembered that every classification, in the nature of things, involves some inequality as between a member of one class and a member of another class, for otherwise there would be no such thing as classification. But in law there is no inequality, if the members of a class, reasonably designated, are given the same rights or made subject to the same restrictions. Hence it is no objection to this legislation, in so far as equal protection of the law is involved, to point out that sections 2719 and 2720 interfere to some extent with the right of mill owners and their operatives to contract that labor shall be paid otherwise than in lawful money, whereas section 358, as to farm laborers, does not interfere with the right of landowners and farm laborers to make such contract. The right of contract is not absolute, and is subject to the police power of the state. Of course, the right of contract cannot be arbitrarily interfered with.

In Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780, a statute fixing the period of employment in underground mines at eight hours per day was held as not to unlawfully restrict the right of employer and employé to contract for a longer period per day.

In Orient Ins. Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 19 Sup. Ct. 281, 43 L. Ed. 552, where a contract of insurance provided for liability not exceeding the cash value of the property at the time of loss, and where a Missouri statute provided that the insurance company should not be permitted to deny that the property was worth the full amount insured at the time of the insurance, and in case of total loss the measure of damages shall be the amount for which the property was insured, less depreciation in value since insurance, the court held that the statute was within the police power of the state, even though it placed a limitation upon the right of contract.

In Otis v. Parker, cited supra, the court held that the California Constitution avoiding all contracts for sales of shares of corporate stock on margin, and providing for recovery of money paid on such contracts, did not unconstitutionally interfere with the right of contract, although this provision may be construed to apply to bona fide as well as gambling contracts. See, also, Avent Beattyville Coal Co. v. Kentucky (Ky.) 28 S. W. 502, 28 L. R. A. 276, and Hancock v. Yaden, 121 Ind. 366, 23 N. E. 253, 6 L. R. A. 576, 16 Am. St. Rep. 396, showing that similar legislation does not unlawfully interfere with the right of contract. If we admit that placing farm labor contracts into one class, and mill and mine labor contracts in another class, is a reasonable classification, so as not to violate the principle of equality, then the case of Knoxville Iron Co. v. Harbison, 183 U. S. 13, 22 Sup. Ct. 1, 46 L. Ed. 55, is conclusive that legislation of the kind in question does not unlawfully interfere with the right of contract.

This brings us back to the real question, as to whether the two statutes, which, construed together, embrace all labor contracts, constitute an arbitrary classification. The two systems of labor engaged in farming, on the one hand, and manufacturing, on the other, and the conditions surrounding each, are distinct in many ways. The large number of mill operatives, aggregated into communities, as contrasted with the few laborers in the employ of the average farmer, and scattered throughout the country; the daily output of the mills, as contrasted with the yearly product of the farm; the resources of aggregated wealth to command ready cash, compared with the ability to pay always in cash of the average farmer, dependent for his cash upon crops once a year; the consequent ease with which manufacturers may carry out a system involving regular pay days in cash at brief intervals throughout the year, as contrasted with the difficulties in the way of the farmer to comply with such a system; the rarity of contracts to pay mill laborers in anything but money; the prevalence of farm labor contracts involving payment of wages in supplies or farm products—are some of the considerations which would make it reasonable to have some differences in the regulations made for the protection of the respective classes of labor. It is well known that many agriculturists contract to pay a portion of the wages of labor in supplies obtained through orders upon merchants. A very prevalent system of farming exists in this state, under which the farm laborer agrees to receive a share of the crops grown or cultivated by him as compensation for his labor, but in the meantime, until the crops are gathered and divided, the landowner undertakes to make advances in supplies, to be deducted from the laborer's share of the crop. The necessities of the average farmer often compel him to make arrangements with some merchant to fill his orders for supplies to such laborers. Now, but for the proviso in section 2719, all orders for supplies, which could be construed to be in payment for labor issued by landowners to farm laborers under these circumstances, would be redeemable in cash in the hands and at the option of the laborer, if presented for redemption, as required by the statute, notwithstanding the laborer's contract to the contrary, although such contract is a part of a prevalent system advantageous to both landowner and laborers. To place orders of landowners, made under such circumstances, in the category of merchandise checks, etc., redeemable in cash, as prescribed in the statute, would very seriously affect the system of labor contracts on farms. Hence the proviso. We hold, therefore, that the statute in question is not unconstitutional.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

B. F. KING & SON v. LANE et al.

TRIAL—IRREGULAR VERDICT—CORRECTION IN OPEN COURT.

1. Two persons were sued, one of whom defaulted. On trial of the issues between plaintiff and the answering defendant, the jury found a verdict for plaintiff against the defaulting defendant, and on inquiry from the court said that they intended to find in favor of the answering defendant, and supposed that the verdict against the defaulting defendant would have that effect. Held, that it was not error for the court to direct the clerk to write a verdict in favor of the answering defendant, and have the foreman sign it in open court, since the first verdict was irregular.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Orangeburg County; Purdy, Judge.

Action by B. F. King & Son against E. B. Lane and another. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Jas. F. Izlar, for appellants. Raysor & Summers, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an action on an open account for lumber sold and delivered. A copy of the summons and complaint was served on both the defendants. The defendant Lane did not appear, answer, or demur to the complaint, but defaulted, and an affidavit to that effect was duly made. The defendant J. W. Smoak answered the complaint. The case was docketed on calendar 1, and was not docketed on calendar 3. The jury returned the following verdict: "We find for the plaintiff against E. B. Lane, $218.22. D. J. Fogle, Foreman." The record contains this statement: "After publication of the foregoing verdict, the counsel for the defendant Smoak suggested to the court that under the charge of the court and the finding of the jury, as published, the jury should have gone further, and found in favor of the defendant Smoak; whereupon the court turned to the jury, and asked them if, under the charge of the court, they meant to find Mr. Lane alone liable, to which the foreman of the jury replied, from his seat, that they intended to find a verdict in favor of Mr. Smoak, and that they thought the verdict against Mr. Lane alone showed that they found in favor of Mr. Smoak, and that it was their intention to so find: whereupon the court remarked that under its charge the court thought the verdict sufficiently explicit. Nevertheless, as the counsel for Mr. Smoak desired the verdict to be put in express form, the court stated to the jury, 'If that is your verdict, and you intend to find in favor of the defendant J. W. Smoak, the clerk can write out the verdict, and the foreman can sign it in your presence;' whereupon this was done, and, after the verdict was so signed, assented to the same as their verdict in open court, having previously stated in open court that they had found such verdict, and they were not again sent into the room, the court deeming it unnecessary, as it regarded the signing of the verdict in open court, after the jury had found the verdict without any suggestion from the court as to what they should find beyond what was contained in the judge's charge, as being merely a clerical matter." After the publication of the foregoing verdict the deputy clerk of the court then wrote the following verdict: "We find for the defendant J. W. Smoak." This verdict was then signed, "D. F. Fogle, Foreman," in open court. This verdict was duly published. Both verdicts were then entered upon the minutes of the court by the clerk. The plaintiffs appealed upon the following exceptions:

"(1) That the presiding judge erred in instructing the jury as to the form of their verdict, as follows: 'If you find against both defendants, simply say, "We find for the plaintiffs," whatever you think the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, and write out your verdict, with what amount you find against both of them;' whereas he should have instructed the jury that, the defendant Lane having neither appeared, answered, nor demurred to the plaintiffs' complaint, no issues, either of law or fact, are raised as to this defendant; that they alone were concerned with the liability of the defendant J. W. Smoak to the plaintiffs; and that their verdict should alone refer to the issues raised by the answer of J. W. Smoak, defendant, and to his liability to the plaintiffs; and that their verdict could not, under the circumstances here presented, be for or against both defendants.

"(2) That the presiding judge erred in instructing the jury as to the form of their verdict, as follows: 'If you find for the plaintiffs, and find against Mr. Lane alone, you would say, "We find for the plaintiffs" so many dollars—whatever the amount is—against E. B. Lane;' whereas he should have instructed the jury that E. B. Lane, defendant, having failed to appear, answer, or demur to the plaintiffs' complaint, his liability to the plaintiffs was not involved in the issues then being tried by them, and that in no event could they make any finding as to the defendant E. B. Lane.

"(3) That the presiding judge erred in directing the jury to render a verdict for the defendant J. W. Smoak in open court, and in not sending them back to their room with full instructions as to the rights and liabilities of these several defendants under the pleadings, and as to the form of their verdict, there to consider and determine the same as to said defendant.

"(4) That the presiding judge erred in directing and permitting the foreman of the jury to sign a verdict in open court in favor of the defendant J. W. Smoak, without any consultation or conference with his fellows, in their jury room, under the further instructions of the court, and in permitting the same to be entered by the clerk on his minutes, without publication, as the verdict of the whole jury in favor of said defendant.

"(5) That the presiding judge erred in receiving any verdict of the jury, under the circumstances, against the defendant Lane, and in permitting the same to be entered by the clerk on the minutes of the court, such verdict being not only irregular, but a nullity; the defendant Lane having neither appeared, answered, nor demurred to the plaintiffs' complaint, and his liability to them not being an issue to be passed upon and determined by the jury, but by the court, on proof which, if satisfactory to the court, would entitle the plaintiffs to a judgment against said defendant for the sum sued for, as in the case of a liquidated demand.

"(6) That the presiding judge erred in refusing the plaintiffs' motion for a new trial on his minutes, his instructions to the jury being erroneous, and the verdict for the defendant Smoak being irregular and void by reason of said erroneous instructions, and that the verdict against the defendant Lane was without warrant or authority of law, and was and is therefore null and void.

"(7) That the presiding judge erred in not instructing the jury that, the defendant Lane not having served any notice of appearance, answered, or demurred to the action of the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs were entitled, on proof of their claim in open court, whether itemized or not, to a judgment by the court against the defendant Lane for the sum sued for, as in the case of a liquidated demand; and that the liability of the defendant Lane to the plaintiffs on the open account sued on was not an issue to be passed upon and determined by the jury; and that under the circumstances no verdict could be found by them against the defendant Lane; and that the issues raised by the answer of the defendant Smoak were alone the issues to be considered and determined by them."

We will first consider the assignments of error relating to the finding of a verdict against the defendant Lane under the charge of the presiding judge. The case of the State

v. Baldwin, 14 S. C. 137, shows that the first verdict was irregular, and that the only verdict in accordance with law was the one last rendered by the jury. That was an action against Baldwin, as county treasurer, and two other defendants on his official bond. The verdict returned by the jury was, "We find for the plaintiffs the sum of $3,120.74 against C. H. Baldwin." The verdict was recommitted to the jury, to find a complete verdict. On hearing the appeal, the Supreme Court used this language: "Our next inquiry will be whether there was any error of law committed in recommitting the case to the jury after the first announcement of the verdict. It is very common practice—one which has the sanction of long usage, and is undoubtedly correct—for a circuit judge to recommit the record to the jury after the verdict has been announced for the purpose of enabling them to put the verdict in proper and complete form, and this seems to have been the purpose in this case. The action was against three persons, and the verdict, as first announced, was manifestly incomplete, and not in legal form. While it determined the issues as between the plaintiffs and one of the defendants, as to the other two it left the issues wholly undetermined. The jury, therefore, when they first announced their verdict, had manifestly failed to complete their task, and the judge properly recommitted the case to them for the purpose of enabling them to finish their work. The case was not recommitted because the jury had made an incorrect finding, but because they had failed to find at all as to two of the defendants." Even conceding that the charge to the jury and the finding by them of the first verdict were erroneous, the rights of the appellant were in no wise thereby prejudiced, as the only verdict rendered in conformity with law did not even mention the name of the defendant Lane, but said, "We find for the defendant J. W. Smoak."

We will next dispose of those exceptions assigning error in the rendition of the second verdict. The record shows that when the first verdict was published the presiding judge asked the jury if they meant to find the defendant named alone liable, whereupon the foreman replied that they intended to find a verdict in favor of the defendant Smoak, and that they thought the verdict against Lane had that effect. The court then said to the jury, "If that is your verdict, and you intend to find in favor of the defendant J. W. Smoak, the clerk can write out the verdict, and the foreman can sign it in your presence;" whereupon the verdict was assented to in open court. Under these circumstances it was not necessary for the jury to retire to their room. The action of the court was in accordance with the well-established practice in this state. Devore v. Geiger, 41 S. C. 138, 19 S. E. 288.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. SOUTHERN RY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 30, 1904.)

RAILROADS—CROSSING ACCIDENT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ—DECLARATIONS OF PERSON INJURED.

1. In an action against a railway company for the killing of a minor at a railroad crossing, evidence as to other boys playing on the crossing was incompetent on the question of decedent's contributory negligence.

2. Declarations of a person injured as to the manner in which the injury occurred, made immediately after the accident to persons who ran to his help, were admissible as a part of the res gestæ.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Union County; Buchanan, Judge.

Action by Rosa Williams, as administratrix of Wallace Williams, against the Southern Railway. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. P. Sanders, for appellant. V. E. De Pass and W. W. Dixon, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. This action, under Lord Campbell's act, was brought to recover $1,990 damages from the defendant, alleging that, through the negligence of the defendant, one Wallace Williams a lad of 14 years, had his leg cut off by one of the defendant's trains on the 16th April, 1902, and died therefrom on the 3d July, 1902. That the negligence of the defendant consisted in failing to blow the whistle or ring the bell of the engine drawing the train, as required by law, and also running at a reckless speed across a street crossing in the town of Union, S. C. This was all denied by the defendant, who also alleged that, if it was guilty of negligence in failing to ring its bell or to sound the whistle on the engine, the intestate was guilty of contributory negligence by trying to get on its train while in motion, and, by failing to get on its train, fell so near or on its track that his foot was run over by a wheel of one of its freight cars.

The action came on for trial before his honor O. W. Buchanan as circuit judge, and a jury at the October term, 1902, of the court of common pleas for Union county. During the trial the circuit judge admitted some testimony, and refused to admit some testimony, which the defendant alleges was erroneous; and also alleges error in his charge to the jury in modifying defendant's sixth request to charge. The jury found a verdict for plaintiff of $400. The defendant then moved on the minutes of the court for a new trial, which motion was refused by the circuit judge. After entry of judgment upon the verdict, the defendant appealed therefrom upon the following grounds:

"(1) In refusing to allow the witness Mrs. Hawkins to be examined as to the frequency of boys running about and playing at the crossing where the injury occurred during the time trains were passing there, and in sustaining the objection of plaintiff's counsel to such testimony; it being respectfully submitted that such testimony was both competent and relevant to the issues involved in this case.

"(2) In permitting the witnesses Gossett, Ford, and Rochelle to testify and state the declarations of Wallace Williams, the injured boy, on the ground they were a part of the res gestæ; whereas it is respectfully submitted his honor should have held that these declarations were hearsay, and were not a part of the res gestæ, and should have excluded them from the evidence.

"(3) In not allowing the witness Jacob Rice to testify to the fact that the crossing where the injury occurred was a common gathering place and playground for little negro boys; it being respectfully submitted that this evidence was relevant and competent on the question of contributory negligence, and also as to whether the boy may not have been a trespasser.

"(4) In not charging the defendant's sixth request without modification, to wit: 'Where one sues for damages on account of injuries causing death, he must prove that the deceased died from the injuries alleged;' and in modifying this request by instructing the jury that they should consider this in the light of and in connection with section 2139, vol. 1, of the Code of 1892. The error being, it is respectfully submitted: First. That his honor, in the light of the testimony of the physicians in this case, erred, in that this modification was calculated to lead the jury to believe that if one is injured, and this injury weakens his constitution, and renders him less able to resist disease than he would be if in sound health, that his heirs could recover damages from the persons inflicting the injury, if some disease not superinduced by the injury attacks the injured person and causes his death; whereas it is respectfully submitted that if one is injured in such manner so as to weaken his constitution, even if this does render him less able to resist disease than he would be if in sound health, then that the person inflicting the injury is not liable for the death of the injured person if he is attacked by and dies from a disease not superinduced by such injury. Second. That his honor's modification was calculated to lead the jury to conclude that under Lord Campbell's act, where one is injured, and death ensues from some disease, whether superinduced or not by the injury, that, because the system was weakened, those named in the act would have a cause of action against the one inflicting the injury; whereas his honor should have held that the injury must cause death, or at least be the proximate cause thereof, before a cause of action can exist under the act. Third. That by this modification his honor took away from the jury the question of the proximate cause of the death, and led the jury to believe that, if one is injured at a highway crossing, and the defendant failed to ring its bell or sound its whistle, as the statute required, and this injury weakened his constitution, and he was afterwards attacked by disease, whether superinduced by the injury or not, from which disease he died, then that his heirs could recover of the defendant if the injury contributed to the death in any degree whatever; whereas it is respectfully submitted that under the law applicable to causes of action for the beneficiaries, where an injury causes death, and in the light of the testimony in this case, the injury must at least have contributed as a proximate cause to the death before a recovery could be had.

(5) Because his honor erred in refusing the motion for a new trial, the error being that his honor erred in holding that he could not interfere with the determination of the jury where there was any evidence on the issue involved; whereas his honor should have held that the verdict of the jury in this case was against the great weight of the evidence: (a) As to whether the injury was caused by the engine striking the boy on the street as he was attempting to cross it, or by the boy attempting to get on a moving car after the engine had already crossed the street; (b) as to whether this alleged injury caused the death of the boy. That his honor should have used his discretion, and should have passed on the question whether or not the verdict was against the greater weight of the evidence."

We will now examine the exceptions in our own order.

1. We do not think there was error when the circuit judge refused to allow Mrs. Hawkins to testify in this case that little boys frequently ran about and played on the crossing at Wallace street, where the accident occurred, when she had testified that she never saw Wallace Williams on such crossing. Her proposed testimony was not only immaterial to any issues involved in this case, but was calculated to prejudice plaintiff's case. This exception is overruled.

2. We think the circuit judge committed no error when he allowed Gossett, Ford, and Rochelle to testify as to what Wallace Williams told them as to the manner in which he was injured. One or two of the witnesses saw Wallace Williams when he was struck by the engine. They rushed to his help, and he then and there declared to them how he was hurt. This court has several times held that the declaration need not be made coincident with the injury, but near about it; so nearly that it is not likely that the declaration could be manufactured. The very recent case of the State v. McDaniel, 47 S. E. 384, establishes the foregoing proposition as to the admissibility of declarations as a part of the res gestæ. Leahy v. Cass Avenue & Fair Grounds Railway (Mo.) 10 S. W. 58, 10 Am. St. Rep. 300; also Wormsdorf v. Detroit City Ry. Co. (Mich.) 42 N. W. 1000, 13 Am. St. Rep. 453. This exception is overruled.

3. The witness Mr. Jacob Rice could not testify, against the objection of plaintiff, that little boys used the crossing where the accident occurred as a playground. What concern was it who played there, if plaintiff did not? As remarked in disposing of first exception, such testimony was not only immaterial to the issues here involved, but would have been prejudicial to the case. This exception is overruled.

4. We will now consider the fourth exception. The defendant requested the presiding judge to charge the jury as follows: "(6) Where one sues for damages on account of injuries causing death, he must prove that the deceased died from the injuries alleged. I have just read you that statute which says 'contributed to the injury,' and I charge you that in the light of and in connection with the section I have just read to you. (7) A jury ought not to find that one died from injuries from mere probabilities. It should be proven by the preponderance of the evidence. I charge you that." It will be seen that the presiding judge made the charge, but qualified it by referring to that statute which says "contributed to the injury." But it does seem to us that when the circuit judge charged the seventh request, which we reproduce herein, he cleared away any possible doubt. We have examined the whole charge of the circuit judge, and find it admissible in every respect. We do not think it was any business of the circuit judge to canvass the opinions testified to by several physicians. It would have been at variance with our state Constitution if he had done so. The jury heard all the testimony. They remembered that the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff was that her intestate was never sick a day since he was a baby. That the testimony of the defendant's own witness Dr. S. S. Lenord stated that there was no sign of anything but the wound made by the cutting off his foot by the railway on the 16th April, 1902, when he went to call on the intestate. He was the physician employed by the railway itself. He used the iodoform after which the "rash," as it was called, first made its appearance. Both he and his son testified that the wound made by the operation in cutting off the leg of Wallace had never entirely healed, and the other physicians say that it was never entirely healed. It is true, he fell from his crutches and opened the wound again. It is true that he had a spell of malarial fever, but it was stated that the fever had subsided. The doctors all united in saying that they expected Wallace to recover, but he did not. He died a few days after Dr. Culp saw him. We ought to have stated that the doctors never did undertake to say with any certainty as to what killed Wallace. They all admitted that the wound inflicted by the railway company had its effect in reducing Wallace's power of resistance to disease. The jury heard, as before remarked, the uncontradicted testimony that Wallace had never been sick in his life; that he was stricken down by this railway company on the 16th April, 1902; and that he died on 3d July, 1902, never having recovered from this wound made by the railway company. They had the right, and it was their duty, to pass upon all the testimony in the case. The circuit judge impressed upon their minds that they ought not to find that one died from injuries from mere probabilities. (Italics ours.) Indeed, that was the duty of the plaintiff to prove that the wounded boy died from the injuries alleged. We think that the charge of the circuit judge could not mislead the jury. The parties have had a fair trial. It is to the interest of the people of this commonwealth that when a fair trial has been had in a cause that should be the end of it.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

RILEY v. MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO.

MAGISTRATE'S COURT—JURISDICTION OF PERSON—APPEAL—DISMISSAL—REMAND.

1. On appeal from a magistrate, if the circuit court decides that the magistrate had not acquired jurisdiction of defendant's person, it should dismiss the case, and not remand it for further action.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Saluda County; Klugh, Judge.

Action by D. Luther Riley against the Mutual Life Insurance Company. From an order of the circuit court remanding the cause to magistrate court, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Eugene W. Able, for appellant. B. B. Evans, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. The plaintiff instituted his action in the court of M. L. Little, Esq., one of the magistrates for Saluda county, on the 3d day of April, 1903, to recover the sum of $26.50 of the said defendant, the Mutual Life Insurance Company. The summons was served upon F. H. Hyatt, Esq., as manager for this state of said defendant insurance company, on the 7th day of April, 1903, at Columbia, S. C., and said summons is in these words: "State of South Carolina, County of Saluda, Court of Magistracy. Summons for Relief. Complaint Served. D. Luther Riley, Plaintiff, against The Mutual Life Insurance Company, Defendant. To the defendant, the Mutual Life Insurance Company: You are hereby summoned and required to answer the complaint in this action, of which a copy is herewith served upon you, and to serve a copy of your answer to the said complaint on the subscribers at their office, Saluda, S. C., within twenty days after the service hereof, exclusive of the day of service; and if you fail to answer the complaint within the time aforesaid, the plaintiff in this action will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint. Barnard B. Evans, Plaintiff's Attorney. M. L. Little, [L. S.] Magistrate. Saluda, S. C., April 3d, A. D. 1903." A complaint was served with the summons. The "case" shows that at 8 o'clock p. m. on the 28th day of April, 1903, the magistrate, M. L. Little, Esq., called the case for trial. B. B. Evans, Esq., as attorney for plaintiff, alone was present. Neither defendant nor its attorney put in an appearance. Upon the production of an affidavit as to service of the summons and complaint, the said magistrate gave judgment for $28.50; also for 60 cents for magistrate's costs, and for $11 constable's costs. We should have stated that the complaint showed a claim against the defendant on account. On the 29th day of April, 1903, the defendant served notice of appeal upon the magistrate and plaintiff's attorney, which, omitting formal part of notice and exceptions, was as follows: "(1) Because the magistrate, M. L. Little, has never acquired jurisdiction of the defendant herein, in that there has been no proper or legal summons served on the defendant requiring him to appear in his court more than twenty days from the date of service thereof; and, further, because the summons served was wholly insufficient, and did not appoint a time or place of trial. (2) In that the judgment rendered was irregular and void, in that there is no proof whatever offered of the truthfulness of the complaint, and, the action not being upon a written instrument for the payment of money only, the cause of action must be proven regularly, even where default has been made. (3) In that it was error to give judgment for $11 for constable's costs in the case, because under the law an officer can charge for the miles actually traveled in making service only, and it is a fact that the officer making the service herein is a resident of Columbia, S. C., and made the service in that city, and did not travel from Saluda to Columbia." But the "case" shows that the magistrate, after the notice of appeal, to wit, on the 1st day of May, 1903, entered on his record these words: "The court took a recess until May 1st, when the proof of the claim was introduced, and the following testimony taken." Then followed the testimony taken on 1st May, 1903, by the magistrate in support of plaintiff's claim. The appeal came on to be heard before his honor Judge Klugh in the court of common pleas of Saluda county at the May term, 1903, of said court. As the result of such hearing the said circuit judge passed an order sustaining exception No. 1, and ordering the record to be returned to the magistrate, M. L. Little, Esq., for such further proceedings to enforce his decree as were necessary. The circuit judge, in his order, declared that he deemed it unnecessary to pass upon the other matters contained in exceptions 2 and 3. Within due time, the defendant appealed from and excepted to the order of Judge Klugh on the following grounds: "(1) Because his honor Judge Klugh erred in remanding the cause to the magistrate, in that, having found that the court had never acquired jurisdiction of the defendant, the judgment rendered by the magistrate should have been set aside, with costs, and the cause dismissed. (2) Because his honor Judge Klugh erred when he sustained defendant's first exception in failing to set aside the judgment entered by the magistrate, and awarding costs on the appeal to the defendant, and dismissing the action. (3) Because his honor Judge Klugh erred in refusing to consider the exception of the defendant wherein defendant complained that it was error for the magistrate to enter judgment against the defendant without formal proof of the cause of action; and it is respectfully asserted that it was error for the magistrate to receive any testimony herein on May 1st, after entering the orders that he entered April 28th, and receiving notice of defendant's intention to appeal April 29th. (4) Because his honor Judge Klugh erred in refusing to consider defendant's exception whereby defendant complained that it was error for the magistrate to give judgment for constructive mileage of an officer for serving papers."

We will now endeavor to consider this appeal. In the first place, we will remark that the question that the magistrate below had no jurisdiction to hear and determine this case is conclusively settled against all parties by the circuit judge sustaining appellant's first exception, and there is no appeal therefrom. But defendant (appellant) contends that the circuit judge should have given his own judgment, and not referred the cause back to the magistrate for that purpose. So we sustain the appellant's first exception or ground of appeal. See section 368, subd. 1, of the Civil Code of Procedure of South Carolina, where the circuit judge is directed to render his judgment.

As to the second exception, we sustain that also, and we might add that, whenever a question of jurisdiction is settled against a plaintiff, then his action should be dismissed. There can be no valid orders or judgment in an action where the court is without jurisdiction. Wren v. Johnson, 62 S. C. 533, 40 S. E. 937. If the judgment of the magistrate is void for want of jurisdiction, then all he adjudged is null and void. It was not error in the circuit judge to refuse to go into particulars, as set out in the third and fourth exceptions.

It is the judgment of this court that the order of the circuit court appealed from be remitted to that court, with direction to the presiding judge of said court to make a judgment declaring the judgment of the magistrate's court null and void, and reversing the same.

(68 S. C. 512)

HUTCHINGS v. MILLS MFG. CO.

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—EVIDENCE OF NEGLIGENCE—PLEADING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. In an action by an employé to recover for personal injuries, evidence that it was his duty to instruct new employés as to the danger from machinery, and that he went to a machine for that purpose, which machine, according to the custom of the mill, should at the time have been stopped, but which had been left running without notice to the employé, and that he was injured thereby, was some evidence of negligence on the part of the master, though the employé could easily have ascertained if the machine was running.

2. A denial in an answer of allegations that plaintiff was without fault in bringing about his injury raises the question of contributory negligence.

3. Refusal of an amendment at trial does not preclude the right to move for it before the next trial.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; Purdy, Judge.

Action by W. F. Hutchings against the Mills Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for appellant. Blythe & Blythe, for respondent.

WOODS, J. Plaintiff's hand was caught in a card machine and severely cut, while he was working as an operative in defendant's cotton mill. This action was brought to recover damages for the injury, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff.

Defendant, in the first exception, assigns error in the refusal of the presiding judge to order a nonsuit on the ground that the evidence failed to show any act of negligence on the part of the defendant. The plaintiff's testimony tended to prove that the accident occurred under the following circumstances: Having observed that the knives connected with a card machine in charge of another operative had fallen from the machine, plaintiff reported the fact to his superior, and returned to his work. The operative in charge of this machine was inexperienced, and it was part of plaintiff's duty to help him by giving him information and instruction concerning his work. It was the custom of the mill, when a machine got out of order, to strip it and then stop it by disconnecting the machinery. On this occasion, however, the card machine was left running, by the express order of a superior, for the grinder to sharpen it. Relying on the custom of stopping the machine, the plaintiff took his inexperienced co-employé to it to show him how the knives were adjusted and the office they performed. The machine being inclosed, and comparatively noiseless, the plaintiff did not discover that it was running, and, in explaining to his co-employé, undertook with his hands to clear off the motes under the machine, instead of using a stick provided by the company for that purpose. One hand was caught in the machinery and mangled. The plaintiff knew he could ascertain with certainty whether the machinery was in motion by stepping to one side and observing the pulley, but he did not take that precaution, because of his confidence that the machine had been stopped, as was usual in such circumstances. If the foregoing statement is true, plaintiff was acting within his line of duty in explaining the machine to the inexperienced operative, and the failure of his superior to notify him that he had ordered that the machine be left running, contrary to the usage of the mill, was some evidence of negligence. We refrain from discussion of the facts, because the case must, on other grounds, go back for another trial.

The defendant submits, in his fifth exception, that the presiding judge erred in charging the jury that they could not consider whether the plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence, holding that this defense had not been set up in the answer. Where the complaint in an action of tort, charging negligence of the defendant as the proximate cause of the injury, alleges that the plaintiff was without fault, a denial of this allegation raises the issue of contributory negligence. Long v. Southern Railway Co., 50 S. C. 53, 27 S. E. 531. The seventh paragraph of the complaint is as follows: "That plaintiff examined the said machine, and knowing that it was the duty and custom of the operatives, after stripping, to stop the machine, not knowing of the orders of the said card grinder that said machine be left running, not having any evidence that the said machine was running, but, on the contrary, believing that said machine was not in motion, inserted his hand therein at the bottom thereof, in order to show the said Lytle the stand from which the said knives had fallen, and where they should be when in their proper place." The plaintiff had before set forth in detail certain acts of the defendant as constituting the negligence which led to the accident. He then in this paragraph anticipates that it may be charged by defendant that he also was negligent in putting his hand under the machine, when he knew, or ought to have known, that it was running; and, without waiting for the defendant to make the charge, he tenders the issue himself by alleging that he did not know the machine was running, and had no evidence of the fact. It is manifest, under the authority just cited, that the denial of the plaintiff of this allegation raised the issue of contributory negligence in the particulars in which it was denied by the plaintiff. The fifth exception must therefore be sustained.

This conclusion, it is obvious, makes the refusal of the circuit judge to allow the defendant to amend, by pleading more specifically the defense of contributory negligence, of no importance. The refusal of the circuit judge to allow an amendment at the trial could not prejudice the defendant's right to move for it before the next trial.

The first, second, and third exceptions are overruled; the fourth and sixth were abandoned.

The judgment of this court is that the fifth exception be sustained, and the cause be remanded to the circuit court for a new trial.

STANDARD SEWING MACH. CO. v. ALEXANDER.

PLEADINGS — AMENDMENT — BANKRUPTCY — DISCHARGE — PENDING CASES — EFFECT — ESTOPPEL — ELECTION OF REMEDIES.

1. Code Proc. § 194, limiting the right to amend pleadings, applies to amendments asked for during or after the trial which might prejudice by surprise, and not to amendments before the trial.

2. An order on a discharge in bankruptcy providing that it shall not affect a certain pending case until final judgment therein, and that as to such judgment the discharge shall have the same force that it would have if the judgment had been recovered after the application for discharge and before the granting of the same, permits the prosecution of such suit.

3. Plaintiff in an action in tort on the ground that goods were obtained by false representations is not estopped by filing in the bankrupt court notes taken for the price of goods.

4. Where vendor of personalty sues on notes taken for the purchase price, and finds that a judgment thereon cannot be obtained because of proceedings in bankruptcy, he may abandon the action, and sue in tort, on the ground that the goods were obtained by fraud.

5. The vendor of goods is not, by retaining past-due notes, barred from suing in tort for obtaining goods by fraud, where the notes were in his possession at the time of the trial.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; Gary and Purdy, Judges.

Action by the Standard Sewing Machine Company against M. L. Alexander. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. M. Shuman, for appellant. Haynesworth, Parker & Patterson, for respondent.

WOODS, J. In the original complaint against the defendant, who was a bankrupt, a number of notes given by him were set out upon which judgment was demanded, and it was further alleged that the goods for which the notes were given were obtained by fraud in making certain false statements as to his financial condition, upon which plaintiff relied in delivering the goods. Before the trial, Judge Watts allowed the plaintiff to amend his complaint by striking out the allegations concerning the notes, and alleging that defendant induced the plaintiff, by the fraudulent representations as to his condition, to sell and deliver merchandise reasonably worth $8,108.54, which was also the amount for which the notes were given.

The first position taken in the appeal is that Judge Watts erred in allowing the amendment, because it changed substantially the claim of plaintiff, and allowed an action for tort to be substituted for an action on contract. It has been decided in Hall v. Woodward, 30 S. C. 564, 9 S. E. 684, and other cases, that the limitation of the right to amend fixed by section 194 of the Code of Procedure, upon which defendant relies, applies to amendments asked for during or after the trial which might prejudice by surprise, and not to amendments before the trial.

The defendant was adjudged a bankrupt on the 5th day of November, 1900. On the 7th day of March, 1901, the defendant filed in the bankrupt court his application for his discharge in bankruptcy. This action was not commenced until the 14th day of October, 1902. It thus appears that the application of the bankrupt for his discharge was pending when this action was commenced. The contention of the defendant is that when he made and filed his application for discharge it was to be granted or refused him according to the status of things as they then stood; that the right to discharge could not be made to depend upon some new status or condition created after the application for discharge; and hence this suit, not having been commenced until after the application for discharge was made, is barred by the order of discharge. The decretal part of the order of discharge is: "It is ordered that said discharge be, and the same is hereby, granted, and that the said exceptions of said bankrupt be, and the same are hereby, sustained; provided, that this discharge shall not affect the case of the Standard Sewing Machine Co. against M. L. Alexander, now pending in the court of common pleas in and for the county of Greenville, in the state of South Carolina, until final judgment therein; and as to any judgment that may be recovered therein by the plaintiff in said case this discharge shall have the same force and effect that it would have if said judgment had been recovered after the application for said discharge and before the granting of the same, and no other." The true interpretation of this order is that the plaintiff was given permission by the United States District Judge to pursue his action in the court of common pleas to judgment, the question as to the effect of the discharge on any judgment that might be obtained being reversed. We do not understand, however, that Judge Brawley undertook to limit the defenses that might be set up to the action pending in the court of common pleas for Greenville county, although such defenses might involve the consideration of the bankrupt law. Hence, if the bankrupt act does not permit a suit of this nature to be commenced against the bankrupt after the petition for discharge has been filed, the action must be dismissed. It is clear that the order of discharge did not affect plaintiff's claim, but, on the contrary, expressly reserved the rights of both parties to this suit.

It is not the duty of this court in this case to inquire whether an order for conditional discharge could be legally granted. Such an order has been made by the court having jurisdiction of such matters, and it must be given full effect according to its terms. Taking the view most favorable to the defendant and regarding the order as having the same effect as an unconditional discharge granted after the termination of this suit, it has the same effect as an order of discharge with a judgment recovered in an action for fraud outstanding against defendant; and such an order would not discharge defendant from such a judgment. The bankrupt act saves from discharge judgments in actions for fraud in existence at the date of the discharge, and the exception is not limited by the act to those judgments in existence at the date of the filing of the petition for discharge.

The plaintiff is not estopped from bringing this action by proving in the bankrupt court the notes given for the goods. Strang v. Bradner, 114 U. S. 555, 5 Sup. Ct. 1038, 29 L. Ed. 248. This case, it is true, arose under the bankrupt act of 1867 (Act March 2, 1867, c. 176, 14 Stat. 517), but the same doctrine has been applied to the act of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418]). In re Lewensohn (D. C.) 99 Fed. 73, Id., 104 Fed. 1006, 44 C. C. A. 309.

There can be no doubt of the correctness of the general proposition that suit for the purchase money on a contract of sale is an affirmance of the sale and a waiver of any claim that the vendor was induced to part with the property by fraud. We think this case, however, clearly falls under an important exception, thus stated in 1 Benjamin on Sales, 581, note: "But in Peters v. Ballistier, 3 Pick. 495, the captain of a vessel sold a cargo without authority. The owner at first brought assumpsit, but, discovering before trial that he had misconceived his remedy, he discontinued the suit, and brought trover, which was sustained. On principle, this seems correct. In general, where a party is unsuccessful because he has not brought the proper form of action, he is not barred from his true remedy. It would seem that he ought to be barred by his election only where he has in fact two remedies, not where he resorts to a remedy which gives him no judgment on the merits. See Butler v. Hildreth, 5 Metc. 49, where this distinction is taken." The plaintiff brought his action on the notes, alleging the fraud manifestly under the mistaken impression that a judgment obtained under those allegations would not be affected by the bankruptcy proceedings. Upon discovering his error and ascertaining that any judgment obtained in a suit on the notes would be barred by the discharge in bankruptcy, he moved to amend and sue for the fraud disaffirming the contract. The conduct of the plaintiff and the contents of his pleadings indicated plainly these facts, and it was no error for the circuit judge to leave the question to the jury as to whether the statements of the original complaint indicated an intention to waive the tort. Even direct allegations of fact in an original pleading inconsistent with those of the amended pleading are not conclusive in a trial on the amended pleading, but only evidence of admissions to be weighed with any other evidence on the subject. Hall v. Woodward, 80 S. C. 564, 9 S. E. 684. The court did not submit to the jury the construction of the pleading, but told them, in considering whether the plaintiff had waived the fraud in suing on the contract, they should consider the allegations of fraud in the original complaint.

The defendant insists that a nonsuit should have been granted for the reason that plaintiff undertook to sue for the fraud without returning the notes. The notes did not operate as payment. If proving the notes as debts against the bankrupt does not operate as a bar to an action like this for fraud, certainly a failure to return them could not be so regarded. Indeed, section 57 of the bankrupt law requires notes to be filed with the proof of claim, so that they are ordinarily presumed to be in the hands of the officer of the court. If the notes had passed from the hands of the plaintiff, and ceased to be his property, so that he could not have them in court to return, as in Townsend, Arnold & Co. v. Stevenson & Walker, 4 Rich. Law, 59, this defense would be stronger. The rule invoked by defendant stands on the reason that the seller should not be allowed to have the sale annulled for fraud, while he held something received in the trade which might be of value to him or bring loss to the buyer. In this case the undisputed evidence was that the notes were in the hands of the plaintiff at the time of the trial. They could be of no value to the plaintiff, because, by pressing to judgment this suit to annul the sale, he has conclusively elected to repudiate them. The notes being overdue, an assignee of plaintiff would stand in no better position. Hence they were as absolutely destroyed as if they had been canceled and returned.

Having endeavored to consider all the positions taken by defendant in his exceptions, we are unable to discover any error in granting the motion to amend, or in refusing the motion for nonsuit, or in the charge to the jury.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

McKEOWN v. SOUTH CAROLINA & GEORGIA EXTENSION R. CO.

NONSUIT—ACCIDENT TO PERSON ON TRACK.

1. In an action to recover for the death of plaintiff's decedent by being struck by defendant's cars, where the evidence showed that he was hard of hearing, and was walking on a part of the track where pedestrians were accustomed to walk when he was struck by a freight train running at night without a headlight, nonsuit was improper.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Dantzler, Judge.

Action by John G. McKeown, administrator of J. W. McKeown, against the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company. From order of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wilson & Wilson, for appellant. C. P. Sanders, for respondent.

JONES, J. This action was brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful death of plaintiff's intestate, J. W. McKeown, through the negligence and wantonness of the defendant. This appeal is from a nonsuit.

The complaint alleged: "(4) That on the night of the 5th day of February, 1901, about 9:30 o'clock, the said J. W. McKeown was walking along the side of the track of defendant railroad between Yorkville and Sharon, in said county and state, and which, with the knowledge and acquiescence of defendant, had long been used by the public as a traveled way, when one of defendant's freight trains, going toward Sharon, and negligently running without any headlight on its engine, recklessly and negligently ran upon and against the said J. W. McKeown, knocking him down on the side of said track, and inflicting severe, but not necessarily fatal, injuries; and that, although the engineer and fireman running and operating said train for defendant at the time knew, or had good cause to know, or by proper care and inquiry would have known, that the said J. W. McKeown had been so struck and injured, they recklessly, wantonly, and negligently failed to stop said train and take care of him, but continued on their way. (5) That the said J. W. McKeown was hard of hearing, and so could not hear the approach of said train; but, if said engine had been supplied with the proper headlight, the reflection therefrom would have warned him of its approach, so that he could have avoided the same. (6) That the injury so inflicted upon the said J. W. McKeown would not have resulted in his death if said train had been stopped and proper care and attention had been given to him; but, owing to the recklessness and wanton negligence of the defendant, as aforesaid, the said J. W. McKeown was allowed, in said condition, to lie on the side of said track, in the wet and cold, for hours, without any aid or assistance, thereby causing his death."

The motion for nonsuit was based upon the following grounds: "(1) Because there is no evidence tending to show that the place where the deceased was killed was a street, highway crossing, or traveled place, but, on the contrary, the evidence shows that the place where the deceased was killed was on the track of the defendant at a point other than a street, highway, or traveled place, and where neither the public nor the deceased had a legal right to be. (2) Because there is no evidence tending to show that the deceased was seen, or might have been seen, by the engineer, or those in charge of the engine or train, even if there had been a headlight, or that the employees of the defendant company knew, or might have known, that the deceased was in a place of apparent danger, from which he could not have extricated himself. (3) Because there is no evidence tending to show that the employees of the company were guilty of any willfulness, wantonness, or of any such negligence or want of care, as would make the defendant liable for injuring or killing one who was using its tracks at a point where he had no legal right to be. (4) Because there is no evidence which tends to show any breach of duty by the defendant to the deceased, even assuming him to have been a licensee. (5) Because there is no evidence that deceased was killed by the defendant. (6) Because there is no evidence tending to show that the train could have been stopped in time to avoid injuring the deceased, even if it had been equipped with a headlight. (7) Because there is no evidence tending to show that the want of a headlight was the proximate cause of the injury."

Judge Dantzler, in his order of nonsuit, sustained the first, second, third, sixth, and seventh grounds, but overruled the fourth and fifth. The appellant alleges error in granting nonsuit on the grounds stated, and respondent has given proper notice that the court would be asked to sustain the nonsuit also upon the grounds overruled.

First, as to whether there was any evidence tending to show that deceased was killed by the defendant. In what we shall say hereafter we do not mean to express any opinion whatever as to the force or sufficiency of the evidence, but intend only to indicate our view as to whether there was any evidence tending to prove the allegations of the complaint, and which the jury should have been permitted to consider. There was testimony that on the night of February 5, 1901, between 10 and 11 o'clock, J. W. McKeown was found lying in a helpless condition on defendant's track between Yorkville and Sharon, in York county, by William Currence, who lived close by, and had for some time heard his cries before going to his assistance. This was after defendant's freight train had passed going from Yorkville towards Sharon, the interval not being definitely stated, but spoken of by the witness as "a good bit." The train left Yorkville that night and went towards Sharon without a headlight, and deceased, who was partially deaf, was probably going in the same direction, as he was last previously seen in Yorkville late that evening, and lived beyond Sharon. No one who testified saw the train strike deceased. After he was found on the track, there was much delay in securing sufficient help to remove him; but he was finally removed a short distance away, where he died about 1 o'clock that night. The physician who examined his body found a bad bruise on the right side about 12 inches broad, with congested blood under the skin, as if struck by a violent blow, and the physician stated that, in his opinion, the wound was such as could have been made by some portion of a train of cars projecting over the track and striking him. There was some evidence of impressions on the soil near by where he was found, indicating that he had staggered off from the track, was down upon his knees, and had dragged himself back to the place where he was found. This was sufficient to justify overruling the nonsuit on the fifth ground.

In sustaining the nonsuit the court gave as his reason that the evidence showed that the deceased, at the time of his alleged killing or injury, was a trespasser upon the track of the defendant company, and did not tend to show any wantonness, willfulness, or intentional disregard of the rights of the deceased by the defendant which rendered the defendant liable for such killing or injury. Assuming now that defendant's train struck deceased, the next inquiry should be whether there was any evidence tending to show that defendant thereby breached any duty which it owed the deceased. If deceased was a trespasser, defendant owed him the duty to do him no wanton injury. If he was a licensee, the defendant owed him the duty to exercise ordinary care not to injure him. But whether the deceased was a trespasser or a licensee, and whether the conduct of defendant was wanton or merely negligent, are questions of fact for the jury, if there is any testimony tending to establish the issue presented in that regard. It is only when the testimony is incapable of any inference in support of plaintiff's case that a nonsuit is allowable. The complaint alleged and the testimony tended to show that the path along the side of defendant's track, where plaintiff was struck, had long been used by the public as a place of travel, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the defendant. The testimony was to the effect that the path had been constantly used by the public, even more frequently by pedestrians than the public road near by, without the slightest objection by the defendant, and that the neighborhood was thickly settled. The circumstances were such as might, in the mind of the jury, indicate that the defendant, through its agents, knew of the use made by the public of the pathway, and by not objecting defendant indicated a willingness that it should be used by the public. Such evidence would not tend to show that the public had acquired a right of way by alienation or prescription, so as to give the public a legal right to use the pathway against the consent of the defendant, but it does tend to show circumstances which call for the exercise of ordinary care on the part of defendant. As stated by this court in Jones v. Railway Co., 61 S. C. 560, 39 S. E. 758: "Even though the use of the track by the public as a walkway was not for such length of time, nor of such character, as to give a legal right to so use the track, and even though the evidence fell short of showing any positive consent of such use by the company, yet, if there was evidence tending to show knowledge of and acquiescence in such use without protest, such evidence would tend to show that the railroad company had much reason to expect the presence of persons upon the track, who were there not as bald trespassers, but using it with the knowledge and acquiescence of the company. Under such circumstances it would be the duty of the railroad company to keep a reasonable lookout, or to give warning of the approach of the train, or generally to observe ordinary care under the circumstances to avoid injury." The case of Haltiwanger v. R. R. Co., 64 S. C. 24, 41 S. E. 810, is not entirely consistent with the rule stated in Jones v. Railway Co., but the recent case of Matthews v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 67 S. C. 501, 46 S. E. 335, is in accord therewith, and states the rule thus: "While a railroad company cannot lose its right of way by alienation or prescription because of the public interest in its holding it for public purposes, it may impose upon itself as a private corporation duties and obligations to the public or to individuals by inviting the use of the right of way, or indicating its willingness that it should be used by the public or particular individuals. In such circumstances the duty devolves on the railroad company to exercise ordinary care to avoid injury to those so using the right of way." The court erred in this case in not submitting to the jury to determine what was deceased's relation to the defendant's right of way, whether as trespasser or licensee, and in declaring that deceased was a trespasser. He further erred in not submitting to the jury the question whether defendant's conduct was negligent or reckless and wanton. The testimony was not only that defendant's train was being operated at night, without a headlight, along a track where there was reason to expect pedestrians to be, but that the operatives were conscious that it was negligent to be without a headlight, for at Yorkville they were aware of the failure of the headlight for want of oil, and there was some conversation among the operatives as to who was to blame for the failure to procure oil; and, although the train remained quite a while at Yorkville, and oil was readily procurable there, nevertheless they deliberately started out at night without a headlight. We mean, of course, that the testimony had tendency to show this state of facts. Was this reckless, or wanton, or negligent? The jury ought to have been permitted to say. Wantonness may be inferred from a conscious failure to observe due care. Watts v. R. R. Co., 60 S. C. 74, 38 S. E. 240. Whether the want of a headlight was a proximate cause of the injury, and whether the train could have been stopped in time to avoid injuring the deceased if there had been a headlight, were questions for the jury under instructions as to the law. There was testimony that a headlight would throw light so as to distinguish a man some 200 or 250 yards. Did the absence of the headlight prevent the engine and fireman from seeing the deceased in time to avoid injuring him? Would the presence of a headlight, by its reflections forward on the adjacent objects, have enabled deceased, though hard of hearing, to avoid the danger, notwithstanding his back was probably towards the engine? These were matters for the jury in determining, from all the circumstances, whether the absence of the headlight was a breach of any duty owing by defendant to deceased, and whether it was a proximate cause of the injury.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the case is remanded for a new trial.

WINDHAM et al. v. HOWELL et al.

PARTITION—EVIDENCE—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. Complainants in partition alleged ownership in fee. One defendant claimed title. There was evidence that there were three life tenants of the property. Held error to direct a verdict for defendant on the ground that the evidence did not sustain allegations as to the estate in fee, but partition should have been adjudged as between the life tenants.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Darlington County; Townsend, Judge.

Action by A. H. Windham and others against George O. Howell and others. From judgment on verdict directed for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Geo. W. Brown and R. W. Shand, for appellants. Woods & Macfarlan, J. Monroe Spears, and Stevenson & Matheson, for respondents.

JONES, J. This is an appeal from a judgment on a verdict directed by the court for the defendant on an issue of title raised by the answer to plaintiff's complaint for partition of real estate. The verdict was directed and the complaint dismissed on the ground that under the pleadings and evidence the plaintiffs had failed to sustain the allegation of their complaint as to title in fee simple to the land in dispute.

The complaint alleged a deed, dated December 14, 1867, from James Windham to Eliza J. Windham for life, and at her death to the children of her husband, Eli W. Windham (son of the grantor), for their lives, of a tract of land in Darlington county. It is also alleged that James Windham subsequently died, leaving a will devising this same tract of land to Eli W. Windham for life, and directed that at the death of the said Eli this land should be sold, and the proceeds equally divided between the lawful heirs of his body which he may leave living at his death; that Eli W. afterwards died, leaving living children—Mary Woodford, whose share is now owned by defendant George O. Howell; Eliza Troublefield, defendant, whose share is now owned by plaintiff A. H. Windham; Garen Yarborough, who is now dead, leaving husband and children named in the complaint; Lulu Windham, a plaintiff; and Louisiana Howell, a defendant. The complaint further alleged that Eliza J. Windham died in 1900, leaving surviving her three of the remaindermen for life provided for in said will, viz., Eliza Troublefield and two of the children of Eliza J. Windham, whose names are Louisiana Howell and Lulu Windham, and that said Eliza Troublefield has conveyed her interest and estate to A. H. Windham; that, by reason of the matters above stated, the said A. H. Windham, Lulu Windham, G. O. Howell, the heirs of Garen Yarborough, and Louisiana Howell are now owners in fee of the said tract of land, the life estate of A. H. Windham; one-seventh for the lifetime of Eliza Troublefield, of Lulu Windham of one-seventh for her lifetime, and of Louisiana Howell of one-seventh for her lifetime—having all merged in their greater fee-simple estates; that George O. Howell and his wife, Louisiana Howell, are in possession of the land, claiming under a deed from Eliza J. Windham, receiving rents and profits and committing waste. The complaint demanded injunction against waste, an accounting of rents and profits, and partition or sale. The defendants Howell and wife denied the main allegations of the complaint, and claimed ownership in fee in Louisiana Howell under the deed from James Windham to Eliza J. Windham, described in the complaint, and a deed from Eliza J. Windham to Louisiana Howell dated January 16, 1900.

The issue of title thus raised came on for trial before Judge Townsend and a jury. The plaintiffs offered evidence tending to establish all the allegations of fact in the complaint relevant to the issue of title. One of plaintiffs' witnesses did say that the tract described in the deed is larger than the tract described in the will, but this was inconsistent with the allegations in the complaint of the identity of the tracts described in the deed and will; and there being no testimony whatever to indicate to the court and jury the difference between the tracts, or means by which one could be distinguished from the other by the jury, and the matter not having been called to his attention, or pleadings amended, the court was warranted in assuming the identity of the tracts as alleged in the complaint. The deed conveyed the land "unto the said Eliza J. Windham forever, and at her death to her children, and also to John W. Windham, C. M. Windham, Mary E. Wadford, Eliza Troublefield, wife of Thomas Troublefield," etc.

The will devised the land as follows: "Item 1. I leave unto my son, Eli W. Windham, for his use and benefit during his life, a tract of land, more or less, embracing all the lower end of my home plantation to a cross fence near the big ditch, then in a direct line with said fence across the road down to the run of Sparrow Swamp. After his death said land shall be sold and the money equally divided between the lawful issue of his body which he may leave living at his death." The deed was executed about eight days before the will took effect, so that the will can only dispose of such estate of the testator as was not conveyed in the deed. Eliza J. Windham, life tenant under the deed, having died in 1900, plaintiff Lulu Windham and defendants Louisiana Howell and Eliza Troublefield became tenants for life under the deed. There was evidence of a deed by Eliza Troublefield conveying her interest to the plaintiff A. H. Windham. Here, then, we have before the court three tenants in common for life. That there may have been other parties before the court, not necessary to a partition between tenants in common for life, is of no consequence, as no objection has been made for defect of parties. Tenants in common for life may have partition—Civ. Code 1902, § 2436; Varn v. Varn, 32 S. C. 77, 10 S. E. 829; Jordan v. Neece, 36 S. C. 295, 15 S. E. 202, 31 Am. St. Rep. 869—unless some prior incumbrance by the grantor should prevent, as in Cannon v. Lomax, 29 S. C. 869, 7 S. E. 529, 1 L. R. A. 637, 13 Am. St. Rep. 739.

The verdict of the jury under the direction of the court, if permitted to stand, would operate to deprive plaintiffs A. H. Windham and Lulu Windham of all interests in the land, whereas there was uncontradicted evidence that they were tenants in common for life with the defendant Louisiana Howell, all parties claiming under the same deed. It is true that the complaint alleged, as a conclusion of law upon the facts stated, that plaintiffs had a fee-simple title to the land, but that could not operate to prevent a recovery of such possession as the facts alleged and proven warranted. Litigants may not get all they ask for, but may reasonably expect to receive what rightfully belongs to them under the case made.

As the foregoing conclusion will require a reversal of the decree of the circuit court, based upon an erroneous direction of verdict, we do not deem it important to discuss the other matters presented in argument. The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the cause remanded for trial of the issue of title as made by the pleadings.

CAMPBELL v. VIRGINIA-CAROLINA CHEMICAL CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 19, 1904.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CONTRACT—SUFFICIENT—TRUSTEE—SALE OF REALTY—INVESTMENT OF PROCEEDS.

1. Equity will enforce a contract for the sale of phosphate mineral rights in certain land.
2. Where, pending negotiations for the sale of certain phosphate rock in place, the evidence showed that there was no complete agreement, and that, when one of the parties thereto expressed his willingness to carry out the requirements proposed by the other party, it saw fit to terminate the negotiations, there was no such mutuality in the agreement as would authorize its specific performance.
3. Where a trustee of realty had full power to sell the same, his discretion as to the investment of the proceeds of the sale will not be interfered with, where it is not shown that the rights of the beneficiaries would be jeopardized, and the purchaser is not required to see that the proceeds are invested according to the trust.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Watts, Judge.

Suit by C. O. Campbell, trustee, against the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company and others. Decree for plaintiff, and the chemical company appeals. Reversed.

Mitchell & Smith, for appellant. Smythe, Lee & Frost, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for the specific performance of an alleged contract for the sale of the phosphate mineral rights in a certain tract of land. The circuit court rendered a decree in which it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to such performance of the contract.

The defendant appealed upon numerous exceptions, but his attorneys have grouped the questions presented by them as follows: "(1) Has the would-be purchaser of real property held in trust the right to demand that the proceeds of sale be reinvested under the same trusts as directed by the trust deed? (2) Was any explicit written contract of sale in this case entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company such as would be valid under the statute of frauds? (3) Under the circumstances of this case, was the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company guilty of such wrongful action as a court of equity would decree a specific performance? (4) Is not the present a case in which the plaintiff had a complete and adequate remedy at law, and therefore equity would refuse its aid in decreeing a specific performance?"

As No. 4 of the foregoing questions is jurisdictional in its nature, it will be first disposed of. It is only necessary to refer to the case of Hammond v. Foreman, 48 S. C. 175, 28 S. E. 212, to show that the court, in the exercise of its chancery powers, had jurisdiction to decree specific performance of the contract.

The next question in regular order to be considered is whether the alleged agreement was obnoxious to the statute of frauds. Prior to the 7th of December, 1899, there had been some negotiations between the plaintiff and the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, through W. B. Chisolm, its general manager, with regard to the sale of the phosphate rock, in place, in the premises described in the complaint, and known as "Lilliput Farm." On that day C. O. Campbell wrote to W. B. Chisolm as follows: "I will take $2,500 for the phosphate rock on the 'Lilliput' farm, adjoining the 'Vineyard' lands, on which you are now mining." The plaintiff also introduced in evidence other correspondence, which must be considered in connection with the foregoing letter, as it throws light upon the question whether the letter dated 7th December, 1899, was in response to an absolute and unconditional offer on the part of the appellant. W. B. Chisolm on the 8th December, 1899, wrote to the plaintiff: "I will have our Mr. Pendarvis examine the property and advise you later." In a letter to W. B. Chisolm dated 4th January, 1900, the plaintiff wrote: "At your earliest convenience please advise me if Mr. Pendarvis' examination has been satisfactory or not. My foreman from the farm writes me that he has laid out lines for a railroad across one of the fields, and wishes to know if he must remove the fencing. I wrote him to do what Mr. Pendarvis requested, but cannot instruct him further until I hear from you." On 6th January, 1900, W. B. Chisolm wrote: "As soon as I can take up the matter with Mr. Pendarvis, I will advise you." In a letter dated 12th February, 1900, the plaintiff said: "I delivered the papers relating to the farm on Ashley River to Mr. H. A. M. Smith, of Messrs. Mitchell & Smith, as requested by you, but have heard nothing from them. You were so busy on our last interview that I hastened off without stating what I expected in the sale of the rock. It is a limit of five years for its mining. Kindly have this time limit incorporated in the contract." W. B. Chisolm replied 12th February, 1900: "I note that you want a limit of five years for this mining inserted in this paper. This we are not willing to do at all. There were no specifications and no limit whatever as to time of our taking it. We would not touch it at any price if we were compelled to take it out in five years. The price we agreed to pay you for this rock was, as you know, far greater than the whole property was worth. There is no mention in the letter written us by you of anything pertaining to this subject. I will have Mr. Smith, as soon as he can, draw up these papers in conformity with our agreement." C. O. Campbell, on the 14th of February, replied: "I regret to note the illiberal view you take of our transaction in your letter of the 12th instant. I told you I would sell the rock on the farm at your offer of $2,500. After examination you have notified me you accept. If five years be too short a time for mining the rock, I am willing to be perfectly fair and give eight years." W. B. Chisolm wrote February 19, 1900: "You had better come to Charleston and see me with reference to this matter." On the 30th of March, 1900, the appellant's attorneys wrote the plaintiff: "You could either go into court, and get authority from the court to make the sale to you, in which case we should have nothing to do with the reimbursement of the proceeds of sale, or you could sell under the power of sale; but, in that case, we would be compelled to see that the proceeds of this sale were reinvested, subject to the terms of the original trust. It is impossible for Mr. Chisolm to arrange any transfer so as to eliminate these requirements, and unless you can comply with them, he will be unable to carry out the purchase." The plaintiff denied the right of the appellant to insist upon these requirements, and refused to comply with them, whereupon the appellant's attorneys, on the 25th of April, 1900, wrote to the attorneys of the respondent that the transaction was at an end. On the same day the plaintiff's attorneys wrote to the appellant's attorneys that the plaintiff was willing to carry into effect their requirements as to title, but the appellant's attorneys declined the proposition. The correspondence subsequent to the letter of the 7th December, 1899, was inconsistent with the theory that it was written in reply to an absolute and unconditional offer by the appellant to purchase the rock at the price of $2,500, for, immediately after it was received, W. B. Chisolm wrote to the plaintiff that he would have an examination of the property made, and advise him later, and the plaintiff recognized this right. Then, again, the plaintiff insisted upon a time limit for the removal of the phosphate rock, but the appellant refused to consent to it. During the pendency of the negotiations either party had the right to insist upon whatever conditions he saw fit, and the agreement could not be considered as a complete contract until the proposed conditions were assented to by the opposite party. Before the plaintiff signified his willingness to carry out the requirements proposed by the appellant, it saw fit to terminate the negotiations, which it had the right to do. The testimony convinces us that the minds of the parties did not meet, and that the agreement was lacking in mutuality. The plaintiff therefore is not entitled to specific performance of the contract.

These views render speculative the question whether the appellant had the right to demand that the proceeds of sale be reinvested under the same trusts as directed by the trust deed. However, as the question fairly arises upon the record, we will not decline to consider it. The attorneys for the appellant have not cited any authority from this state sustaining their contention. His honor the circuit judge cited the following cases to show that such right does not exist: Webb v. Chisolm, 24 S. C. 490; Price v. Krasnoff, 60 S. C. 172, 38 S. E. 413; Redheimer v. Pyron, Speers, Eq. 134; Laurens v. Lucas, 6 Rich. Eq. 217; Jones v. Hudson, 23 S. C. 494—to which may be added Lining v. Peyton, 2 Desaus. 375. The reason that the purchaser has no such right is that it would limit the time within which the trustee should make the reinvestment, whereas, if he was allowed to exercise his full discretion, he might be able to make an investment far more advantageous to the rights of the cestui que trustent. It would, furthermore, hamper his discretion as to the kind of property in which he might desire to reinvest. If the person creating the trust confer upon the trustees full power of sale, the court will not interfere with his discretion unless it is made to appear that there is fraud, or the rights of the cestui que trustent are otherwise jeopardized.

REID v. COURTENAY MFG. CO.

EASEMENT—INJURIES TO GRANTOR—RIGHT TO DAMAGES—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. Plaintiff, who had given defendant a right to overflow a portion of certain land or maintain a dam of a certain height thereon, cannot recover for injuries received from the proper use of such right.

2. It is proper to direct a verdict where there is no dispute as to the facts, and the only matter at issue is the construction of the deed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Oconee County.

Action by James T. Reid against the Courtenay Manufacturing Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Boggs and Stribling & Herndon, for appellant. Jaynes & Shelor, for respondent.

JONES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by him by reason of defendant's erection and maintenance of a dam across Little river, in Oconee county, which caused the water to back and overflow his bottom lands above on Cane creek, a tributary of Little river. The defendant, by way of defense, sets up an easement by grant of plaintiff. At conclusion of the testimony, on motion of defendant, the court, Judge Purdy presiding, directed a verdict in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff appealed from the judgment entered on three exceptions, the first of which was abandoned. The questions raised are (1) whether the court erred in construing the grants under which defendant claimed license or easement to overflow plaintiff's land; (2) whether he erred in not submitting the case to the jury.

It appeared in evidence that on June 30, 1890, in view of John C. Cary's purpose to procure the erection of a cotton mill on Little river, and in contemplation that the obstruction in said stream by a dam across would affect the lands of plaintiff, the plaintiff granted "unto John C. Cary, his heirs and assigns, the full power and privilege to make such obstruction in Cane Creek and Little River by building a dam or dams across the same for the purpose above named to any height he or his assigns may desire, provided that the said dam or dams may not raise the water higher or above the top end of a perpendicular iron pin which is permanently stationed in a large rock at the water's edge on the east side of Little River and a short distance below the mouth of Cane Creek." This deed was duly executed and delivered, under seal, in the presence of two witnesses. On June 1, 1893, John C. Cary duly executed a deed conveying to the Courtenay Manufacturing Company "all those easements, rights, powers and privileges granted to said John C. Cary . . . by James T. Reid by deed dated June 30th, 1890, and recorded in O. 9; said easements, rights, powers and privileges consisting in making such obstructions in Cane Creek and Little River by building a dam or dams across the same for manufacturing purposes to any height which does not raise the water higher than or above the top of a perpendicular pin which is permanently stationed in a large rock at the water's edge on the east side of Little River and at a short distance below the mouth of Cane Creek." Thereafter a controversy arose between plaintiff and defendant which ended in the execution of the following instrument:

"State of South Carolina, County of Oconee.

"Whereas, The Courtenay Manufacturing Company has erected a dam across Little River, in Oconee County, State of South Carolina, and has built a cotton factory which is now being operated at Newry, in said county and State; and, whereas, the obstruction of the flow of the water in the stream known as Little River, has caused to be overflowed and injured a portion of the land which I, James T. Reid, now own, situate, lying and being on the north side of Cane Creek, waters of Little River, waters of Keowee River, adjoining lands formerly owned by Jesse McMahan, J. L. Boyd and others, being the place whereon I now reside, containing five hundred acres, more or less, to wit: about twelve acres of creek bottom land lying on Cane Creek aforesaid; and, whereas, the Courtenay Manufacturing Company and I, James T. Reid, have agreed upon the amount of damage to said land to be fifteen dollars per acre for twelve acres, aggregating the sum of one hundred and eighty dollars, which the said Courtenay Manufacturing Company has this day paid me, the said James T. Reid (the receipt whereof I hereby acknowledge).

"Now, therefore, know all men by these presents, that I, James T. Reid, in consideration of the premises and the said sum of one hundred and eighty dollars to me in hand paid, by the said the Courtenay Manufacturing Company, have granted, bargained, sold and released, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell and release unto the said the Courtenay Manufacturing Company, its successors and assigns, the right to overflow and back water upon the said twelve acres, situate, lying and being on Cane Creek, waters of Little River, the said twelve acres being the lower portion of the creek bottom land on the tract above described, and situate nearest the dam aforesaid.

"Together with the full power and privilege to maintain and keep the dam of the said the Courtenay Manufacturing Company at its present height across Little River aforesaid for the purpose of operating its cotton mills and other machinery as it and its successors and assigns may deem advisable. And I, the said James T. Reid, do hereby bind myself, my heirs, executors and administrators, to warrant and forever defend the aforesaid power and privilege unto the said the Courtenay Manufacturing Company, its successors and assigns.

"In witness thereof, I, the said James T. Reid, have set my hand and seal, this 23d day of December, A. D. 1897.

"[Signed] James T. Reid. [L. S.]

"Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of J. D. McMahan, St. John Courtenay."

The court correctly construed this deed as not only granting the right to overflow and back water upon the 12 acres named, but also granting the additional right to maintain the same across Little river at the height of the dam as it existed on December 23, 1897. The construction contended for by appellant, viz., that the deed only gave the right to overflow the 12 acres, would require that the sentence beginning with the words "Together with" should be in effect stricken from the deed, which would violate the plainest rules of construction. The testimony was undisputed that there had been no change in the height of the dam since December 23, 1897. Under these circumstances the court committed no error in directing a verdict for the defendant. There was no evidence even that defendant's backwater had overflowed more than the 12 acres mentioned, although there was evidence that a larger portion of contiguous bottom land had been rendered unfit for cultivation. When one grants an easement to overflow a portion of a described tract of land, or when one grants a right to maintain a dam at a specified height, he cannot claim damages for injury resulting naturally and necessarily from the proper use of the easement. Lynn v. Thomson, 17 S. C. 188. See, also, Nunnamaker v. Water Power Co., 47 S. C. 485, 25 S. E. 751, 34 L. R. A. 222, 58 Am. St. Rep. 905, where the same general principle was stated and applied in a case where the right to erect and maintain a dam at a specified height was acquired by a statute under eminent domain for the purpose of constructing a canal.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

KENNINGTON et al. v. CATOE et al.

LEGITIMACY—CHASTITY OF WIFE—EVIDENCE—WITNESS—IMPEACHMENT—TRIAL—
NEW TRIAL.

1. Where the issue is as to the legitimacy of a child born during coverture, evidence as to the chastity of the wife before marriage and after the child's birth is incompetent.

2. Reputation of the wife as to chastity before and at the time of the marriage is properly excluded as hearsay.

3. Question attacking character for chastity of witness on cross-examination, for purpose of discrediting her, is properly excluded.

4. Under Cir. Ct. Rule 59, defendant has the right to open and reply only where he admits the plaintiff's cause by the pleadings, and takes upon himself the burden of proof.

5. Prior to the passage of Civ. Code, § 2864, on December 12, 1879, a colored child born after emancipation of a free colored woman married to a white man would take property under the will of the husband, as a child.

6. A new trial for newly-discovered evidence will not be granted where the party moving for the same knew of such evidence after the close of his testimony, but before the close of the other side, but made no effort to introduce it.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Dantzler, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Kennington and others against Eddie Catoe and others. From a judgment for defendant Dell McManus, plaintiffs and other defendants appeal. Reversed.

R. E. & R. B. Allison, for appellants. R. E. Wylie, for respondent.

JONES, J. This action was brought to partition land in Lancaster county, on the theory that plaintiffs and defendants, other than Dell McManus, were heirs at law of Rily Catoe, deceased, and as such were the sole owners of the land, as a lapsed devise, and that Dell McManus, who was claiming the land, had no interest therein. Rily Catoe had devised the land to his son Minor Catoe for life, and after his death among such of his children as he may leave surviving him. The complaint alleges that Minor Catoe died unmarried and leaving no children. Dell Catoe answered, asserting that he was improperly styled Dell McManus in the complaint, and that his true name was Dell Catoe; that he was the only child of Minor Catoe, deceased; and that, as such, the land belonged exclusively to him. The main contest on the trial was whether Dell Catoe was a legitimate son of Minor Catoe. The case was tried before Judge Dantzler and a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of Dell Catoe for the land in dispute.

The exceptions from 1 to 9, inclusive, impute error in the rulings of the court as to the admissibility of testimony.

1. In behalf of Dell Catoe, testimony was offered to show that about the year 1870 Minor Catoe was married to Ann McManus, in the presence of several witnesses, in Lancaster county, S. C., by the Reverend Nathan Falle, a reputable Baptist minister; that they lived together as man and wife for a short time, when Minor Catoe left her; and that said Ann gave birth to Dell Catoe 11 months, or a little over, after the said marriage. The court permitted appellant's counsel to assail the legitimacy of Dell Catoe by showing the reputation of Ann for chastity and her unchaste conduct with other men from the time of the alleged marriage to the birth of Dell Catoe; but appellant's counsel sought to go further, and show such reputation and conduct before her marriage, and after the birth of Dell Catoe, which the court excluded. This ruling, as applied to several witnesses, is the basis of the first, second, third, fifth, sixth, and seventh exceptions. We think the testimony was properly excluded, as it had no tendency to show that Minor Catoe was not the father of Dell Catoe. A child born during coverture is presumed to be legitimate. This presumption is rebuttable, but, as declared in Wilson v. Babb, 18 S. C. 69: "Where a child is born after lawful wedlock, and after the lapse of the usual period of gestation, it should require a very strong state of circumstances to overthrow the presumption of legitimacy—such as impossibility of access, absolute nonaccess, abandonment, or something equally as conclusive." Therefore, in order to render testimony admissible to overthrow such presumption, it should have tendency in a reasonable mind to establish some such conclusive circumstance. It is manifest that mere reputation of the wife for unchastity, especially when such reputation was before marriage, or after birth of the child, would have no such tendency; nor would her unchaste conduct with reference to other men have such tendency, unless it related closely to the period when the child was begotten. We have assumed in this that there was a lawful marriage, and birth of Dell Catoe 11 months thereafter. The fact of the marriage was not contested in evidence. There was some evidence tending to show that Minor Catoe was not mentally capable of contracting matrimony, but this issue was not submitted to the jury, and we must assume it was found against the appellant by the verdict of the jury. Nor was there any conflict in the testimony as to the time when Dell Catoe was born. Hence, in determining the admissibility of this testimony, we have treated the case as one in which the testimony was offered to show adulterine bastardy.

2. The eighth exception alleges error in refusing to allow the witness Joseph Kennington to testify as to the reputation of Ann McManus for lewdness between the dates of the alleged marriage and alleged birth of Dell Catoe. The record shows, as has already been stated, that counsel was permitted to ask as to the general reputation of Ann McManus for chastity between said marriage and said birth. The court simply refused to allow the same question to be repeated by merely substituting the word "lewdness" for the word "chastity," and in this there was no prejudicial error.

3. The ninth exception imputes error in refusing to allow witness Kennington to testify that it was the general report that Ann McManus had a child a short time after her alleged marriage to Minor Catoe, and before the birth of Dell Catoe, and it was the general reputation that she was pregnant when she married Minor Catoe. The testimony was properly excluded. It does not fall within any of the exceptions rendering hearsay testimony competent.

4. There was no error, as alleged in the fourth exception, in refusing to allow appellant's counsel, on cross-examination of Laura McManus, to ask her how many children she had, and whether white or black, she having had no husband—the object being to discredit the witness. The general rule permits a witness to be cross-examined by questions which tend to test his accuracy, veracity, or credibility, or to shake his credit by injuring his character, but the extent of such cross-examination is very largely left to the discretion of the court (State v. Williamson, 65 S. C. 247, 43 S. E. 671), and we see no reason for interfering with the court's exercise of discretion in this instance.

5. The tenth, eleventh, and fourteenth exceptions allege error in the ruling of the court in denying plaintiffs the right of reply both in evidence and argument. The cases of Addison v. Duncan, 35 S. C. 171, 14 S. E. 305; Beckham v. Railway Co., 50 S. C. 36, 27 S. E. 611; Thompson v. Insurance Co., 63 S. C. 290, 41 S. E. 464—show that defendant acquires the right to open and reply when by his pleadings he admits the plaintiff's cause of action as stated in the complaint, and relies solely upon an affirmative defense based upon the facts stated in the answer, so that, if no evidence is adduced on either side, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict on the pleadings. The fourth paragraph of the complaint alleged that Minor Catoe died unmarried and leaving no children. This was denied by the answer. The fact alleged was essential to plaintiffs' cause of action, and the denial raised the real issue in the case. Had it been admitted by the answer, plaintiffs would have been entitled to a judgment on the pleadings. Under rule 59, Cir. Ct., the defendant has right to open and reply only "where he admits the plaintiffs' cause by the pleadings and takes upon himself the burden of proof." The plaintiffs, as matter of fact, opened the case by offering testimony, and, at the close of plaintiffs' testimony in chief, respondent moved for a nonsuit, which was declined. It is true that counsel for respondent, after swearing a witness, did state that he assumed the burden of proving affirmatively the marriage of Minor Catoe, and that defendant Dell Catoe was the only issue of such marriage, but the declaration could in no wise alter the status fixed by the pleadings. The ruling of the court in allowing respondent to reply in evidence and argument deprived plaintiffs of a substantial right, material to their case, and thereby necessarily affected the judgment. Bennett v. Sandifer, 15 S. C. 420.

6. The fifteenth exception alleges error in charging the jury that before the year 1879 a white man had a right to marry a negro free-woman. The statute entitled "An act to prevent and punish the intermarriage of races," and now section 2664, Civ. Code, was approved December 12, 1879. At the time of the alleged marriage, about 1870, there was no law in this state making it illegal. It is argued under this exception that Dell Catoe, being a negro, could not take as remainderman under the devise in the will of Rily Catoe, which went into effect in 1867, previous to the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution, adopted in March, 1868; that such an amendment could not, in the absence of an express provision, reach back of 1868, and clothe a negro with a right to claim and accept a devise made in 1867. This question does not appear to have been presented to the circuit court, but we fail to see the merit of the contention. According to the undisputed evidence, Dell Catoe was never a slave, but was born after slavery ceased to exist in this country; and his mother, though a mulatto, was born free, of free parents. Even if Dell Catoe had been born during slavery times, his status then as a free person of color would have enabled him, under the laws of this state, to take property under a will or deed. Bowers v. Newman, 2 McMul. 486; State v. Hill, 2 Speers, 159.

7. It remains only to consider the twelfth exception, assigning error in the refusal of the motion for a new trial based upon the ground of after-discovered evidence. The alleged after-discovered evidence consisted of the record in the case of Ann Catoe, plaintiff, against Minor Catoe, defendant, on file in the office of the clerk of court for Lancaster county; being a proceeding for divorce on the ground of desertion. The "case" shows the following extracts from said record: Ann Catoe, in her complaint, alleges "that on the — day of October, A. D. 1870, she was married to the defendant; * * * that the defendant lived with the plaintiff at her father's house in said county for about one week after the time of said marriage, and then willfully deserted her without cause, and has never since lived with her, nor rendered her any support or pecuniary aid whatever, and the plaintiff has reason to believe that the defendant has, since his desertion of her, been guilty of adultery with other women, * * * whereupon the plaintiff demands judgment that the bonds of matrimony between herself and the said Minor Catoe, defendant, be dissolved." Minor Catoe, in his answer, says "that he married the plaintiff at or about the time stated in her complaint, and deserted her a short time after, as she alleges; that he married her when he was hardly conscious of what he was doing, being under the influence of liquor; and that after reflection he concluded that he could not live with her, and it would be best for both parties that they should separate. He admits that he has not rendered her any support, and assigns as reason therefor that he never intended to live with her again, and has never had any means with which to support her." Complaint and answer both verified. Extracts from testimony before Referee Billings: John C. Catoe, sworn, among other things testified: "Was not at the marriage [ceremony], but he knows about the time they were married. It was in the fall of the year 1870. Can't remember the particular day or month, but remembers the circumstances very well. Witness was living in the same house with the defendant at the time of the marriage. Witness says the defendant was absent a short time after he was married; living, he supposed, with his wife. Can't state positively the length of time, but thinks it was only about three days. He then came back where he was living before the marriage, and has never lived with her since." Laura McManus sworn: "Witness says she is a sister of the plaintiff. She was present at the time of the marriage of the plaintiff and the defendant. It took place in the public road, near Mr. Nathan Falle's house, and Rev. Mr. Nathan Falle performed the marriage ceremony. * * * After the marriage, plaintiff and defendant went to father's house. They lived together about a week, and then defendant left, and they have never lived together since. The defendant has no property or means to support a family." Referee made his report on these facts, and the circuit court made a decree thereupon, and adjudged the marriage wholly null and void from the date of this decree, upon the grounds of desertion, and ordered the defendant to pay the costs. Decree dated February 6, 1875. No mention is made anywhere in this record of any child or children. The record and the information contained would doubtless have been material, not only with reference to the alleged marriage between Minor Catoe and Ann McManus, but with reference to the question whether Minor Catoe was the father of Dell Catoe, in view of the statement in the record that Minor Catoe deserted Ann about one week after the marriage, and the testimony on the trial that Dell Catoe was born 11 months after the marriage. But by the affidavits before the court on this motion, it appeared that counsel for appellant became informed of this record after he had closed his testimony, but before respondent had closed his testimony in reply, and had debated in his mind the propriety of requesting that such record be put in evidence, but had decided not to do so, as it cut both ways. Under these circumstances, we do not think the circuit court committed error in refusing the motion. But for the error in denying appellant the right to open and reply in evidence and argument, there must be a new trial.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the case is remanded for a new trial.

NELSON v. GEORGIA, C. & N. RY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 19, 1904.)

EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. In an action to recover for injuries to a passenger, declarations of the conductor immediately after the accident were not part of the res gestæ.

2. An instruction that the contribution to the injury which will defeat recovery is not a vague and remote contribution, but must have some bearing upon the act that was charged to have caused the injury, and must be a contribution to the particular act alleged to have caused the injury, and a direct and proximate contribution to that act, is sufficient.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; Buchanan, Judge.

Action by Jas. F. Nelson against the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. R. Richey and F. P. McGowan, for appellant. J. J. Glenn and N. B. Dial, for respondent.

JONES, J. This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff through the negligence of the defendant, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendant. Plaintiff's appeal involves two questions:

1. Whether the court erred in excluding the declarations of F. H. Harold, the conductor, made after the collision in which plaintiff was injured; it being claimed that such declarations were admissible as part of the res gestæ, and as the statement of the representative of the defendant company within the scope of his agency.

In order to show precisely how the question arose, and the exact ruling of the circuit court, we quote from the "case" as follows: "Q. Was the conductor there? A. Yes, sir; he came down there and asked me was anybody hurt. The mail agent was knocked down, and I told him I had a lick over the head and was mashed in the stomach, but I did not know that it amounted to very much. It hurt me all the evening. Q. What were these cars shoved with? What was attached to them? A. The engine. Q. Was the engine attached to them when they struck the mail car? A. I declare, I do not know. All I know is what the conductor said. Mr. Glenn: We object to that. Mr. Richey: I think that he can tell what the conductor said. That is a part of the res gestæ. Mr. Glenn: I understand you to say that the conductor told you afterwards? A. I was down there, and he came there right after the accident. Mr. Richey: The conductor, may it please your honor, was there representing the master, and it was just the same as the railroad company itself speaking through the conductor. What he said there, I think, is perfectly competent to come in. Mr. Glenn: In the first place, your honor, it depends entirely upon what they were talking about. He certainly would not have the right to bind the company for matters that did not come within his business. He is not the general agent of the company. In fact, I do not understand that he has proven yet the extent of his authority, or anything of the kind. Mr. Richey: Who was the conductor in charge of the train? A. It was his first trip. He was down there the first time I ever seen him. Harold. I don't know for certain that was his name. Q. You have been connected with the railroad some time? A. Yes, sir. Q. What is the duty of the conductor? A. Running the train. Q. Who has supervision over the hands and engineer? A. The conductor. Q. Now, what was it the conductor said when he came down there to the mail car after the accident? Mr. Glenn: We object. The Court: I do not know what the answer will be. Did the conductor speak to you in reference to the accident? A. Yes, sir; he did. Mr. Richey: We can now ask him what he said. The Court: It is owing to what he said. If he was the master, and gave orders, he can state what order he gave him, but he cannot recite any words as to how it happened, in his opinion. Mr. Richey: I did not ask him how it happened. The Court: You know what his answer is going

"o be. I don't. This is your witness, and you are supposed to know what you are going to prove by him. Mr. Richey: What did the conductor say in reference to that accident? Mr. Glenn: We object to that. The Court: The objection is sustained, so far as the court is now advised by the evidence now in."

With respect to the question whether the declaration was admissible as res gestæ, it will be noticed that the declaration was made after the collision, although doubtless a very short time after. This subject has been fully discussed in the recent case of State v. McDaniel, 47 S. E. 384, and reference may be had to that case for the rule governing the admissibility of declarations not strictly concurrent with the litigated transaction. Under the rule there stated, we do not think the circuit court committed reversible error. The case of Crawford v. Railway Co., 56 S. O. 144, 84 S. E. 80, was quite different from this, for in that case the question was whether cattle had been negligently injured in transportation, and the declaration, "He would kill those d—n cattle before he got to Charlotte," was made by the person intrusted with the duty of running the train which carried the cattle while the train was being loaded with the cattle. With respect to the question whether the declaration was admissible because made by defendant's agent within the scope of his agency—on this point the court was careful to advise plaintiff's counsel that the witness could give the conductor's declarations as to orders by him, but that declarations of the conductor as to how the accident happened, in the opinion of the conductor, were not admissible. The conductor was not shown to have been operating the cars which brought about the collision, except through orders, and it is clear that the hearsay opinion of the conductor as to how the collision occurred was inadmissible. Even after the suggestion of the court, counsel failed to show the court that the proposed declarations were within the scope of the conductor's agency. The ruling was not erroneous.

2. The second question relates to the charge as to contributory negligence, the exception being as follows: "Because his honor erred in charging defendant's fourth request, which was as follows: '(4) Even if the defendant was guilty of negligence, and the plaintiff was injured thereby, yet, if the plaintiff by his own negligence contributed to his injuries, he cannot recover. The plaintiff must be free from fault himself.' The error being the omission from the proposition of the requisite that contributory negligence must be a direct and proximate cause to the injury, and without which the injury would not have happened." A reference to the "case" shows that the court did not charge the fourth request unqualifiedly, for in response to the request the court said: "I have already charged you that it must be a direct contribution. It must be a contribution to the particular act that caused the injury—must be that particular transaction charged in the complaint." The charge was full and clear on this point, as the following language of the court shows: "Now, the law says with reference to contributory negligence, notwithstanding the fact somebody else was guilty of negligence, yet if you contributed to it; but it is not a vague and remote contribution that robs one of his rights to recover, because in contributory negligence the contribution must be direct and proximate, and must have some bearing upon the act that was charged caused the injury, and it must be in that particular respect—must be a contribution to the particular act alleged to have caused the injury, not about something else, not in relation to some other transaction, but must be a direct and proximate contribution to that particular act of negligence done by a person who was charged to have been the author of the wrong." The exception is therefore without foundation.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

DAVIS v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 19, 1904.)

RAILROADS — KILLING STOCK — EVIDENCE — NEW TRIAL.

1. That a railroad company failed to give the statutory signals at crossings may be shown to establish negligence on the part of such company.

2. A lookout for stock on the track must be kept by the engineer even in counties where stock is not allowed to run at large.

3. Where the record shows that there was some testimony on each of the points in issue, a refusal of a new trial for insufficiency of the evidence will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Klugh, Judge.

Action by Andrew J. Davis against the Southern Railway Company. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The charge of the presiding judge is as follows:

"The plaintiff, Andrew J. Davis, brings this suit against the Southern Railway Company to recover damages which he alleges he has suffered by reason of the railroad having killed a mule of his, as he alleges, through negligence. He alleges that the railroad running its train from Columbia to Charlotte negligently ran over and against a certain mule, the property of the plaintiff, and killed the same, to the damage of plaintiff $150. The railroad answers that complaint with a general denial—denies everything set forth in the complaint—which puts upon the plaintiff the burden of proof, to prove by the preponderance of the evidence the facts he alleges, in order to entitle him to recover; and if he fails to prove them by the preponderance of the evidence then he is not entitled to recover. The railroad is charged with negligence, and negligence means the failure of a person—of a railroad company, for example—to do that which, under the circumstances of the situation, a railroad company of ordinary prudence would do, or the omission to do what a railroad company of ordinary prudence would not omit to do. So negligence means either a failure—the commission, the doing of something a prudent person would not do, or the omission to do something that a prudent person would do. It is the failure to exercise due care in any particular situation or set of circumstances.

"Now, where it appears that a railroad has, by its train, killed stock, a domestic animal, as a cow or a mule, and no other fact appears in reference to it, the law raises the presumption that the railroad was negligent. An animal has not the intelligence to apprehend danger, and to take itself out of the way of apprehended danger. As a matter of course, animals do run from what they are afraid of, but they have not the intelligence that a human being has to know what always to be afraid of and what to get out of the way of; and so the law charges these railroad companies running their trains, by the exercise of the franchise which the statute confers upon them, with the duty of looking out for the safety of domestic animals; and therefore, where it appears that the railroad, by its train, has killed a domestic animal, and nothing else appears but the fact of the killing, then the law raises the presumption that it was the result of negligence on the part of the railroad company. As a matter of course, when the facts do appear, and they negative the idea of negligence, and they show the railroad was exercising ordinary care in running its train, so that it was not the fault or its lack of care that caused the death of the animal or injury to the animal, then the implication of the presumption of negligence is withdrawn. This must appear by the facts of the case. Unless the evidence makes out, by the preponderance of the evidence, the fact of negligence in the railroad company, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. So the facts are for your determination as to whether or not this railroad was running its train as alleged in the complaint, and whether or not the train killed the mule, as alleged, and, if so, then whether the railroad was negligent or not.

"It is the law, and therefore appears, and it may be taken notice of by the court and by you, that the general stock law is of force in Richland county; a provision of which requires the owner of stock to keep his stock fenced, not to allow them to run at large. Now, in a county where the stock law is of force everybody has the right to presume—the railroad company has the same right anybody else would have—the right to presume that people are obeying the law, are keeping their stock fenced; and therefore the railroad is not bound to exercise as great care or vigilance in looking out and watching for stock on its track in a county where the stock law is of force as they would be where the law allows stock to run at large. That does not excuse a railroad if it knows, as a matter of fact, or if it ought to know, if it has the opportunity to know, and where a person of ordinary intelligence and ordinary observation would know, that stock were out at large—that does not excuse a railroad company for killing or injuring stock where the stock law is of force, if it knows or ought to know that stock is at large. It is true that the law is to the effect that a trespasser has no rights as against the owner of the property on which he is trespassing, except he has the right not to be willfully or wantonly injured by the owner of the property, and to some extent that might apply to trespassing stock; but it cannot apply to animals in the same sense that it applies to people, for the very reason I mentioned a moment ago—animals have not the intelligence of people—and therefore they cannot be held to the same rule of accountability or liability and the same rule of duty that intelligent beings are held to. So that a railroad has no right to wantonly or willfully injure trespassing stock; neither has it the right to injure trespassing stock through negligence. The rule is only modified by the stock law to the extent that the railroad is not bound to keep the same degree of watchful care, watchfulness for stock on its track, where the stock law is in force, as where the stock law is not in force. Where stock is on the track in a county where the stock law is not in force, and the railroad sees them, or has the opportunity and ought to see them by the exercise of ordinary watchfulness, then, if it fails to see, or if, seeing them, injures them through willful, wanton negligence, the railroad is liable for damages. So, in this case, if you find they were at large in violation of the provisions of the general stock law, and should find that the railroad company, by the exercise of ordinary vigilance—which means a less degree of vigilance in a stock law county than in a nonstock law county—if the railroad, by the exercise of vigilance, which a prudent railroad in a stock law county out to exercise, knew or could have known that stock was on the track, then the railroad was bound to exercise due care, the care of a prudent railroad to prevent injury to the stock; and if you find that it failed to exercise that degree of care, and that the stock was injured by reason of such failure, then the railroad is liable. If the evidence fails to make out those facts, the railroad then is not liable.

"If you conclude that the defendant is liable in this case, your verdict will be in favor of the plaintiff whatever you find to be the actual value of the mule at the time it was killed. As a matter of course, if you find that the railroad is not liable, your verdict should be in favor of the defendant. You will elect one of your number to act as foreman, and write the verdict on the complaint.

"Both the plaintiff and defendant have requested the court to charge certain propositions as law, which I will proceed to give you.

"On behalf of the railroad:

"(1) At a place where the general stock, which prohibits cattle from being permitted to roam at large, is then of force, a railroad company is not required to use the same care or caution in running its trains as in localities where such law is not of force.' That I charge you, subject to what I have already given you in reference to the effect of the stock law. The stock law does not relieve the railroad from the necessity of the duty of exercising ordinary care, but merely relaxes the degree of vigilance which it is required to exercise. In that sense I charge you that.

"(2) I charge you that the general stock law was in force in Richland county at the time of the alleged accident, and the defendant railroad company was not, therefore, required to use the same care and caution in running its trains as in localities where such stock law is not of force.' I have already charged you that, and so charge you.

"(3) A railroad company is not liable for stock accidentally killed.' I charge you that. If you find from the evidence in this case that the killing of the mule was not the result of negligence, but the result of accident—the result of circumstances over which the railroad had no control, and couldn't have controlled—then the railroad is not liable.

"(4) In the running of a railroad passenger train the employes must regard the safety of the passengers and the property of the company as well as danger to cattle on the track, and the question of negligence is influenced by these considerations.' I so charge you.

"(5) All that the law requires generally in these stock-killing cases is that the railroad company shall exercise that sort of care which prudent men, influenced by personal interest, ordinarily bestow on their business and conduct; and it is the absence of this kind of care which would make the railroad company liable in a case for the killing of stock in a county where the stock law is not of force. But where the stock law is of force, less vigilance is required of the railroad company, or, as stated in the case of Joyner v. R. R. Co., 26 S. O. 58 [1 S. E. 52], much less care is required of the railroad company in providing against stock on its track since the passage of the stock law than before the passage.' I charge you that.

"(6) If you find from the evidence that the engineer of the train in question was in the exercise of ordinary care; that the train was running at a lawful rate, and had the customary appliances and force of trainmen; and the mule in question, when seen by the engineer, was so close that the train could not be stopped in time to avoid the accident—then plaintiff cannot recover.' I charge you that.

"Mr. Thomson: I want to add one as to the speed of the train: That the speed of the train was not unlawful to pass through that country, provided an ordinarily prudent company would go at that rate.'

"As to the manner of running the train, the speed at which it was run, the degree of vigilance—of watchfulness—observed, and other matters of caution, is that which a railroad of ordinary prudence and caution would be required to use; and if the railroad was running its train at the ordinary rate of speed at which that particular train was running, then the speed at which it was being run could not be considered as a circumstance going to show negligence.

"Now, on behalf of the plaintiff.

"It is negligence per se for a railroad company to fail to comply with statutory requirements as to signals at crossings.' That does not apply in a case like this. The statute, as you are aware, requires the railroad to blow the whistle or ring the bell when it is approaching a crossing, or a public highway, or traveled place; and if a person is injured at a crossing, whether the injury is to his person or to his property, because of the failure of the railroad to give the signal by blowing the whistle or ringing the bell, then it does amount to a case of negligence per se, because the law requires the railroad to give that signal at the crossing, so that people can get out of the way—keep out of the way—while crossing a crossing. That don't apply to injury to stock other than at a traveled place. The failure to give the statutory signal is a circumstance which the jury may consider in determining whether the railroad was running its train with due caution or not. Even in a case that does not arise at a crossing, a failure to give the signal would not, in a case like this we are now considering, be negligence per se—that is, negligence within itself; the mere fact of failure to give the signal would not amount to such negligence as would make the railroad liable in a case like this. Mere circumstance for you to consider. The law presumes, inasmuch as the law requires the railroad to give these signals, that it does give them. And if a party undertakes to rely upon the failure of the railroad to give the signal, then the party who alleges must prove by the preponderance of the evidence that the signal was not given; and, if that is the case, then it becomes a circumstance for the consideration of the jury to determine whether, under all the circumstances in the case, the railroad was exercising the care in running its train which the law requires. So I refuse you that first request to charge.

"(2) As great care is not required against trespassers as in other cases, but the railroad company is liable for stock negligently killed.' I charge you that. I have already charged you that the stock law does modify the extent of the duty of the railroad to keep a lookout for stock, but still it does not relieve the railroad if the stock is actually killed through the railroad's negligence.

"(3) If you find, as a matter of fact, that the railroad company killed the plaintiff's mule, then you are to presume that the railroad company was negligent; and this presumption of negligence will stand until the railroad company convinces you by the greater weight of the evidence that it was a case of accident—that is, that after the fact of the killing has been established, the burden of proof is upon the railroad company to prove that it was done by accident, and not through their negligence. This is a rule of law that has not been changed by the stock law.' I have substantially charged you, and so charge.

"(4) If you find as a matter of fact that the engineer or fireman saw, or could have seen, the plaintiff's mule on the track at any time before the killing, and that they did not try to stop the train or to frighten the mule off the track by blowing the whistle or ringing the bell, then the railroad company is guilty of negligence, and you must find for the plaintiff.' That is, you must find for the plaintiff if you find those facts to be true, in case you find they were negligent, and that such negligence was the cause of the injury. I so charge you.

"(5) If you find that the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the railroad company for the killing of his mule, then the measure of damage is the value of the mule at the time of the killing.' I have already charged you, and so charge you. It remains for you to determine whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover or not. If you conclude he is, give him a verdict for the value of the mule as you find the value to be established by the evidence in the case. If you find he is not entitled to recover, your verdict will be for the defendant."

From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

B. L. Abney and E. M. Thomson, for appellant. John S. Reynolds, R. McC. Clarkson, and Aug. M. Deal, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. This action to recover $150 of defendant railway company for negligently killing a mule, the property of plaintiff, came on for trial before Judge Klugh and a jury on April 30, 1903. Testimony was offered by both plaintiff and defendant on the matter of the alleged negligence of the defendant. Some of this testimony was objected to, some of it was allowed over defendant's objection. This is made a ground of appeal. Both sides to the controversy made requests to charge. His honor's charge is made a ground of appeal. After verdict found for plaintiff, a motion was made for a new trial by defendant upon the minutes, which was refused. This is made a ground of appeal after judgment entered. The grounds of appeal are as follows:

"(1) Excepts because his honor erred in allowing the plaintiff to testify, over defendant's objection, that the train which killed plaintiff's mule failed to give the signals required by statute for a public crossing 600 yards from the place where the said mule was struck, and also failed to give the signals required by statute for another crossing 400 yards from the place where said mule was struck; whereas it is submitted that this accident not having occurred at a crossing, and the complaint containing no allegation to which it could be responsive, such testimony was irrelevant to the issue, and should not have been admitted.

"(2) Excepts because his honor erred in allowing Major Cason to testify, over the objection of defendant, that the train which killed plaintiff's mule failed to give the signals prescribed by statute for a public crossing a considerable distance—some 400 yards—from the place where this accident occurred. For the reasons stated under exception 1.

"(3) Excepts because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'The failure to give the statutory signal (his honor referring to the failure to give the statutory signal for the public crossing some 400 yards from the place of the accident) is a circumstance which the jury may consider in determining whether the railroad was running its train with due caution or not. Even in a case that does not arise at a crossing, a failure to give the signal would not, in a case like this we are now considering, be negligence per se—that is, negligence within itself; the mere fact of failure to give the signal would not amount to such negligence as would make the railroad liable, in a case like this. Mere circumstance for you to consider. The law presumes, inasmuch as the law requires the railroad to give these signals, that it does give them. And if a party undertakes to rely upon the failure of the railroad to give the signal, then the party who alleges must prove by the preponderance of the evidence that the signal was not given; and, if that is the case, then it becomes a circumstance for the consideration of the jury to determine whether, under all the circumstances in the case, the railroad was exercising the care in running its train which the law requires.' For the reasons stated in exception 1, and for the additional reason that, no issue being made by the pleadings to which any such charge was applicable, it was to defendant's prejudice.

"(4) Excepts because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Now, in a county where the stock law is of force everybody has a right to presume—the railroad company has the right anybody else would have—the right to presume that people are obeying the law, are keeping their stock fenced; and therefore the railroad is not bound to exercise as great care and vigilance in looking out and watching for stock on its track in a county where the stock law is of force as they would be where the law allows stock to run at large. That does not excuse a railroad if it knows as a matter of fact, or if it ought to know, if it has the opportunity to know, and where a person of ordinary intelligence and ordinary observation would know, that stock were at large—that does not excuse a railroad company for killing or injuring stock, where the stock law is of force, if it knows or ought to know that stock is at large.’ The error consisting in this: That such charge imposed a duty upon the railroad company to keep a close lookout for stock in a county where the stock law is of force, and further imposed a duty upon defendant and authorized a verdict for the plaintiff if the jury should find that the defendant had an opportunity to know, or if it ought to know, that plaintiff’s stock were out contrary to the stock law. As to all of which the charge exacted greater care than the law requires, and imposed duties not required by law.

“(5) Excepts because his honor erred in charging the jury plaintiff’s request: ‘If you find as a matter of fact that the engineer or fireman saw, or could have seen, the plaintiff’s mule on the track at any time before the killing, and that they did not try to stop the train or to frighten the mule off the track by blowing the whistle or ringing the bell, then the railroad company is guilty of negligence, and you must find for the plaintiff.’ And further by charging with reference to the said request as follows: ‘That is, you must find for the plaintiff, if you find those facts to be true, in case you find they were negligent, and that such negligence was the cause of the injury.’ The error consisting in this: (1) In imposing the duty upon the defendant of keeping a lookout for stock in counties where the stock law is of force; whereas it is submitted that no duty arises upon the part of the railroad company in such counties until the stock is seen upon or is dangerously near the railroad track. (2) In charging that it was the duty of the company to blow the whistle or ring the bell for stock seen, or which should be seen, by its engineer or fireman, and making its failure to blow the whistle or ring the bell negligence; whereas the railroad company could fulfill its whole duty under the law, and yet fail to give such signals or alarm. (3) In charging the jury what facts would constitute negligence, and make the railroad company liable to plaintiff.

“(6) Excepts because his honor erred in refusing the motion for a new trial made herein upon the ground that there was no evidence to support the verdict, and that it was contrary to the law and the evidence. It being submitted that there was no evidence whatever offered in the case in any way contradicting the positive testimony of the engineer that he was in the exercise of reasonable and proper care, and did even more than the law requires, to wit, kept a careful lookout, and, when the stock was seen, exercised the utmost care to prevent injury—all the facts and circumstances corroborating such positive testimony; and, as the presumption of negligence against the defendant could not withstand such uncontradicted positive testimony, a new trial should have been granted upon such grounds.

“(7) Excepts because his honor erred in holding, on the motion for a new trial, that the jury could have found negligence on the part of defendant from the facts in evidence that the mule in question and another one were 100 feet from the railroad track, and that the engineer could have seen them for a distance of 450 yards; whereas it is respectfully submitted that the law requires no such care on the part of the engineer as that he shall keep a lookout in counties where the stock law is of force for stock 100 feet from the railroad track when he is 450 yards away; and it appearing that in his honor’s judgment this was the only evidence to support the verdict, and, it being insufficient, a new trial should have been granted upon the ground that there was no evidence to support the verdict, and that it was contrary to the law and the evidence.

“(8) Excepts because his honor erred in refusing the motion for a new trial herein upon the grounds that there was no evidence to support the verdict, and that the same was contrary to the law and the evidence.”

We will now pass upon these exceptions.

The first, second, and third exceptions cannot be sustained. The trial judge did not overrule the objection to the testimony because he realized that the killing of a mule away from a highway crossing or away from a traveled place could not make such killing to fall within the statute which makes it the duty of a railroad to sound the whistle on its engine or ring its bell when within 500 yards distance from the crossing of a street, highway, or traveled place, to prevent the railroad company from liability for injury to person or property on the crossing, still it is the law of the state that such bell should be rung or whistle blown when within 500 yards of such crossing, and it is negligence not to do so; thereby opening up the way to have it appear by testimony that as a circumstance there was this negligence. This being so, it was perfectly proper to receive the testimony of the witness or witnesses that the railroad did not sound the whistle or ring the bell. The error of appellant consists in this: that it overlooks the fact that the circuit judge refused plaintiff’s first request.

We will now consider appellant's fourth and fifth exceptions. It is the duty of the engineer to look out for stock on the track of the railroad company. It is true that his duty is less accentuated in a county in this state where the stock law exists; nevertheless it is the duty of the engineer to watch out for every danger. The engineer must do this to protect the interests of the railroad company as well as of the general public. We think the circuit judge made no mistake in declaring the law in this case. These exceptions are overruled. The report of this case should set out the charge of the presiding judge in full. These exceptions are overruled.

We will now consider exceptions sixth, seventh, and eighth. The motion for a new trial in this case was made upon the minutes of the court. The discretion of the circuit judge governs in cases like the present, unless he commits error of law. It is an error of law in the event that there is no testimony bearing upon material facts. A careful examination of all the testimony shows that there was some testimony on each point in issue. Such being the case, there was no error when the circuit judge declined to grant a new trial.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

In re ROCK HILL COTTON FACTORY CO.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 18, 1904.)

SUBROGATION—SURETY ON BOND.

1. On breach of a bond given to secure payment by a bank of a receiver's deposits, the personal representative of the surety paid the damages. Held, that he was entitled to be subrogated to the commissions of the receiver, who was a co-surety, and whose commissions the court had withheld until the deposit was paid in full, as against an assignee of the commissions, where the assignment was after the execution of the bond, but before the order providing that the commissions, when fixed, should be withheld.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Dantzler, Judge.

Petition by James E. Reynolds, in re A. E. Hutchison, against the Rock Hill Cotton Factory Company and others. From the circuit decree, petitioner and certain creditors appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. J. Cherry, for appellant. Wilson & Wilson, for appellant creditors. Witherspoon & Spencer, for respondent.

JONES, J. The question presented by this appeal is, who is entitled to certain commissions of R. Lee Kerr, receiver—whether the appellant, James E. Reynolds, by virtue of an assignment thereof by the receiver, or respondent, administratrix of A. H. White, deceased, under the law of subrogation? The facts are substantially these: (1) In January, 1899, R. Lee Kerr was appointed receiver of the Rock Hill Cotton Factory Company in the suit of A. E. Hutchison v. Rock Hill Cotton Factory Company. (2) On December 1, 1899, a bond was executed by the Commercial & Farmers' Bank, with A. H. White, R. Lee Kerr, and others as sureties, made payable to W. Brown Wylie, clerk, in the penal sum of $50,000, conditioned that said bank would pay any and all checks of said receiver drawn agreeably to the decrees of the court on the funds already and thereafter to be deposited in said bank by the receiver. (3) Under the call of creditors in the case of A. H. White v. Commercial & Farmers' Bank et al., on the 3d day of June, 1900, the receiver established his claim for proceeds of the sale of property of the Rock Hill Cotton Factory Company deposited in said bank to the amount of $31,061.82. (4) On January 2, 1900, R. Lee Kerr, as collateral to his note for $2,500, assigned to James E. Reynolds all his fees due or thereafter to become due him as receiver of the Rock Hill Cotton Factory Company. (5) On September 24, 1900, in the suit of Hutchison v. Rock Hill Cotton Factory Company, the court made a decree containing the following terms: "It further appearing from the receiver's reports to this court that the funds coming into his hands from the sale of the property of the insolvent corporation were deposited to his credit in the Commercial & Farmers' Bank of Rock Hill, S. C., and a bond conditional that said bank would pay all checks drawn against said funds by the receiver, on which bond it appears that the said Lee Kerr is one of the obligors, said receiver's compensation of three per cent. on moneys received by him—to cover all services of receiving and disbursing or otherwise by him—should be withheld until all the funds remaining in said bank are withdrawn and paid, and the said bond is satisfied. * * * Said receiver is further ordered and directed to forthwith draw his check on the Commercial & Farmers' Bank of Rock Hill, S. C., in favor of W. Brown Wylie, clerk of this court, for the amount of his deposit remaining to his credit on the books of said Commercial & Farmers' Bank of Rock Hill, S. C. If payment of said check is refused, said clerk is authorized and directed to bring suit on the guaranty bond made in behalf of the said Commercial & Farmers' Bank, as security for the deposit of receiver's funds. The amount received by said clerk, whether from the said check or from collection of said bond, to be forthwith paid over by him to said receiver for disbursement under the terms of this order." (6) On October 12, 1900, the said receiver drew his check on the Commercial & Farmers' Bank in favor of W. Brown Wylie, clerk, for $28,314.02, which was dishonored. (7) On May 7, 1901, in an action on the bond mentioned in fact No. 2, above, judgment was entered for $21,577.50, with costs and interest, in favor of W. Brown

Wylie, clerk, and against the obligors, Commercial & Farmers' Bank, A. H. White, R. Lee Kerr, and others. (8) A. H. White paid $10,000 on said judgment, and after his death his administratrix, the respondent, procured the balance due thereon to be paid into court by the loan and savings bank, the present holder of the judgment, and, so far as creditors are concerned, the entire judgment on said bond has been paid into court. (9) There is no dispute that the amount of the commissions of the receiver is $948.42; nor is it disputed that, if respondent is entitled to be subrogated to this fund, her claim would absorb the whole of it.

Judge Dantzer made a decree sustaining respondent's claim to this fund, and we do not think he erred. Subrogation, in equity, is that principle which substitutes a person who has paid a debt for which another is bound to all the rights and remedies of the creditor against that third party, provided he is not a mere volunteer, but made payment because his duty with respect to the contract, or his interest with respect to the property or securities concerned, compelled him. Thus, if a surety pays the debt of his principal, he is subrogated to the benefit of all securities, funds, liens, and equities which the creditor has against the principal. Since co-sureties have the right to call on each other for contribution, a surety compelled to pay the debt of the principal is subrogated to the right of the creditor, not only against the principal, but against the co-surety also. Burrows & Brown v. McWhann, 1 Desaus. 409, 1 Am. Dec. 677; 24 Ency. Law (1st Ed.) 228. "The doctrine of subrogation is a pure, unmixed equity, having its foundation in the principles of natural justice." Chancellor Johnson in Gadsden v. Brown, Speers, Eq. 41. Therefore it should not be applied against the interest of one who has fairly acquired rights and equities equal or superior to those of the claimant under subrogation.

Applying these principles to the facts stated, the right of A. H. White or his administratrix to subrogation against the co-surety, Kerr, was not consummated, in the sense of being capable of enforcement, until actual payment of the debt; but it originated in the bond executed December 1, 1899, and after consummation goes back to that date. Thus the origin of the right of respondent to subrogation was prior to the assignment of commissions by Kerr to appellant, which was January 2, 1900. Now, did the appellant, as Kerr's assignee, acquire a right or equity equal to that of respondents? Rev. St. 1893, § 265, subd. 4, provides: "Receivers of the property within this state of foreign or other corporation shall be allowed such commission as may be fixed by the court appointing them, not exceeding five per cent. on the amount received and disbursed by them." A receiver takes only such commission as the court may order, and every assignment of funds under the control of a court must be held subject to order of the court touching its distribution. It is true, the assignment to the appellant was previous to the order of court fixing the amount of the fees, and directing the manner of disbursement; but appellant was bound to take notice that Kerr's commissions were subject to the order of the court, as if that had been written in the assignment in so many words. The court, by its order of September 24, 1900, in effect, retained the commissions as a security for the payment of the funds deposited by Kerr, receiver, in the bank, and in compliance with the conditions of the bond of December 1, 1899. The bond having been paid by A. H. White, his administratrix, respondent, should be subrogated to the commissions as one of the securities for its payment. Kerr could not complain, and his unfortunate assignee can claim no higher right than Kerr had.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

VERNER et al. v. SIMPSON et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 19, 1904.)

RES JUDICATA—JUDGMENT AGAINST CORPORATION—EFFECT ON STOCKHOLDER.

1. A stockholder of a corporation is bound by any judgment against it.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; Purdy, Judge.

Bill by David P. Verner and others against Augusta A. Simpson and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Joseph A. McCullough, for appellants. Haynesworth, Parker & Patterson, for respondents.

JONES, J. On March 27, 1900, the defendants recovered a judgment against the plaintiff Mutual Insurance Company for $296.94 and costs. Under execution issued thereon, the sheriff of Greenville county was about to levy upon certain personal property, viz., an iron safe, desk, and other office furniture, alleged to belong to said insurance company, when this action was instituted to enjoin enforcement of said execution upon the ground that said property was not subject to execution under the contract of insurance, charter, and by-laws of said association.

The circuit court, Judge Purdy, sustained the special referee, B. M. Shuman, Esq., in holding that the question was res judicata under the judgment mentioned in the case of Simpson v. Insurance Co., 59 S. C. 198, 37 S. E. 18, 225. We think the circuit court was correct in this. In the case of Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 35, the court held that three things are necessary to sustain the plea of res judicata: (1) The parties must be the same or their privies; (2) the subject-matter must be the same; (3) the precise point must have been ruled. In this case, the parties or their privies are the same. In so far as D. P. Verner is joined in the suit as plaintiff with the corporation of which he is a stockholder, no change in parties is effected. The interest he sets up in this case is identical with that of the corporation, and his claim is under the corporation with respect to the property of the corporation. In Hawkins v. Glenn, 131 U. S. 319, 9 Sup. Ct. 739, 33 L. Ed. 184, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "A stockholder is so far an integral part of the corporation that, in the view of the law, he is privy to the proceedings touching the body of which he is a member." The authorities generally hold that a judgment against a corporation, not impeached for fraud or want of jurisdiction, binds the stockholders with respect to corporate matters. 26 Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 90; Nickum v. Burckhardt, 30 Or. 464, 47 Pac. 788, 48 Pac. 474, 60 Am. St. Rep. 822; Ball v. Reese, 58 Kan. 614, 50 Pac. 875, 62 Am. St. Rep. 638; Mutual Fire Ins. Co. v. Phoenix Furniture Co., 108 Mich. 170, 66 N. W. 1095, 34 L. R. A. 694, 62 Am. St. Rep. 698; Bear v. Brunswick Co., 122 N. C. 434, 29 S. E. 719, 65 Am. St. Rep. 711; Castleman v. Templeman, 87 Md. 546, 40 Atl. 275, 41 L. R. A. 367, 67 Am. St. Rep. 370.

The subject-matter, the contract of insurance, is the same in both cases. The precise point decided in the former suit and involved here is the absolute liability of the Mutual Insurance Company to a money judgment for $296.94, in favor of Augusta A. Simpson, upon the contract of insurance under its charter, and the facts stated in the complaint and admitted by the answer in the former suit. One of the necessary incidents of a money judgment is to subject to levy and sale under execution all the property of the judgment debtor not exempt under the Constitution or some valid statute. The appellant does not claim exemption of the property from levy under any statute. The claim of exemption is based solely upon the contract of insurance under the charter and the by-laws of the insurance company. The argument is that the property in question was purchased out of the annual premiums, and that, under section 12 of the by-laws, that fund is applicable to defraying the expenses of the company, and is only applicable to losses by fire, etc., where a surplus is accumulated and the directors order such surplus to be so applied, conditions which, it is claimed, do not exist, and to sustain this view appellants cite Burdon v. Mass. Safety Fund Association (Mass.) 17 N. E. 874, 1 L. R. A. 146; In re Equitable Reserved Fund Life Association of New York, 131 N. Y. 354, 30 N. E. 114. It is further argued that this point did not arise in the former suit, and could not arise until an attempt was made to enforce the execution out of such fund. This is plausible at first view, but, after all, the contention is necessarily based upon the assertion of nonliability to an absolute money judgment for losses by fire, a question decided against appellants in the former suit, upon the case which they made. To sustain appellant's contention would practically reopen the question decided, and would destroy the legal effect of the judgment rendered.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

HARRILL v. SOUTH CAROLINA & G. E. R. CO. OF NORTH CAROLINA.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 27, 1904.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—QUESTION FOR JURY—PARTNERSHIP—LIABILITY OF PARTNERS—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—LAW OF FOREIGN JURISDICTION—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. In an action against a railroad company for wrongfully causing the death of plaintiff's intestate, who was alleged to have been employed by defendant as an engineer, evidence considered, and held to justify submission to the jury of the question whether defendant and another corporation of the same name were partners in operating the portion of the road where deceased was killed.

2. This question was one of fact for the jury.

3. That a partnership agreement between railroads is ultra vires as between the public and the corporations does not relieve the company from contractual liability to third persons.

4. A railroad corporation operating a road jointly with another corporation is responsible for injury to its employes, as a natural person would be for the liabilities of a firm of which he is a member.

5. In an action in North Carolina against a railroad company for wrongfully causing the death of an engineer on a part of its road in South Carolina, an attorney from the latter state testified that, under the Constitution of that state, knowledge by the deceased of the dangerous condition of the trestle by the falling of which he was killed would not defeat recovery for his death, and cited South Carolina cases in support of his statement. On cross-examination, witness testified that any degree of contributory negligence would defeat recovery, and defined "contributory negligence." Held to sustain an instruction that if the trestle was defective, to the knowledge of defendant, knowledge by deceased of its dangerous condition would not defeat recovery.

6. The court charged that contributory negligence does not apply to the use by an employe of ways known by the company to be defective, and which the employe is required to use and can use in but one way, but that an employe cannot hold his employer liable for his wrongful acts, done contrary to his duty, so that culpable negligence contributing to the injury would bar recovery. It was further stated that if the contributive fault was of a negative character, and would not have existed but for the primary wrong, it is not to be charged to the injured person, but to the original wrongdoer. On the specific facts, the court charged that if it was pointed out to deceased that the trestle was dangerous, and it was in fact apparently so, and deceased went on it without exercising ordinary prudence, he could not recover, but that if he was told to examine it, and did so, without discovering that it was dangerous, and believed that he could go over it with usual safety, and violated no rule of the company, he could recover. Held not erroneous.

Montgomery, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rutherford County; B. F. Long, Judge.

Action by R. N. Harrill, as administrator of the estate of Jake Metcalf, deceased, against the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company of North Carolina. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See 44 S. E. 109.

P. J. Sinclair, G. W. S. Hart, and N. W. Hardin, for appellant. E. J. Justice and Busbee & Busbee, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. The plaintiff alleged that his intestate, Jake Metcalf, was on and before April 20, 1901, employed by the defendant as a locomotive engineer, and was on said day engaged in running an engine carrying cars from Blacksburg, S. C., to Marion, N. C.; that while so engaged he was killed by the falling of a bridge or trestle, being a part of defendant's track over Buffalo creek, in South Carolina; that said trestle was on said day, by reason of defendant's negligence, in a defective and dangerous condition, and, by reason thereof, gave way and fell, causing the death of his intestate. Defendant denied that plaintiff's intestate was, on the day named, employed by or engaged for the defendant in pulling a train from the points named in the complaint. The defendant also denied the allegation of negligence, and averred that plaintiff's intestate assumed the risk of crossing the trestle, and was guilty of contributory negligence. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, defendant moved for judgment of nonsuit, for that (1) the plaintiff has failed to show that the defendant company, the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company of North Carolina, ran its train, or built or is required in law to maintain the trestle over Buffalo creek, in South Carolina, or that the plaintiff's intestate was employed by defendant company; (2) that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of defendant; (3) that plaintiff's evidence demonstrated that his intestate was not without fault, and that he came to his death by his own negligence. The motion was refused, and was renewed upon the same grounds at the conclusion of the entire testimony, and again refused, and defendant excepted. The court submitted the following issues to the jury: "(1) Was plaintiff's intestate employed and sent by defendant on April 20, 1901, as engineer, for the purpose of running an engine, and cars attached, from Blacksburg, S. C., to Marion, N. C., over Buffalo creek trestle, as alleged in the complaint? (2) Was intestate killed by the wrongful act and negligence of defendant, as alleged? (3) Did intestate, by his own negligence, contribute to his death? (4) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover?"

The controversy in regard to the relation which the plaintiff's intestate bore to the defendant company is presented by the first ground assigned for the motion to nonsuit, and certain special prayers for instruction asked by defendant. An examination and settlement of this question lies at the threshold of the case. If the plaintiff has introduced no evidence to sustain the allegation that his intestate was in the employment of the defendant company, and that by the terms of such employment he was required to run his engine over and across Buffalo creek on the day he was killed, the motion for nonsuit should have been allowed. The testimony in regard to the status of the defendant, and its relation to the South Carolina corporation owning the railroad to the North Carolina line, is certainly unsatisfactory. To correctly understand the status of the defendant corporation, it becomes necessary to state as concisely as possible its history and relation to certain other corporations. The General Assembly of this state, at its session of 1887 (page 143, c. 77), consolidated the Charleston, Cincinnati & Chicago Railroad Company, a South Carolina corporation, with two North Carolina corporations, creating the Charleston, Cincinnati & Chicago Railway Company, a North Carolina as well as a South Carolina corporation, operating a railroad from Marion, N. C., to Blacksburg, S. C. This railroad, with all of its property, rights, franchises, etc., in both states, was sold under foreclosure proceedings in the Circuit Court of the United States, and was by the purchaser incorporated under the corporate name of the Ohio River & Charleston Ry. Co. Bradley v. Railroad, 119 N. C. 918, appendix. This last-named corporation executed certain mortgages, which were foreclosed pursuant to a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of North Carolina, and the property, rights, franchises, etc., purchased by Samuel Hunt and others. Pursuant to sections 697, 698, and 2005 of the Code, the purchasers formed a new corporation under the name of the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company of North Carolina. At the session of the General Assembly of 1899 (Pub. Laws 1899, p. 129, c. 35) the Legislature incorporated said company under said name; conferring upon it all of the rights, powers, privileges, franchises, and immunities that at any time belonged to the Charleston, Cincinnati & Chicago Railroad Company, or to the Ohio & Charleston Railway Company of North Carolina, or to the Ohio River & Charleston Railroad Company or to any or all of their predecessors. The said corporation was authorized to operate and maintain a railroad from the said line, on the county line of Cleveland county, to the town of Marion, in the state of North Carolina, and was authorized and empowered to assign or lease its franchises, rights, and property, and to consolidate with any other corporation organized under the laws of this or any other state. The manner in which said consolidation shall be made, and the evidence thereof, is fully set forth in section 8 of chapter 85 of said act, which was ratified January 31, 1899. On the 18th of August, 1898, the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company of South Carolina was chartered, which charter was confirmed by the Legislature of South Carolina on the 1st day of March, 1899. The same persons, except P. J. Sinclair, are named as directors of the South Carolina corporation. The Constitution of South Carolina forbids any foreign corporation to do business there without the consent of the Legislature of that state. There was no evidence that said corporation had consolidated in accordance with the provisions of section 8, c. 85, p. 131, of the Laws of 1899. There was no other line of road running from Marion, N. C., through Rutherford and Cleveland county, to the South Carolina line, than the one which extends to South Carolina and across to Blacksburg. It appeared in evidence that the intestate was employed by the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railway Company. This was shown by vouchers and checks issued to the said intestate, drawn upon the National Union Bank, Rock Hill, S. C., the National Bank of Gaffney, Gaffney, S. C., Merchants' & Planters' Bank, Gaffney, S. C., or B. Blanton & Co., Bankers, Shelby, N. C. There was also evidence tending to show that the run of said intestate was from Blacksburg, S. C., to Marion, N. C., and return; that he had been making this run for about two years; that he was working for the same company during this time. His widow testified that he was working on the road which operated trains in North Carolina from Marion along the line of what is known as the "Three C Road"; that he had the rulebook and time-tables issued by the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company. It was in evidence on the part of the defendant that Thomas A. Smith was a section master, having under his charge a portion of the road running from Blacksburg, S. C., to Earle, N. C. It was further in evidence on the part of said witness that he had been section master of said road eight or ten years; that three miles of his section was in North Carolina, and three in South Carolina, including Buffalo creek; that it was under one management, and that he was employed by one company; that his employment covered the time of death of plaintiff's intestate. Another witness for the defendant testified that he was employed on said road, and did not know he was working for but one company. It was further in evidence by W. M. Wilkie on the 20th day of April, 1901, he was employed in repairing cars in the shop at Blacksburg for the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company; that he had worked on trestles from Blacksburg, S. C., to Brushy Creek, N. C.; that Mr. Tripp was superintendent, Mr. Maxwell was supervisor of the track, and Mr. Nutting was supervisor of the bridges and trestles. There was no evidence of the existence of any corporation by the name of the Georgia & South Carolina Extension Railroad Company.

The defendant denies, "on information and belief," many of the allegations of the complaint in respect to the relation the plaintiff's intestate bore to the corporation. For instance, the fifth allegation of the complaint is "that on the morning of April 20 1901, the said intestate was sent out by defendant from Blacksburg, S. C., on his regular run, with a train consisting of engine and tender, freight cars, and passenger coach, as plaintiff is informed and believes." The answer is, "It denies on information and belief the statement of facts in the fifth paragraph of the complaint." It is very doubtful whether this answer to this very material allegation raised an issue. Code, § 243, requires the answer to either deny each allegation, or "any knowledge or information thereof sufficient to form a belief." However this may be, no question was raised in regard to it by the plaintiff, and we notice it only as indicating the trend of the defendant's answer to the vital question as to its relation to the employment of the plaintiff's intestate. The entire testimony presents the very singular and anomalous spectacle of a railroad track originally built and belonging to a corporation chartered by the General Assembly of two states, running and operating in both states a continuous line, being sold, and the purchasers incorporating two companies of the same name, except that one is "of South Carolina," and the other "of North Carolina." The two roads are operated by persons who adopt the name of "The South Carolina and Georgia Extension Railroad Company." There is no evidence of any consolidation of the two corporations, or of any lease of the track of one company to the other. The two roads are operated by a common set of officers, the section assigned to one of the section masters being one-half in each of said states—one superintendent, one inspector of cars, and, in general, one set of employes. The checks given to the plaintiff's intestate indicate that the road is operated from a common treasury. There is other testimony to the same effect. There is no more evidence that the plaintiff's intestate was employed by the South Carolina than by the North Carolina corporation. If the defendant's contention be sustained, we have the anomalous condition of employes operating a railroad with no responsible head, and no one responsible for injuries sustained by them, and no one responsible to the public for breach of contracts. There must be some explanation of this condition. The plaintiff served notice upon the defendant "to produce, in a legal form, showing that it would be competent testimony, the charter of the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company, and states that it is alleged by the plaintiff that there is no such legal charter, and that there was an attempt at consolidation of the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company of South Carolina, and the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company of North Carolina, which did not have the effect of extinguishing the two former corporations and creating a new one, but which made a partnership of the two former, which did business under the name and style of the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company; it being a partnership, and not a corporation." There was no response to this demand. There is but one possible theory upon which the operation of these roads in the manner testified to by the witnesses for both plaintiff and defendant can be explained. The plaintiff contends that there was testimony competent to be submitted to the jury tending to show that the two corporations were running and operating said roads under an arrangement or agreement which, in law, constituted them partners under the name of the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company, and asked his honor to submit this question to the jury; the defendant objecting for that there was no evidence to sustain such instruction. His honor having refused the motion for nonsuit and submitted the question to the jury, the exception to his refusal and instruction to the jury raises the question whether there was any evidence to sustain it. Among other instructions, his honor said to the jury: "There is some evidence tending to show the corporation which is sued, and which was chartered by the Legislature of North Carolina, operated a railroad in North Carolina in 1899, 1900, and 1901, and that trains operated over this road at that time passed into South Carolina and over Buffalo creek daily. Mrs. Metcalf testified, as the court recalls, that her husband was employed by the company so operating the trains in this state, and that he was required, as such employé, in the performance of his duty, to go on to Blacksburg, and over this trestle. If you find from any evidence in this case that the plaintiff's intestate was employed by the defendant, and was required to go over the trestle at Buffalo creek, in South Carolina, you will answer the first issue, 'Yes.'" The defendant excepted to this instruction. "The jury will answer the first issue 'Yes' if they find from the greater weight of the evidence that the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company of North Carolina and the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad of South Carolina, under the name and style of the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company, jointly or by mutual consent employed plaintiff's intestate, and made it his duty, as an engineer, to run from Marion, N. C., to Blacksburg, S. C., on April 20, 1901, and operated trains over the railroad leading from Marion to Blacksburg as one company, with a common set of officers and a common treasurer, when the said South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company had not been incorporated according to law, and there had been no legal consolidation of the said two companies."

It is held by this court in Rocky Mount Mills v. Railroad Co., 119 N. C. 693, 25 S. E. 864, 56 Am. St. Rep. 682, that where two or more connecting roads have agreed among themselves to conduct business through their systems under the name adopted by them, and have so advertised to the public, and have so contracted with persons, that each road which is a party to such agreement is liable for the negligence of the other roads. In that case it appeared that certain connecting roads had entered into an agreement to receive and transmit freight under a through bill of lading; that they adopted the name and style of the Atlantic Coast Dispatch, and issued bills of lading in that name. For the failure to promptly carry and deliver freight, it was held that either of the roads to such agreement might be sued for damages. The court, after discussing the question, says: "Upon examination and reflection, we are of the opinion that the defendants and their connecting lines are jointly liable, each for the others, on the contract before us, and that they are also entitled to the same immunity and privileges as if the contract had been made by the individual company sought to be charged under said contract; that is to say, that they are engaged in business as partners under the name of the Atlantic Coast Dispatch. They are still common carriers—none the less so because they have certain stipulations. Having jointly agreed to conduct the 'all-rail fast freight line' business, under the name above stated, between the terminal points of their connections north and south, and having so informed the public and so contracted with the plaintiff, their true character is fixed by the law according to the nature of their business, and such character cannot be thrown aside by any declarations in the contract in relation to the consequences of liabilities attaching thereto." The court again says: "Taking notice, as we are at liberty to do, that the numerous transportation lines in our country, connecting with each other, constituting continuous lines between localities, are important factors in the commercial life of the country, we can readily see that if the shipper should have to go to a distant state, and find, as best he can, the negligent party, and enforce his remedy against him there, then the expense and trouble would in many cases be ruinous. On the contrary, the carrier's remedy in a case like the present would be easy and speedy. The whole matter is this: The defendants and their associates have engaged in a public business, in the manner described, for mutual benefit and convenience, and attempted to avoid the legal consequences by adopting some fancy name, and by stipulating for limitations on the liabilities incurred in the exercise of their privileges in such business."

It would seem clear that if two natural persons were found using their common property jointly, permitting those in the active control and management of it to make contracts, collect moneys for its use, and hold themselves out to the public as authorized to so use it, the question as to whether such use was the result of some agreement or partnership would be submitted to a jury. It is difficult to conceive that the president and directors of the two corporations would so far abdicate their powers and fail to perform their duties in respect to the property and franchises as to permit strangers, without authority, to assume control of it, employ servants and agents to operate it, assume responsible duties to the public, and, in short, to do all such things in respect to the property as the corporations were authorized to do. This will be the condition with which we are confronted, unless those who, under the name and style of the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company, have leased this property from the corporations, are operating it as their property. In view of the entire evidence, we think that his honor properly submitted the question to the jury. It is well known, as a part of the history of this country, that railroad companies do form traffic and passenger arrangements, and otherwise operate their property jointly for their common benefit. Usually this is done by virtue of special permission granted by the Legislatures of the different states. If it be done without such authority, and is ultra vires as between the corporations and the public, they could not escape liability to persons with whom they had formed contractual relations by reason thereof. It does not appear that the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company is a legal entity, or consists of anything more than a corps of superintendents, section masters, engineers, and other persons employed in operating a railroad. Surely such a mythical personality may not stand to the front and prevent the court laying hold upon the real owners of the property, as the jury have found real operators thereof, and fixing them with liability for breach of contracts. It would be but keeping the promise to the ear, and breaking it to the hope, to say to this engineer or his personal representative that the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company is alone responsible for a defective condition of the bridge by which he lost his life. Questions somewhat analogous to this have come before the court, and it has been uniformly held that the jury is the proper tribunal to pass upon and ascertain the real facts, and fix real responsibility. In the case of Muschamp v. Railroad Co., 8 Mees. & Wel. 421, the question was presented as to the liability of the defendant for loss of articles shipped over its own and other lines. Lord Abinger, C. J., said: "The whole matter is therefore a question for the jury to determine what the contract was, on the evidence before them." In Bradford v. So. Car. Railroad Co., 7 Rich. Law, 201, 62 Am. Dec. 411, the court held that in such cases it was a question for the jury to determine. In Hart v. Railroad, 8 N. Y. 37, 59 Am. Dec. 447, the court said: "I am satisfied from this evidence that the refusal of the judge to nonsuit the plaintiff was right. The court charged the jury that it was for them to say whether it was proved that the defendant, by its agents, received the baggage, and agreed to carry it to Troy, and on the decision of the motion for a nonsuit, after all the evidence was given, the court stated it was a matter to be left to the jury. The court was right, both in the charge and in the refusal to nonsuit. There were facts which it was proper to submit to the jury, who were the proper judges of the weight of evidence, and it would have been error to have refused so to submit them."

We think that his honor's ruling in the matter was correct. The jury having found, under the instructions, that the defendant corporation was, together with the South Carolina corporation, operating the road jointly, of course it becomes responsible for the injury sustained by its employé in the same manner that a natural person would be for the liabilities of a partnership of which he was a member. We have carefully examined his honor's charge upon the second issue, and find no error therein.

The principal contention is made upon the question of assumption of risk and contributory negligence. In respect thereto it is conceded that the law of South Carolina prevails. Mr. D. W. Robinson, a practicing attorney residing in South Carolina, was examined as a witness in regard to the law of that state, and, after testifying in regard to article 9, § 8, of the Constitution, was asked the following questions: "If the jury should find that the engineer of a locomotive engine, employed by a railroad company, while running a train across a trestle on the road of said company in the discharge of his duty as such employé, had lost his life by the trestle giving way on account of some defect in the trestle, and the engine falling through by the breaking down of the said trestle, would this, under the laws of South Carolina, render the railroad company liable in an action by the personal representative of deceased for damages for such death? Ans. Yes, sir." "Under the laws of South Carolina, would the defense by a railroad company to an action for damages by reason of the falling in of a trestle along the railroad track, and the consequent death of the engineer, that the engineer knew of the dangerous condition of the trestle, or had opportunity to know it, avail the railroad company anything? If not, why not? Ans. I do not think the defense of knowledge and assumption of risk in a case of this kind would avail the defendant, because the provision of the Constitution of South Carolina (article 9, § 15) makes this defense of no avail, and this seems to be the construction placed upon this provision by the courts of South Carolina." The witness thereupon cites a number of cases decided by the Supreme Court of that state, and proceeds to say: "But if this case is not covered by the provision of the Constitution which I have above quoted, then the law applicable to it, as construed in this state, is that the question whether or not the party is to be deemed to have assumed the risk, from knowledge of the dangerous or defective character of the appliances, machinery, etc., which he uses, is a question for the jury. The cases already cited cover this doctrine." The witness was examined fully in regard to the law of South Carolina, and upon cross-examination said: "Any degree of contributory negligence, as this term is used by the Supreme Court of South Carolina, and properly understood, will defeat a recovery. The meaning of 'contributory negligence,' as defined by the Supreme Court of South Carolina, is that kind of negligence of the plaintiff which is a direct and proximate cause of the injury combining and concurring with the defendant's negligence in the same matter, causing the injury. Unless it is the direct and proximate cause, it is not contributory negligence, within the meaning of the term used by the Supreme Court of South Carolina. The distinctions and doctrines applicable to a proper understanding of contributory negligence will be found in the Bodie Case [Bodie v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co. (S. C.) 30 S. E. 715, 44 S. E. 943], above referred to." His honor read to the jury the constitutional provision, and said: "If this trestle was dangerous in its construction, or in any other manner, as alleged in the complaint, and if the defendant company knew this, and required and permitted its engineers, in the performance of the duties of their employment, to pass over it, then I charge you that such engineers would not be barred of their recovery, in case of injury to them, because they knew the trestle was thus defective." We think there was evidence to sustain this instruction. In regard to the issue of contributory negligence, his honor charged the jury as follows: "Contributory negligence, in South Carolina, does not apply to the use of an employé of a railroad company of defective ways of such company, when the railroad company knew the ways were defective, and the employé was required by it to use such ways in the performance of his duty, and when there is but one manner or method of using the same, and the employé is injured in so using it. An employé of a railroad company cannot hold his employer liable for his wrongful acts done, not in obedience to his duty as such employé, but contrary to it. The Constitution of South Carolina does not go this far. It is not to be assumed that a man in his senses will heedlessly imperil his own life. Culpable negligence of the plaintiff's intestate, properly so called, which contributed to the injury, must always defeat the action. But the nature of the primary wrong has much to do with the judgment, whether or not the contributive fault was of a negative character, such as a lack of vigilance, and was itself caused by, or would not have existed but for, the primary wrong. It is not, in law, to be charged to the injured one, but to the original wrongdoer. See Kirby v. Railroad (June 24, 1902, S. C.) 41 S. E. 774. If the jury finds that when the intestate, Jake Metcalf, on the morning of April 20, 1901, arrived at Buffalo trestle, and was waved down by Tom Smith, the section master, and they went together out on the trestle, and Smith pointed out to Metcalf that the track of the railroad was out of order, and the trestle was dangerous and unsafe, and waved him not to go over it, and told the intestate that the trestle was unsafe, or if it was apparently more unsafe and more likely to fall than usual, and this could have been detected by ordinary prudence, and Jake Metcalf did not exercise such prudence, and was thereby injured as the direct result thereof, you will answer the third issue 'Yes,' or, if he willfully killed himself, you will answer the third issue 'Yes.' You will answer the third issue 'No,' if you find from the evidence that when Jake Metcalf arrived at the trestle over Buffalo creek on the morning of April 20, 1901, he was flagged down by Tom Smith, the section master, and told that the creek was high, and that he wanted Metcalf to get out and examine the trestle, and he did so, and walked out on the trestle with Smith, and the track appeared to be in alignment and surface, and there was nothing the matter with the track or trestle, so far as appeared from examination, except the water was high, and came up on the trestle as high as is represented by the red line on the picture, Exhibit 3, and that there was a raft above the trestle, and that there was nothing further unusual about the track or trestle, and that Metcalf was left by Tom Smith to rely on his own judgment as to whether he should go on the trestle, and was not warned not to go, and Metcalf believed he could go over it with as much safety as for some months before, and a man of ordinary prudence under like circumstances would have ordinarily so believed, and that Metcalf violated no rule or order of his employer in going on or over the trestle." Defendant excepted to the giving of these instructions. We think there is no error in the instructions as given. The defendant asked for a number of special instructions, the larger part of which were given with certain modifications, which we have carefully examined, and which we think were correctly made. This case is before this court for the second time, and was argued at the last term. We have given it a careful and anxious consideration. It was argued with marked ability by eminent counsel on both sides. It is not for us to say what the verdict of the jury should have been. We can only pass upon the exceptions to his honor's rulings upon questions of law, and as to them, for the reasons hereinbefore given, we find no error.

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the killing of his intestate through the alleged negligence of the defendant company. In the complaint it is alleged that the defendant is a domestic railroad corporation in North Carolina, and that the line of its road extends through Blacksburg, S. C., through Cleveland and Rutherford counties in North Carolina, to Marion, N. C.; that his intestate at the time of his death was employed by the defendant as a locomotive engineer, and was engaged in running an engine pulling a train from Blacksburg, S. C., to Marion, N. C.; that the decedent, in the exercise of due care, undertook to cross a high trestle over Buffalo creek, in South Carolina, between Blacksburg and the North Carolina line, and was killed by the falling in of a part of the trestle, the trestle having been insecurely built, and then in a bad condition, to the defendant's knowledge. The allegation of the complaint is that the trestle over Buffalo bridge, where the intestate lost his life, is in South Carolina, and all of the evidence was to the effect that it was on the railroad track of the company organized and chartered in South Carolina as the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company of South Carolina. The act of incorporation of the defendant company, passed on the 1st day of February, 1900 (chapter 85, p. 129, of the Acts of the General Assembly of 1899), shows that the defendant corporation was authorized to operate and maintain a railroad from the state line between the states of North Carolina and South Carolina, on the county line of Cleveland county, to the town of Marion, in the state of North Carolina, and thence to the Tennessee state line.

It was admitted by both sides on the trial, and the admission was correct in law, that there is a presumption of law, in the absence of proof, where a corporation has authority to operate a railroad, and the road is being operated, that the company authorized by the charter is in fact conducting its management, and the court so instructed the jury. The plaintiff's intestate, then, having been killed in South Carolina, on the road of the South Carolina & Georgia Railroad Company of South Carolina, there is a presumption of the law that that company was operating its own road.

The defendant at the close of all the evidence renewed its motion to nonsuit the plaintiff upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to show that the defendant company, the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company of North Carolina, ran its train, or built or was in law required to maintain the trestle spanning Buffalo creek, in South Carolina, or that the plaintiff's intestate was employed by the defendant company. We think that the motion should have been allowed.

The first issue was as follows: "Was the plaintiff's intestate, Jake Metcalf, employed and sent by the defendant on April 20, 1901, as engineer, for the purpose of running an engine, and cars attached, from Blacksburg, South Carolina, to Marion, North Carolina, over Buffalo Creek Trestle, as alleged in the complaint?" After a careful scrutiny of all the evidence in this case, I find none to the effect that the intestate was either employed by the defendant company, or that he was under its direction or orders, on the 20th April, 1901, the day of his death. The only evidence offered by the plaintiff to prove that fact positively was the testimony of Mrs. Carry Metcalf, the widow of the intestate. In her examination in chief she said that the intestate's "run" was from Blacksburg to Marion and return; that he had been working for the same company all the time he was on that run; and that the road on which he, as engineer, hauled trains, was in North Carolina from Marion along the line of what was known as the "Three C Road." On her cross-examination, however, she said that the name of the company that runs to Marion is the same as that company that runs to Camden, and that, of her own knowledge, she did not know what that name was—she only knew that their literature (referring to order book and the checks in which the intestate received his monthly wages) said it was. The checks and order book were shown in evidence. The checks were drawn at Blacksburg, S. C., by A. Tripp, superintendent, and at the top of it was printed, "South Carolina and Georgia Extension Railroad Company: Pay Roll 2." The order book which was delivered to the intestate contained, as prefatory to the rules, the following printed statement: "No. 555. This book is the property of the South Carolina and Georgia Extension Railroad Company and is loaned to J. D. Metcalf, engineer, who hereby agrees to return it to the proper officer when called for, or upon leaving the service." He signed it. The evidence of that witness did not tend to show that the intestate was employed by the defendant company. E. F. Dougherty, a witness for the defendant, on the other hand, testified that at the time of the intestate's death he was train dispatcher of the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company, and that the intestate on the day of his death was sent out by him from Blacksburg to Marion in charge of an engine and train; that he had never been employed or paid by the defendant company. There was a contention on the part of the plaintiff, both in this court and in the court below, that the defendant company and the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad of South Carolina were either partners or joint operators of the two corporations, using the name of the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company as the name under which they operated their partnership or joint interest business; and his honor submitted that view to the jury upon the following instruction: "The charter of the defendant company, ratified on February 1, 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 129, c. 35), provides that it may consolidate with any other company in this state or any other state, and it provides further how such consolidation shall be effected, and that the consolidated company shall be a legal corporation when certain papers mentioned in the charter should be filed with the Secretary of State. If the jury find from the evidence that these two corporations were doing business over the line of road in North Carolina and South Carolina under the name of South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company, and there was no such corporation as this last-named concern, but that it was a combination of the two corporations, operated under a common set of officers and from a common treasury, then the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company of North Carolina would be liable for torts as a joint operator of the property under the name and style of the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company." The evidence on which that contention was submitted to the jury was: That trains of cars ran daily from Blacksburg to Marion and returned. The testimony of Dougherty, who said that he was the train dispatcher of the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company; that A. Tripp was the superintendent of the same road; that Nutting was supervisor of bridges and building; that Maxwell was supervisor of roadway; that they all lived in Blacksburg, S. C.; that the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company ran from Marion to Camden; and that he did not know of any different company that ran from Marion to Blacksburg. The fact, too, that the acts of Assembly incorporating the defendant company in North Carolina, and that of the South Carolina Legislature incorporating the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company of South Carolina, with the same corporations in both, authorized each of the companies to lease, or lease to or consolidate with, any other railroad company, and the fact that no such lease or consolidation had been made or effected, were relied upon to give color and force to the contention that, instead of a consolidation between the two companies, they had agreed upon a joint management of the business of the two roads, and a division of the profits. I cannot see how that evidence tends to prove the contention. If there had been no consolidation, in law, of the two companies, and there is no evidence that there had been, and the name of the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company is a myth, the evidence tends rather to show that the South Carolina & Georgia Extension Railroad Company of South Carolina is the real power which is operating the defendant road, for the officers who control it live in South Carolina, on its line of railway, and its trains start from Blacksburg and return the same day, and the defendant company has no cars or engines. To me it seems that the defendant company has no part in the actual management of its road, and, if it is interested in the profits, there is no evidence of it.

I think there ought to be a new trial.

BARNES v. WILSON COUNTY COM'RS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 12, 1904.)

LIQUOR LICENSE — ISSUANCE — DISCRETION OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS—MANDAMUS.

1. Under Acts 1903, p. 288, c. 233, providing that liquor shall not be sold except in cities and towns where the sale is not prohibited; providing for an election to be held in any city or town on certain conditions being complied with; declaring that, if a majority of votes be cast in favor of the sale of liquor, the board of county commissioners shall grant license to all persons applying for the same according to law, but that one may not sell liquor except on a full compliance with the conditions and requirements of law which may now or hereafter be imposed by law; and page 342, c. 247, § 66, providing that, in towns and cities where the vote shall be for license, the county commissioners shall grant an order to the sheriff to issue license, subject to the provisions of the section, one of which is that, on application duly made, and full compliance with stated requirements, the commissioners may grant an order to the sheriff to issue such license—the commissioners have a discretion in the matter of granting licenses, which cannot be controlled by mandamus.

2. The motion of plaintiff in mandamus proceedings, on the pleadings and admissions of defendant, for a mandamus, is in the nature of a demurrer ore tenus to the answer, involving the admission of the facts set out therein.

Douglas, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Moore, Judge.

Action by L. A. Barnes against the commissioners of Wilson county for mandamus. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

This is an action brought by the plaintiff, in which he seeks to have issued a writ of mandamus, directed to the commissioners of the county of Wilson, requiring them to issue to him a license to retail liquors. As the case was heard on complaint and answer, it will be necessary to set out the substance of the pleadings. The plaintiff alleges that he is a bona fide resident and citizen of the said county, and a legal voter therein; that the town of Black Creek is and has been an incorporated town in said county for many years, and that on the 19th of October, 1903, in accordance with the provisions of chapter 233, p. 283, of the Public Laws of 1903 (Watts Law), an election was duly held in said town to determine whether or not liquor should be sold, a majority of the votes having been cast in favor of the sale of liquor; that in the following January the plaintiff applied to the board of commissioners of the town of Black Creek for a license to sell liquors for six months from the first Monday of January, 1904, which license was granted. Afterwards an application was made by him to the defendants for an order to be issued to the sheriff of said county, directing him to issue license to the plaintiff to retail liquors in Black Creek; the plaintiff, at the time of, his application to the defendants, having exhibited to them his license issued by the commissioners of Black Creek. Plaintiff then alleges that, in making his said application to the defendants, he accompanied it with the necessary affidavits of six freeholders, who were taxpayers and residents of Black Creek, as to his being a suitable person, and as to the suitability of the place at which he proposed to conduct his business, and that he presented sufficient proof of all the other facts required to be shown in order to entitle him to a license, and, further, that in all other respects he complied with the law, and was ready and willing to pay to the sheriff the fees and tax required by law to be paid in such cases. The plaintiff's application was refused by a vote of three against and two in favor of issuing license. Plaintiff further alleges that no evidence was introduced before the board to show that plaintiff was not a proper person to sell liquors, nor that the place where he proposed to sell was not a suitable one, and that the majority of the board who voted against granting him license did not exercise their discretion, if under the law they have the right to do so, but, on the contrary, arbitrarily refused to grant license to all parties who applied for license to sell liquors in the other incorporated towns of said county. Plaintiff prayed for a mandamus to compel the defendants to order the sheriff to issue to them a license to sell liquors at the place designated in his application. The defendants answered, and admitted the allegations of the complaint, except the allegation that the majority of the board did not exercise their discretion, but arbitrarily refused to grant a license, and this was denied. The defendants further averred: "That on the first Monday in January, 1904, at the regular meeting of the board of county commissioners of Wilson county, the plaintiff filed with said board an application, in the manner and form required by law, asking for an order from said board to the sheriff of Wilson county, directing and commanding said sheriff to issue to the plaintiff a license to sell spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors in the town of Black Creek, in the county of Wilson. That at said meeting a number of other applications were also filed with said board for a like order. That, in order to expedite the investigation and consideration of said applications, the defendant board set the hour of 2 p. m. on said day as the time at which the investigation and consideration of said applications should be taken up. That at said hour the said board entered into investigation and consideration of said applications, and the balance of the day was taken up in such investigation and consideration. That said board then adjourned to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. of the next day to continue such investigation and consideration, and that said board met at said hour on the following day, and continued such investigation and consideration. That, after an extended investigation and consideration, the application of this plaintiff and the application of each of the other parties applying for license as aforesaid were separately balloted upon by the members of said board. That, when the ballot on the plaintiff's application was counted, it appeared that four of the members of the said board had voted against the granting of the order asked, and that one of the members had voted in favor thereof, whereupon the chairman of the board announced that the plaintiff's application had been rejected." A copy of the minutes of the said meeting and the adjourned meeting is attached, and asked to be taken as a part of the answer. "That the application of this plaintiff and the application of each and every other person filed with said board for the purpose of obtaining a license to retail liquors as aforesaid was separately considered and investigated by said board, and that the ballot taken thereon was in each case separate. That said defendant, board of commissioners of Wilson county, is advised, informed, and believes, and upon such advice, information, and belief aver, that the law imposes upon said board the duty and responsibility of granting or refusing to grant all licenses to retail spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors in the county of Wilson, and that the law further imposes upon said board the duty and responsibility of investigating and considering and passing upon the suitability of each and every application, and the fitness of the place at which said applicant proposes to carry on business, and the duty of investigating and considering all other matters and things pertaining to the issuing of said license, and the proper regulation thereof, and that the law also vests in said board a legal discretion in passing upon such application. That the refusal of the defendant, the board of commissioners of Wilson county, to grant to the plaintiff a license to retail liquors as aforesaid, was based upon the exercise of such legal discretion; and the defendant expressly alleges that it did exercise such discretion in refusing to grant the application of the plaintiff, and that such refusal was based upon, and was for, reasons which to said board seemed proper. That said board of commissioners expressly deny that the members thereof, either as a board or as individuals, or jointly or severally, or by any agreement, express or implied, arbitrarily refused to grant to the plaintiff, or to any other person applying therefor, a license to retail liquor. On the contrary, the defendant alleges that each application was separately considered and voted upon, and that, in each and every case where license was refused, the said board, considering the responsibility and duty imposed upon it by law, carefully considered each application in all its phases, and that the refusal to grant the applicant a license as aforesaid was in the careful and diligent exercise of the legal discretion which said board is advised, informed, and believes is vested in it by law, and was the result of a careful investigation and consideration of facts known to the members of said board."

The case came on to be heard, whereupon the following judgment was rendered: "This cause coming on to be heard, and having been heard, now, upon motion of the plaintiff for judgment upon the pleadings in the cause, and the admission of the defendants in open court that the plaintiff, L. A. Barnes, is a proper person to sell spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, it is considered, ordered, and adjudged that the defendant, the board of commissioners of Wilson county, forthwith assemble at the courthouse in the town of Wilson, North Carolina, and, after due notice to the plaintiff, hear such testimony as may be offered at said meeting as to the question whether the building specified in the plaintiff's application is a suitable place for carrying on the business of selling spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, and, after hearing such testimony, find whether the said building is a proper place for carrying on said business or not, and record its finding upon said question upon the records of the said board of commissioners of Wilson county. It is further ordered and adjudged that if the said board of commissioners shall find that the building specified in plaintiff's application for license to sell spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors is a suitable place for carrying on said business, the said board of commissioners of Wilson county forthwith issue its order to the sheriff of Wilson county to issue to the plaintiff license to sell spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, as prayed for in his application heretofore filed with said board, upon the payment by the said plaintiff of the taxes and fees required by law. It is further ordered and adjudged that if for any cause the said board of commissioners of Wilson county, after hearing testimony as to the suitability of the said building for the purpose aforesaid, shall fail or refuse to issue the said order to the sheriff of Wilson county, the said board of commissioners shall on Friday, the 19th day of February, 1904, show cause before the undersigned judge of the superior court at Wilson, N. C., why a peremptory mandamus should not be issued against the said board, commanding the said board to issue the said order to the sheriff of Wilson county." To the judgment the defendants duly excepted and appealed.

Connor & Connor, F. A. Daniels and W. A. Lucas, for appellants. Shepherd & Shepherd and F. A. & S. A. Woodard, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the case). The discussion of this case may be conveniently divided into three parts: (1) What was the law in regard to the nature of the discretion of the commissioners in granting licenses prior to the passage of the act of 1903, p. 288, c. 233 (Watts Law)? (2) Has the law been changed by that act so as to limit their discretion, and, if so, to what extent? (3) Was the particular judgment rendered by the court erroneous in any view of the case?

It was provided by Rev. St. c. 83, § 7, that every person wishing to retail liquors by the small measure shall apply to the court of pleas and quarter sessions, and obtain an order therefor, which order shall be granted by the said court upon the applicant showing satisfactorily to the court his good moral character by at least two witnesses of known respectability. This statute was reviewed by this court in Attorney General v. Justices of Guilford County, 27 N. C. 315, and a substantial statement of what was therein decided will shed much light upon the question now in hand. The true meaning and signification of the language used in the Revised Statutes was elaborately considered by the court, and the conclusion it reached, and the reasons for it, were stated with great learning and ability by Ruffin, C. J. We understand these to be the principles of law settled by that decision: The justices of the county court were not bound to grant a license to retail spirituous liquors to every one who proved himself of good moral character; nor had they, on the other hand, the arbitrary power to refuse, at their will, all applicants for license who had the qualifications required by the statute. They had the right to exercise only a sound, legal discretion, referring itself to the wants and convenience of the people, to the particular location in which the retailing was to be carried on, and to the number of retailers that were required for the public accommodation. The justices having a discretion, to a certain extent, in granting licenses to retail, a mandamus will not lie to compel them to grant a license to any particular individual, though he may have been improperly refused a license. But if magistrates, fully informed that they have discretion to regulate a branch of the public police (as, in this case, in granting licenses to retailers), perversely abuse their discretion by obstinately resolving not to exercise it at all, or by exercising it in a way purposely to defeat the legislative intention or to oppress an individual, such an intentional, and therefore corrupt, violation of duty and law must be answered for on indictment. In regard to the right of the courts to review this discretion of the commissioners—in that case the justices—Ruffin, C. J., says: "A mandamus lies only for one who has a specific legal right, and is without any other specific remedy. 1 Chitt. Genl. Pr. 790; State v. Moore County, 24 N. C. 430. If, in this case, the sheriff were to refuse to give a license after the court had made an order for it, the redress would be by mandamus, as the specific remedy, as well as by action for the damages, for the party has a positive right to it from the sheriff. But when we decide that the justices have a discretion, under circumstances, to refuse a license to the relator, although he be a fit person, we, in effect, decide that he cannot have a mandamus. For it is the nature of a discretion in certain persons that they are to judge for themselves, and therefore no power can require them to decide in a particular way, or review their decision by way of appeal, or by any proceeding in the nature of an appeal, since the judgment of the justices would not then be their own, but that of the court under whose mandate they gave it." He cites several cases from the English courts, showing that they had steadily refused to review or revise a decision based on the discretion or judgment of the justices, either by an appeal or by mandamus or any other remedial process. Discussing the right of review by an appeal, he refers to Lord Mansfield as disclaiming any power to review the reasons of the justices or to overrule the discretion intrusted to them, and as holding that, if they were partially, maliciously, or corruptly influenced in the exercise of their discretion, and abused the trust reposed in them, they are liable to prosecution by indictment, and possibly even to a civil action for damages. Again says the chief justice: "The distinction between the different methods of proceeding is perfectly intelligible. The mandamus will not lie, because by law the justices, with local knowledge, are to judge for themselves, and the judges of a higher court are not to dictate to them. But the indictment will lie, because, although the law allows the justices to judge for themselves, it requires an honest judgment, in subordination to the law, and punishes a dishonest one; that is, one given in opposition to the known law."

It is settled, therefore, that the discretion confided to the commissioners is not merely a personal and arbitrary one, and that they cannot convert the discretion to refuse a license to unfit persons, or, after enough have already been granted, to refuse further applications, into an arbitrary discretion and despotic resolution to grant a license to no person under any circumstances. "There is no arbitrary power that would be felt to be more unreasonably despotic, and galling than that under which a small body of inferior court magistracy should undertake, upon their mere will, without any plain mandate from the lawmaking power, to set up their taste and habits as to meat, drink, or apparel as the standard for regulating those of the people at large. For ages past, sumptuary laws have been abandoned. The Legislature does not affect to assert that policy." Attorney General v. Justices, 27 N. C. 321, 326.

But while their discretion is not an arbitrary one, this is far from proving that the courts can by the writ of mandamus coerce the commissioners into exercising that discretion in favor of any particular person or in any particular way. If the case of Attorney General v. Justices decides anything, it certainly decides that a mandamus will not be issued for the purpose of compelling the body invested with the discretion of granting or refusing a license to issue a license to a person whose application has been rejected by them. In that case the justices refused the application upon the single ground that their power to do so was absolute. No stronger case for a mandamus, if one can issue in any case, could have been presented, and yet the court adjudged that, "because this is not a case for a mandamus, the judgment of the court must be reversed, and the motion for a peremptory mandamus is refused." The case of Attorney General v. Justices was reviewed at some length in Muller v. Commissioners, 89 N. C. 171, and was approved. It is true that Ashe, J., who wrote the opinion of the court, did not refer specifically to the question whether the decision of the commissioners was the subject of review, or whether their discretion could be controlled by mandamus, for it was not necessary to do so, as the court held that the commissioners certainly had a discretion, which in that case was shown to have been properly and legally exercised by them. In Tapping on Mandamus (Ed. 1853) at pages *14 and *41, we find it stated generally that mandamus will not lie to command the exercise of a discretionary or voluntary act or right of what kind soever; so neither does it lie to influence or control the exercise of such a discretionary act, power, or right. It must, however, be clearly understood that, although there may be a discretionary power, yet, if it be exercised wrongfully or with manifest injustice, the court is not precluded from commanding its due exercise. So, when one is to act according to his discretion, and he will not act, nor consider the matter, the court will by mandamus command him to put himself in motion to do it; that is, to hear and determine or to inquire so that he may exercise a considerate discretion. "There is therefore no instance of a mandamus to compel an 'approval,' but the court will by its writ compel an inquiry, and in so doing it does not at all interfere with the exercise of such discretion." Tapping, p. *15. The writ does not lie to command the justices to license a victualer to sell ale, notwithstanding it was suggested that the refusal proceeded from a mistaken view of their jurisdiction, and also notwithstanding a very strong case of partiality was made out, for it is a matter entirely within their discretion. The proper course in such a case is to move for a criminal information. Nor does it lie to rehear an application for license which they have refused because of a mistaken notion as to the law. Tapping, p. 41. The rule is thus stated by another author: "We come next to consider of a fundamental rule underlying the entire jurisdiction by mandamus, and especially applicable in determining the limits to the exercise of the jurisdiction over public officers. That rule is that in all matters requiring the exercise of official judgment, or resting in the sound discretion of the person to whom a duty is confided by law, mandamus will not lie either to control the exercise of that discretion, or to determine upon the decision which shall be finally given. And whenever public officers are vested with power of a discretionary nature as to the performance of any official duty, or, in reaching a given result of official action, they are required to exercise any degree of judgment, while it is proper by mandamus to set them in motion, and to require their action upon all matters officially intrusted to their judgment and discretion, the courts will in no manner interfere with the exercise of their discretion, nor attempt by mandamus to control or dictate the judgment to be given." High on Extraordinary Legal Rem. p. 50, § 42 et seq.

Where discretion had been given to commissioners in selecting and locating a site for the seat of justice for a county, and it was sought by mandamus to compel them to change the location already made, this court, after stating that the business had been intrusted to the discretion of the commissioners, said: "If the defendants had neglected or refused to execute the power intrusted to them, we certainly might call upon them to show cause why they had been so negligent, and, upon insufficient return, might have issued a peremptory mandamus. Here, all we could do would be to command them to select the site for the permanent seat of justice for the county according to law, which, under their oaths, they say they have done." State v. Bonner, 44 N. C. 257. In a case similar to the last one cited it was said by this court that "it may be conceded that they ought to have selected the lot on Coleman's land, but, not having done so, and having passed on and made a different selection, the writ will not lie, because it would be but a command to make a different selection from the one which they had thought proper to adopt." Herbert v. Sanderson, 60 N. C. 282. In Buckman v. Com., 80 N. C. 128, the doctrine is thus stated: "Upon the commissioners alone devolves the obligation, and upon them rests the responsibility, of deciding upon the sufficiency of the bond, under the penalty of incurring a personal liability as a surety for taking a bond known or believed to be insufficient. We can compel them to proceed and act, but we cannot control or interfere with the honest exercise of their judgment and discretion." That case cites and approves what is said by Tapping and High, which has already been mentioned by us. See, also, Young v. Jeffries, 20 N. C., at page 221; State v. Moore, 46 N. C., at page 279; Taylor v. Commissioners, 55 N. C., at page 145, 64 Am. Dec. 566; Railroad v. Jenkins, 68 N. C. 504; County Board v. State Board, 106 N. C. 81, 10 S. E. 1002. Consulting the English cases, we find that there are many in which this precise question has been presented for adjudication. The uniform course of decision has been to deny the writ when there is any discretion. In Rex v. Justices of Nottingham, Sayer, Rep. 216, Ryder, C. J., presiding in the court of King's Bench, and speaking for the court upon a rule to show cause why an information for a misdemeanor should not be filed, said: "It has been truly said that the power of licensing public houses is so absolutely in the discretion of the justices of the peace that this court will never award a mandamus for the licensing of a public house, but it is equally true that the abuse of a discretionary power ought to be more severely punished than the abuse of a power which is not discretionary. In the present cases it appears manifestly that the power of licensing public houses was very grossly abused." The rule was made absolute; that is, the refusal, under the circumstances, was held to be indictable, but not to present a case for mandamus. In Rex v. Young, 1 Burrows, 560, Lord Mansfield, sitting in the same court, made a like ruling, and said: "There was no pretense upon any other foot than that of criminality, to make a rule upon the justices, who have a discretionary jurisdiction given them by the law. But though discretion does mean and can mean nothing else but exercising the best of their judgment upon the occasion that calls for it, yet, if this discretion is willfully abused, it is criminal, and ought to be under the control of the court." He then states that the court cannot review the reasons of the justices by appeal, or by overruling their discretion, but that the control of the court could be exercised only by an indictment, or perhaps by civil action at the instance of the party injured.

The Supreme Court of the United States has frequently had similar questions before it for decision, and has invariably held that, when there is discretion, mandamus will not lie to control or reverse it. In Gaines v. Thompson, 7 Wall. 847, 19 L. Ed. 62, that court, through Miller, J., said: "The court could not entertain an appeal from the decision of one of the secretaries, nor revise his judgment, in any case where the law authorized him to exercise judgment or discretion. Nor can it by mandamus act directly upon the officer, and guide and control his judgment or discretion in the matters committed to his care, in the ordinary exercise of his official duties. [Citing cases.] It may, however, be suggested that the relief sought in all those cases was through the writ of mandamus, and that the decisions are based upon the special principles applicable to the use of that writ. This is only true so far as these principles assert the general doctrine that an officer to whom public duties are confided by law is not subject to the control of the courts in the exercise of the judgment and discretion which the law reposes in him as a part of his official functions. Certain powers and duties are confided to those officers, and to them alone; and however the courts may, in ascertaining the rights of parties in suits properly before them, pass upon the legality of their acts, after the matter has once passed beyond their control there exists no power in the court, by any of its processes, to act upon the officer so as to interfere with the exercise of that judgment while the matter is properly before him for action. The reason for this is that the law reposes this discretion in him for that occasion, and not in the courts. The doctrine therefore is as applicable to the writ of injunction as it is to the writ of mandamus." To the same effect are Cox v. U. S. ex rel McGarrahan, 9 Wall. 298, 19 L. Ed. 579, and numerous cases therein cited.

The rule is strongly stated in a recent treatise (Bailey on Jurisdiction, vol. 2, § 572) as follows: "That the writ will not lie to control judgment or discretion which has been reposed elsewhere is a principle of universal recognition. The judgment and discretion thus conferred is personal to the court, body, or person, and no court can substitute its own judgment and discretion for theirs."

This court, in Eubank v. Turner, 134 N. C. —, 46 S. E. 508, was required to pass upon the right of the plaintiff to a mandamus to compel the defendants, the examining board of the State Dental Society, to issue to him a certificate of proficiency, so that he could practice dentistry in this state. We denied his right to any such relief by mandamus; Chief Justice Clark, for the court, saying: "The granting a certificate to practice involves matters of judgment and discretion on the part of the board, and will not be enforced by mandamus," which "cannot be used as a writ of error to revise and reverse erroneous judgments of a subordinate tribunal, and the court 'will not and cannot look into the evidence of facts upon which the judgment of the board was based for the purpose of determining whether the conclusions drawn from it were correctly or incorrectly formed.'" See, also, Wise v. Bigger, 79 Va. 269.

While there may be authorities to the contrary elsewhere, the result of judicial decision in this state is that the body clothed with the discretion cannot by any process of the court be compelled to do anything but exercise that discretion—to act in accordance with the law—and, while the court may do this, it has no power or jurisdiction to direct the course the exercise of the discretion shall take, in order to bring about any given result. It cannot order a license to issue, but its coercive power is exhausted when it requires them to inquire and decide, by the fair and honest exercise of their judgment, whether the applicant is entitled to license or not.

The next question to be considered is whether the act of 1903, called in the argument the "Watts Law," has changed the law in any material respect, so as to render the foregoing principles inapplicable. After a careful examination of that act, our conclusion is that it has not, but that in all material respects, so far as the question now under consideration is concerned, the law in every essential particular is the same now as it was before that act was passed. The act of 1903 provides that liquors shall not be sold except in incorporated cities and towns wherein the sale is not now or hereafter prohibited by law, with certain exceptions not applicable in this case. It then provides for an election to be held in any city or town upon certain conditions being complied with, and declares that, if a majority of votes be cast in favor of the sale of liquors, "the board of county commissioners of the county and the governing board of such city or town, shall grant license to sell liquors in such city or town to all proper persons applying for the same according to law," the license to be granted until another election reversing the result of the voting; but no person is authorized to sell liquors, even when such an election has been held, and resulted in favor of the sale of liquors in the city or town, "except upon a full compliance with the conditions and requirements which may now or hereafter be imposed by law." We think it clearly appears from the language of the act that it was not intended to change the method of granting license to sell liquors. The mere fact that there has been a majority of votes cast at an election in favor of the sale of liquors does not make it mandatory upon the commissioners to grant license upon the mere compliance with certain requirements of the act, but it merely authorizes the board to grant license under the general law, when, if there had been an unfavorable vote, they could not do so. They have now the same discretion that they had before the act was passed. The words "shall grant license," used in the act, do not withdraw from the board the discretion it had under the general law, but were intended simply to confer authority which should be exercised in strict subordination to the general law. This is so on principle and authority, as we think. A statute will not be construed to repeal or even to modify another statute unless the intention so to do appears, or unless such a construction is required on account of a conflict between the provisions of the two statutes; but, if they can be reconciled so that both can have effect, this will be done, as that is presumed to have been the intention. There is everything in this statute to show that the intention was as we have above stated it to be. There is no conflict, and the two acts may well stand together, and have full force and effect in every part of each of them.

But the question as to the true interpretation of the act has, it seems to us, been virtually decided by this court in a case presenting facts substantially the same as those in the case at bar. In Commissioners v. Commissioners, 107 N. C. 335, 12 S. E. 92, an election had been held in the town of Maxton, under and by virtue of the provisions of sections 75 and 76 of chapter 25, p. 822, of the Private Acts of 1887, to determine whether liquors should be sold in that town. The act provided that, if the majority of the votes be "for license," then the commissioners shall grant license, but not otherwise. It was contended in that case, as it is now contended in this, that these were words of command, but this court held that they did not change the law in respect to the discretion of the commissioners under the general act. The case is directly in point, and must control in the construction of the act of 1903. Indeed no two cases could be more alike in respect to the precise question presented in each. But if we did not have the authority of that case to support our ruling, we would not hesitate to hold, upon other considerations than those already stated, that the act of 1903 clearly did not, and was not intended to, change the law, so as to require the commissioners to issue license without exercising their discretion, when a majority of the votes cast at any election held in accordance with its provisions were in favor of the sale of liquors. Section 2 of the act makes it unlawful for any person to sell liquors in any incorporated town without first obtaining a license as provided by law both from the county and town commissioners, and, even when a favorable vote has been cast at an election held under the act, an application must be made "according to law," and there must be "a full compliance with the conditions and requirements which may now or hereafter be imposed by law" (section 11); and by section 68 of the revenue act (Acts 1903, p. 342, c. 247) it is further provided that "in such towns and cities where the qualified voters shall hereafter, under a special act of the General Assembly, vote in favor of license, then the county commissioners shall grant an order to the sheriff to issue license, subject to all the provisions of this section," one of which provisions is that upon application duly made, and a full compliance with the requirements as therein stated, "the commissioners may grant an order to the sheriff to issue such license." (Italics ours.) Even if the word "shall" had been used throughout, instead of the word "may," we have seen that it would have reposed a discretion in the commissioners. Attorney General v. Justices, supra, and Muller v. Com'rs, supra. It is interesting to note the varying phraseology used in the statutes concerning the sale of liquor, denoting, perhaps, the fluctuations of public sentiment upon this question. The law as contained in the Revised Statutes and the Revised Code, which was construed in the cases of Attorney General v. Justices and Muller v. Commissioners, remained as it was there written, without any substantial alteration, until by the act of 1893, p. 251, c. 294, § 83, it was changed so as to read, "Upon the filing of such application and affidavit, the commissioners shall, without the exercise of discretion, grant an order to the sheriff to issue such license." And this continued to be the law until by the act of 1897, p. 238, c. 163, § 34, the words "without the exercise of discretion," were stricken out, and the words "may grant" substituted for the words "shall grant." Whether this change in the form of expression was intended to confer upon the commissioners an absolute discretion—that is, a larger discretion than they before had—as contended by defendant's counsel, we will not undertake to decide, as it is not necessary to do so in order to dispose of this appeal. It is sufficient for us now to hold, as we do, that the commissioners still have a discretion to grant or refuse license, and, while this discretion must be exercised in a manner fair, candid, and unprejudiced, and not arbitrary, capricious, or biased—much less, warped by resentment or personal dislike—it cannot be controlled by mandamus. The court can only insist on a conscientious judgment being used in the exercise of the power of choosing or rejecting, but cannot itself exercise the power, nor substitute its own conscience for that of the board, or its own sense of fitness for the approval or disapproval of that other tribunal, for to do so would be in direct violation of the statute. In passing upon the question whether they will or will not grant a license, "they have," in the language of this court, "a limited legal discretion, and may consider all questions and matters which pertain to the welfare of the community." Mathis v. Commissioners, 122 N. C. 419, 30 S. E. 23. But this does not mean that they may use this discretion for the purpose of advancing or vindicating their own views or opinions upon the general policy of selling liquor. This policy has been settled by the decision of the Legislature and the vote of the people, to which they must yield a ready obedience; and the discretion must therefore be exercised by them in strict submission to this declared policy, and with a scrupulous regard to the right of the applicant to have a fair and impartial hearing, and a just decision, whether for him or against him, and, subject to those limitations, they are a law unto themselves.

Counsel for the plaintiff, in their well-prepared brief, urge upon our attention the case of Loughran v. Hickory, 129 N. C. 281, 40 S. E. 46, as an authority sustaining the ruling of the court below, but we do not agree with the counsel. In that case the court distinctly recognizes the right of the board, in the exercise of its discretion, to pass not only upon the fitness of the applicant and the suitability of the place, but also upon "other matters which might possibly arise." Surely the court in that case did not intend to overrule Attorney General v. Justices, Muller v. Commissioners, and the other cases holding that the commissioners had a discretion which could not be taken from them by mandamus, without even referring to those cases. We rather think that in that case the court intended to adhere to its previous decisions upon the same question.

One question still remains to be considered: Was the particular judgment rendered by the court erroneous in any view of the case? We think it was, even if the court could control the discretion of the commissioners. In the first place, the court required the board simply to find whether the building is suitable, and, upon the finding that it is, commands the board to issue license upon the payment of the tax, and if, after hearing testimony as to the suitability of the building, they refuse or fail to make an order for the license to issue, then to show cause why a peremptory writ of mandamus should not issue. The judgment of the court is based entirely upon the theory that, after finding that the applicant is a fit person, and that the building is suitable, and the other recited facts, the commissioners have no discretion left in the matter. This is an error, for the statute expressly provides that, even when those facts are found, the commissioners may grant license, and not that they must do so. If it had been intended to take away from them all discretion upon such a finding, the Legislature would have used not merely a word importing permission, or one implying the exercise of a discretion, but a word of command. It was therefore in contravention of the statute thus to deprive them of their right to exercise that discretion. In the second place, the defendants have made a full and frank avowal in their answer of what they did in passing upon the application, and they aver that each application was fully and fairly investigated and carefully considered by them, and that they refused to grant the order for the license to issue to the plaintiff in the exercise of the sound legal discretion vested in them by the law. It appears from the answer that the defendants have done their full duty in the premises.

The mandamus act (Code, § 623) provides that when an issue of fact arises before the judge who has jurisdiction in a case like this, which is not brought for the enforcement of a money demand, it shall be the duty of the court, upon the motion of either party, to continue the action until said issue of fact can be tried by a jury. The plaintiff did not see fit to avail himself of this provision of the law, but elected rather to move, upon the pleadings, and the admission of the defendants that plaintiff is a proper person to sell liquors, for a mandamus. This was in the nature of a demurrer ore tenus to the answer, which involves the admission of the facts set out in the answer. The plaintiff had the right to adopt this course, but he must, in this court, be held to the course he saw fit to pursue in the court below; and this was the view taken by the judge as to the effect of plaintiff's motion, for it was held that, notwithstanding the averments of the answer, the plaintiff was entitled to a mandamus, if it was found by the board that the proposed place of sale is a suitable one. In Com'rs v. Com'rs, 107 N. C. 335, 12 S. E. 92, a similar answer was filed, and the plaintiff demurred to the answer. The demurrer was overruled and the action dismissed, and that ruling was affirmed by this court. There is no difference, in principle, in such a case as this, between a demurrer to the answer and a motion for judgment upon the answer, which, as we have said, is a demurrer ore tenus. In Attorney General v. Justices, supra, the plaintiff filed his petition for a mandamus, and an alternative writ was issued. The return to the writ was not traversed by the plaintiff, but he moved for a peremptory writ upon the ground that the return or answer to the alternative writ, which merely stated that the justices had refused to grant a license to any person, although plaintiff was admitted to be a proper person, was insufficient, and entitled him to a license if one were to be granted at all; but the court refused to issue the writ, and dismissed the action, with costs against the plaintiff. When, as in this case, the plaintiff moves for judgment upon the pleadings, and introduces no evidence to sustain the allegations of his complaint, we must, under the mandamus act, necessarily assume the facts to be as stated in the answer; and, upon those facts, we now adjudge that the plaintiff is not entitled to the writ of mandamus, and the case must therefore be remanded, with directions to dismiss the action.

HUNTER v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 17, 1904.)

TELEGRAPHS—FAILURE TO DELIVER—DAMAGES—MENTAL ANGUISH—TRAVELING EXPENSES—RELATIONSHIP OF PLAINTIFF AND DECEASED—KNOWLEDGE OF DEFENDANT—APPEAL AND ERROR—DEFECTIVE ISSUE.

1. In an action against a telegraph company to recover damages for mental anguish suffered by plaintiff by failure of defendant to deliver a message, the issues and answers thereto were, first, was the defendant guilty of negligence as alleged in the complaint? which was answered in the affirmative; and, second, what damages, if any, has the plaintiff sustained on account of mental anguish? which was answered, "$150." Held, that the second issue was defective for failure to directly present the causal relation between the negligence of the defendant and the damages sustained.

2. Such defect is not cause for reversal by the court of its own motion, where both parties acquiesced in the form of the issues, and no exception was taken.

3. In an action against a telegraph company to recover damages for failure to deliver a message announcing the death of a person, the plaintiff cannot recover his expenses in going to the deceased.

4. In an action against a telegraph company for damages for mental anguish suffered by plaintiff from the failure of defendant to deliver a message announcing the death of a person, the fact that the deceased is only a second cousin of plaintiff does not, as matter of law, bar a recovery.

5. In an action against a telegraph company for damages for failure to deliver a message announcing the death of a person and date of burial, the lack of knowledge on the part of the company of the relation between plaintiff and deceased is immaterial.

Connor, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action by T. A. Hunter against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages caused by the non-delivery of a telegram addressed to the plaintiff, announcing the death of a second cousin, a child five years of age. The telegram was as follows: "Scott died last night; will be buried to-morrow morning." The plaintiff, T. A. Hunter, was allowed, under objection and exception by the defendant, to testify, among other things: "That he came to Greensboro many years ago, and that for several years next thereafter he lived in the family of his cousin, J. S. Hunter, who was the father of the child Scott, mentioned in the telegram. That he married seven years before the death of the child. That he had not lived in J. S. Hunter's family for six years last before the death of the child, but had lived across the street from him. The child was only five years old when he died. That he was born a year after he quit living in the family of J. S. Hunter. That by reason of the relationship and close association he saw a great deal of the child from time to time, and loved him very much. That he stood next to his own children in his affections. That he thought a great deal of the little fellow. He was a bright little chap. That he had him on his knee often, and naturally thought a great deal of him. He was very dear to me." That he could have gotten home to the funeral if the message had been delivered any time prior to 12 o'clock on the night of the 15th, and that his failure to be at the funeral caused him great pain and anguish of mind. The witness figured up his actual traveling expenses and other things in coming and going to a sum not exceeding $18.80, and claimed damages in addition thereto for mental anguish caused by not being at the funeral of the child Scott. The defendant objected and excepted to the action of the court in allowing the plaintiff to testify in regard to his affection for the child, and his anguish and suffering, and insisted that the degree of relationship was too remote to be regarded as an element for damages in this case. The defendant presented in writing the following prayers for special instructions, which were refused: "(3) It being admitted that Scott, referred to in the pleadings and in the message, was a second cousin of the plaintiff, such relationship was so remote that the failure to get the message in time to be present at the funeral is not the basis for a claim for damages, and the consequent mental anguish therefrom is too remote. You will therefore not consider that in making up your verdict. (4) Mental anguish on the part of the plaintiff is not an element of damages in this case, it being admitted that the relationship between plaintiff and Scott mentioned in the telegram was second cousins. (5) There is no evidence that the defendant had any knowledge of any peculiar or intimate relations existing between plaintiff and the child Scott, and, in the absence of such, it being admitted that Scott was the son of a cousin of the plaintiff, the plaintiff cannot recover anything for or on account of mental anguish. (6) If the plaintiff is entitled to recover anything, it is only his actual expenses in coming to Greensboro and returning to his business." Upon the second issue the court charged the jury, among other things, in substance, that, if they believed the evidence, they would find that J. S. Hunter was the father of the Scott referred to in the telegram, and that the plaintiff and J. S. Hunter were first cousins, and that from such relationship there is no presumption that the plaintiff suffered mental anguish on account of his inability to be present at the funeral of the child, Scott; but that the burden was upon the plaintiff to show by the greater weight of evidence that there existed between the plaintiff and the said Scott such tender ties of love and affection that his inability to be present at the funeral caused him to suffer mental anguish, and that such inability to be present was caused by the negligence of the defendant. The issues and answers thereto were as follows: "(1) Was the defendant guilty of negligence as alleged in the complaint? Yes. (2) What damage, if any, has the plaintiff sustained on account of mental anguish? $150. (3) If so, what damage, if any, has plaintiff sustained on account of expenses incurred? $18.80." The defendant appealed from the judgment rendered. The former opinion in this case is reported in 130 N. C. 602, 41 S. E. 796.

King & Kimball and F. H. Busbee & Son, for appellant. Scales, Taylor & Scales, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. (after stating the facts). Although there is no exception to the issues, and apparently no misunderstanding as to their meaning, we think it better to call attention to the inaccuracy of the second issue. It should read as follows: "What damage, if any, has the plaintiff thereby sustained on account of mental anguish?" Or, "What damage, if any, has the plaintiff sustained on account of mental anguish caused by such negligence?" The exact form of the issue is immaterial, but it should directly present the causal relation between the negligence of the defendant and the damages sustained therefrom by the plaintiff. This is especially important in suits involving mental anguish. The defendant did not contribute to the death of the child in any way, and cannot be held responsible for any anguish or sorrow directly resulting from his death. All that it can be held liable for is the additional anguish caused by its own negligence, which in this case seems to be only the anguish resulting from the failure of the plaintiff to be present at the funeral. We use the word "anguish" as indicating a high degree of mental suffering, without which the plaintiff should not recover substantial damages. Mere disappointment would not amount to mental anguish, or entitle the plaintiff to more than nominal damages. In all cases damages for mental anguish are purely compensatory, and should never exceed a just and reasonable compensation for the injury suffered. As this court has said in Cashion's Case, 124 N. C. 459, 466, 32 S. E. 740, 45 L. R. A. 160: If the defendant has been negligent, it is the duty of the jury "to give to the plaintiff a fair recompense for the anguish she has suffered from such negligence, but from that alone; and in determining the amount they should render to each party exact and equal justice; without the shadow of generosity, which is not a virtue when dealing with the property of others." As both parties seemed to be content with the issues, which may not have caused any confusion in the minds of the jury, we do not feel authorized to set aside the verdict. However, as there might be cases in which such issues would be fatally defective, we deem it better to again call the attention of the profession to the importance of having issues which, either in themselves, or in connection with admissions of record, are sufficient to sustain the judgment. Tucker v. Satterthwaite, 120 N. C. 118, 27 S. E. 45.

We do not think that the plaintiff can recover his expenses coming to Greensboro, as they do not appear to have been caused in any way by the defendant's negligence. If the defendant had been guilty of no negligence whatever, and the telegram had been promptly delivered, the plaintiff would apparently have incurred the same travelling expenses in coming to Greensboro. Therefore the amount of $18.80, found in the third issue, must be stricken out of the judgment.

The defendant contends that, as a matter of law, the plaintiff cannot recover on account of simple inability to attend the funeral of a second cousin, and that, if he can so recover, he can do so only upon the absolute prerequisite that the defendant knew or was informed of the peculiar relations existing between him and the child. Both of these questions have been decided by this court adversely to the defendant. In Cashion's Case, 123 N. C. 267, 31 S. E. 493, it was held that, while the relation of brother-in-law is not sufficiently near to raise any presumption of mental anguish, the actual existence of said anguish, if found as a fact by the jury, would entitle the plaintiff to recover substantial damages. In that case the court says: "It is true that there are certain facts which, when proved, presume mental anguish. The tender ties of love and sympathy existing between husband and wife or parent and child are the common knowledge of the human race, as they are the holiest instincts of the human heart. * * * But beyond the marriage state this presumption extends only to near relatives of kindred blood, as acute affection does not necessarily result from distant kinship or mere affinity. A brother's love is sufficiently universal to raise the presumption, but not so with a brother-in-law, who is often an indifferent stranger, and sometimes an unwelcome intruder in the family circle. It is true that with him such affection may exist, and in the present case doubtless does exist; but it must be shown." In Bennett v. Tel. Co., 128 N. C. 103, 38 S. E. 294, the court, speaking through Clark, J., says: "The objection that the relationship of the sendee [father-in-law] does not entitle the plaintiff to recover for mental anguish by reason of failure to be at his daughter's funeral is answered by the discussion and decision in Cashion v. Tel. Co., 123 N. C. 267 [31 S. E. 493]." This line of decisions has been so recently affirmed and followed in the well-considered opinion in Bright v. Tel. Co., 132 N. C. 317, 43 S. E. 841, that further discussion seems useless. The court, speaking through Walker, J., says on pages 322, 323, 132 N. C., and pages 842, 843, 43 S. E.: "The law does not regard so much the technical relation between the parties, or their legal status in respect to each other, as it does the actual relation that exists, and the state of feeling between them. It does not raise any presumption of mental anguish when there is no relation by blood, but, if mental suffering does actually result from the failure to deliver a message where there is only affinity between the parties, it may be shown, and damages recovered. A woman suddenly bereft of her husband, and who has no father or other relative or friend to whom she can turn in her distress, except the uncle of her husband, might well call upon him for consolation and assistance, especially when, as is abundantly shown in the evidence in this case, he was her husband's nearest living relative, and had reared and educated him and was devoted to her husband and herself, and stood toward them in the place of a parent. She had every right to expect that, as soon as the sad news of the death of her husband had reached him, he would come at once to her, and give her that comfort, consolation, and assistance which she sorely needed. If he was not her father, he entertained for her all of the tender regard and affection of a parent, and was as much interested in her welfare as if he had been her father; and she could therefore reasonably expect that he would do, under the circumstances, precisely what her father would have done if he had been living. It is needless to discuss the question further, as this court has settled it against the defendant. 'We do not mean to say,' says Douglas, J., speaking for the court, 'that damages for mental anguish may not be recovered for the absence of a mere friend, if it actually results; but it is not presumed. The need of a friend may cause real anguish to a helpless widow left alone among strangers with an infant child and the dead body of her husband. In the present case the plaintiff seems to have received the full measure of Christian charity from a generous community; but it may be that she did not expect it, and looked alone to her brother-in-law, whose absence she so keenly felt. If so, she may prove it'—citing Cashion v. Tel. Co., 123 N. C. 267 [31 S. E. 493]."

It will be seen that the cases all proceed upon the principle that the nearness of the relationship is material only where the presumption is relied on; but that mental anguish may exist as a fact where there is no such presumption. In such cases it is a matter of proof, and may be inferred from all the surrounding circumstances, as well as the personal testimony of the plaintiff. The plaintiff is, of course, an interested witness, and his testimony, like that of all such witnesses, should be scrutinized with care; but if, after such scrutiny, the jury believe he has testified truthfully, they should give to his testimony the same weight they would to that of any other credible witness. There is no reason why a party should not become a witness in his own behalf, especially in matters peculiarly within his personal knowledge; and the law does not discredit him for doing so, but simply provides for that just scrutiny by which alone the motives of human conduct can be interpreted.

The second exception is to the refusal of the court to charge that the plaintiff could not recover in the absence of any evidence that the defendant knew or was informed of the peculiar and intimate relations existing between the plaintiff and the deceased child. Such instructions were properly refused, as has been repeatedly held by this court. Sherrill v. Tel. Co., 109 N. C. 527, 14 S. E. 94; Lyne v. Tel. Co., 123 N. C. 129, 31 S. E. 350; Cashion v. Tel. Co., 123 N. C. 267, 31 S. E. 493; Id., 124 N. C. 459, 32 S. E. 746, 45 L. R. A. 160; Laudie v. Tel. Co., 124 N. C. 528, 32 S. E. 886; Hendricks v. Tel. Co., 126 N. C. 304, 35 S. E. 543, 78 Am. St. Rep. 658; Laudie v. Tel. Co., 126 N. C. 481, 35 S. E. 810, 78 Am. St. Rep. 668; Bennett v. Tel. Co., 128 N. C. 103, 38 S. E. 294; Meadows v. Tel. Co., 132 N. C. 40, 43 S. E. 512; Bright v. Tel. Co., 132 N. C. 317, 43 S. E. 841. In Sherrill's Case the telegram was: "Tell Henry to come home; Lou is bad sick." In Lyne's Case it was: "Gregory met accident; not live more 24 26 hours." In Cashion's Case it was: "To J. W. Mock: Come at once, Mr. Cashion is dead, killed at work. John Payne." In Laudie's Case it was: "Frank dead. Meet depot at Wadesboro 8 a. m. Bury him in Chesterfield, grave 3 feet." In Hendricks' Case it was: "Fresh died this morning," and "Come quick, will bury Fresh to-morrow." In Meadows' Case it was: "Will Phillips' wife at point of death." In Bright's Case it was: "Mr. Bright is dead, will bury at Liberty Sunday morning." In that case—132 N. C., at page 324, 43 S. E. 843—Walker, J., speaking for the court, says: "It is not a valid objection to the plaintiff's right of recovery that the message did not sufficiently disclose its purpose, or show that the plaintiff desired Cooper to come to Wadesboro. It has been repeatedly decided by this court in cases where the relationship of the parties was not disclosed, and the special purport of the message could not possibly have been understood, that it was not necessary for the company to know the relation between the sender and sendee from the terms of the message, or to know anything more than that the message is one of importance, and that this should always be inferred from the fact that it relates to the illness or death of a person. When this is the case, it is sufficient to put the company on notice that a failure to deliver will result in mental suffering for which damages may be recovered."

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

CLARK, C. J. (concurring). Mental suffering is as real as physical. Every one who has suffered either is a competent witness that there is no fiction about it. There is the same practical difficulty in measuring compensation for physical anguish as for mental, but the same difficulty arises also in nearly all cases of estimating unliquidated damages. Juries, under the instruction of learned and just judges, who will restrain excessive verdicts, must, upon consideration of all the evidence, award fair compensation. All courts allow compensation for mental suffering, not only when accompanied by physical pain, but in many cases when there is no physical suffering; as in actions for seduction, slander, libel, breach of promise of marriage, and perhaps some others. The courts in the several independent state jurisdictions in this country have not been agreed as to the allowance of damages for mental suffering when it has been caused by the wrongful or negligent conduct of a telegraph company in the delay or nondelivery of what are known as "death messages," but the uniform and unbroken decisions of this court place it among those that allow recovery in such cases. The legal rule laid down is clear and just. "In all cases damages for mental anguish are purely compensatory, and should never exceed a just and reasonable compensation for the injury suffered." And we have just repeated in Bowers v. Tel. Co. (at this term) 47 S. E. 597, that mere disappointment will not amount to mental anguish. When the relationship of the parties is close, the law presumes some mental anguish from the fact that the telegram was sent, the amount of the compensation for the mental suffering caused by the failure to deliver being a matter for the jury upon the evidence. The nearness of the relationship is only material when this presumption is relied upon. There is no better statement of the rule on this point than that to be found in the clearly reasoned opinion of Mr. Justice Walker in Bright v. Tel. Co., 132 N. C. 317, 43 S. E. 841: "The law does not regard so much the technical relation between the parties, or their legal status to each other, as it does the actual relation that exists, and the state of feeling between them. It does not raise any presumption of mental anguish when there is no relation by blood, but, if mental suffering does actually result from the failure to deliver a message (of this nature) where there is only affinity between the parties, it may be recovered. * * * It is not necessary for the company to know the relation between the sender and the sendee from the terms of the message, or to know anything more than that the message is one of importance; and this should always be inferred from the fact that it relates to the illness or death of a person. When this is the case, it is sufficient to put the company on notice that a failure to deliver will result in mental suffering for which damages may be recovered." Since it is established as a fact in this case that there was mental suffering caused by the defendant's failure to deliver the telegram, and there was evidence to prove it, this case does "not fall beyond the limits of the law" which holds the defendant liable to render just compensation for the injury it has inflicted.

WALKER, J. (concurring). The doctrine of mental anguish, which has been recognized and applied in this court for many years, either has no scientific or rational basis upon which to rest so as to justify a recovery by father, brother, husband, or any other person bound to another by a close tie of blood or marriage, of damages from a telegraph company for the negligent failure to deliver a message, or the rulings and judgment in this case must be free from error. We cannot deny to the plaintiff the right to recover any damages which he may have sustained, unless we completely repudiate the doctrine, reverse our former decisions, and deny to everybody the right to recover damages for mental anguish caused by the negligence of a telegraph company in delivering messages. When we once admit the correctness of the principle upon which such recoveries have been based (and this has been done at the present term in Cogdell v. Tel. Co., 47 S. E. 490, and Hood v. Tel. Co., 47 S. E. 607, and at the February term, 1902, in Meadows v. Tel. Co., 132 N. C. 40, 43 S. E. 512, and Bright v. Tel. Co., 132 N. C. 317, 43 S. E. 841, by a unanimous court), we must carry this admittedly correct principle to its legitimate and logical conclusion, and to its necessary consequence, and permit a recovery by any one, without regard to the closeness of relationship, who can show the negligence, and that mental anguish proximately resulted therefrom. The doctrine, as stated in the former decisions of this court, could not have been restricted to close relationships, but in its very nature extended to those which are remote, as it was founded upon a breach of public duty by the telegraph company, which duty required that messages should be transmitted and delivered with reasonable care and dispatch, and with due regard for the rights of the patrons of the company. The public is vitally interested in the performance of this duty, and, whenever there is a breach of it, the right to recover damages flowing from the breach depends upon the ability of the party who alleges that he has been injured by the failure of duty to prove his actual damages, which include damages for mental anguish and may consist solely of such damages. Cashon v. Tel. Co., 123 N. C. 267, 31 S. E. 493. It is a question of proof, and not one of close relationship, which determines the right to recover damages for the injury. We can imagine a case where there is no relationship, and yet where the parties are quite as closely united and bound to each other by ties of affection as if a close relationship existed. The closeness of the relationship does not of itself necessarily prove that there has been mental anguish where there has been a negligent failure to deliver a message. It is a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining whether or not there has been any mental suffering, and this court has said that the relationship of the parties may be so close as to raise a presumption of mental anguish and consequent damage. The doctrine, as established by the former decisions of this court, is that mental anguish may be the basis for the recovery of damages, without regard to the particular relationship of the parties. The relationship was referred to merely as being evidence of mental anguish, which is strong or weak, according to the degree of relationship. It was never intended to assert that a person who is not closely related by blood or marriage to the person whose sickness or death is announced in the message cannot recover if mental anguish actually resulted from the default of the defendant. Take the case of a person who is but slightly related to the person whose sickness or death is announced in the message, but who stands towards him in loco parentis. Should he be denied the right to recover, when a son, between whom and his father there has been long estrangement and bitterly hostile feelings, is permitted to recover for failure to deliver a message announcing his father's sickness or death, merely because he and his father are closely related by blood? I go back to my first proposition: The doctrine is either fundamentally wrong, or, if it is right, the idea that it is confined to close relations must be abandoned, as, in my judgment—and I say so with the utmost respect for the opinion of others—it has nothing to sustain it. If the doctrine established by our former decisions is wrong, it should be promptly reversed, and the cases in which it was established should be overruled; but, if it is right, it should be enforced by a reasonable, and, above all things, a logical, application of the principle on which it rests to the facts of each case as presented. I can see no middle ground upon which we can safely stand. We are either right in this particular case, or we are wrong altogether. If the doctrine is limited in its operation, as suggested, I cannot give my assent to it at all; for there must be something radically wrong in a principle which cannot be safely carried to its logical results, so as to reach all cases coming fairly within its scope. If the reason upon which the doctrine is founded applies to one case, it must apply to all, leaving the degree of kinship to affect only the amount of the damages. The insuperable difficulty which, it is admitted, will be encountered in drawing the line at which the doctrine must cease to have any application, is a cogent reason for the assertion that there is no limit to the doctrine if it was a sound one in its origin. It is replied that the line at which there ceases to be a presumption of mental anguish cannot be drawn with any accuracy. This may be a reason, not for questioning the correctness of the doctrine, nor for limiting it in its operation, but merely for denying that there is any such presumption. It may be that it would be more correct to say that relationship is a fact or circumstance to be considered by the jury as evidence of mental anguish, which will be stronger or weaker in its probative force in proportion to the degree of relationship, whether near or remote. My conclusion is that, if we are to continue to recognize and enforce the right to recover for mental anguish, the principle, which underlies and supports that right, cannot be confined to any merely arbitrary limit, but must be applied to any case in which a negligent failure to deliver a message may cause mental suffering. If the principle has no proper place within the borders of our jurisprudence, we should drive it out at once as an unwelcome intruder, and not expel it by gradually limiting its sphere of operation or by a slow process of elimination. I repeat: The doctrine of mental anguish, as it is called, is either radically wrong, or it applies to the facts of this case.

CONNOR, J. (dissenting). The doctrine by which the sendee of a message was held to be entitled to recover for failure to deliver promptly, in addition to nominal damages, compensation for mental anguish, was first established by this court in Young v. Tel. Co., 107 N. C. 371, 11 S. E. 1044, 9 L. R. A. 669, 22 Am. St. Rep. 883. The message in that case announced the extreme illness of the sendee's wife, and urged him to "come in haste." As the facts appeared in the record, they appealed strongly to the feelings of the court. The negligence was gross. The doctrine then established has been fruitful of much litigation. Many of the cases have shown gross negligence, and some of them most aggravating and intense suffering caused thereby. Whatever may be my opinion of the scientific basis of the doctrine, I have no disposition to regard it as an open question in this court. It is settled here. No one who has given the question careful thought can fail to be impressed with the difficulty of giving it a satisfactory practical operation. To estimate and separate in dollars the quantum of suffering, mental and otherwise, a person experiences by reason of learning of the death and of being unable to attend the funeral of a deceased relative, must give to a conscientious juror much difficulty. I cannot but think that if the judge who, with great lucidity, lays down the principle, were called upon to apply it, the doctrine would not find so much favor. However this may be, the best answer to the objection that it is difficult to do is found in the fact that it is done. The only question presented by the appeal in this case is whether a doctrine originating in the case of an absent husband summoned to the death bed of a dying wife, and applied to other and more distant relatives, is to have any limit whatever. I fully recognize how difficult it is to fix the limit. As I understand the cases, within a certain limit there is a presumption that the plaintiff sustained mental anguish; as in case of a brother. Cashion's Case, 124 N. C. 459, 32 S. E. 748, 45 L. R. A. 160. Beyond this limit there is no presumption, but the plaintiff must retain in his memory, and, months after the injury, unfold his mental condition to the jury, to enable them to say how many dollars will compensate him. The court says, "Damages for mental anguish are purely compensatory, and should never exceed a just recompense for the anguish." If it be said—as it certainly is—that it is difficult to say within what degree of relationship the sendee has a cause of action, it may be answered that it is not more so than to say within what degree there is a presumption of mental anguish. It is said that fictions in the law "have had their day," and "have been dead 35 years." It would seem, with all possible deference, that the doctrine of mental anguish, with its logical results, is not very far removed from the domain of legal fiction.

I cannot concur in the conclusion reached by the court in this case. It may be that the court is committed to an unlimited field of litigation in these cases. I do not care to review the cases. I simply wish to say that, in my opinion, if any limit is ever fixed, the plaintiff's case will fall far beyond the outside boundary. It is difficult to discuss these cases. Men view such matters so differently that they may not easily make themselves understood. If it is desired to compel the defendant company to discharge its duty to the public with all reasonable promptness and dispatch, there can be no doubt that the Legislature has the power by appropriate legislation to do so.

I do not think that the plaintiff, in any respect of the testimony, is entitled to recover for mental anguish.

STATE v. LILES.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 19, 1904.)

BASTARDY—NATURE OF PROCEEDING—MARRIED WOMEN—LEGITIMACY—ISSUES OF FACT.

1. A proceeding in bastardy under Code, § 32, to compel the father or mother of a bastard child to give bond to indemnify the county from the subsequent maintenance of such child, is a civil proceeding, and not a criminal prosecution.

2. In a bastardy proceeding the legitimacy or illegitimacy of a child born of a married woman is an issue of fact depending on proof of the impotency or nonaccess of the husband, and this whether the child was begotten or born in wedlock.

Appeal from Superior Court, Union County; Bryan, Judge.

Proceeding by the state against Lester Liles for bastardy. From a judgment in favor of the state, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Redwine & Stack and Williams & Lemon, for appellant. Adams, Jerome & Armfield and the Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, C. J. This is a proceeding in bastardy. The prosecutrix was a married woman at the time of the birth of the child, which was born four or five months after marriage. The court charged the jury that "this is a criminal action, and the offense is completed when the child is begotten." To this the defendant excepted. The object of the proceeding, as stated in Code, § 32, is to require the mother, if she shall refuse to declare the father, to "give bond payable to the state with sufficient surety to keep such child or children from being chargeable to the county," and, if she shall accuse any man with being the father, if he admit the charge, or, denying it, shall be found to be the father of such child, he shall give bond with sufficient surety to indemnify the county from charges for the maintenance of such child, with a provision that from the judgment "the affiant, the woman or the defendant, may appeal to the next term of the superior court of the county where the trial is to be had de novo." The law as to proceedings in bastardy first appears in the Laws of North Carolina of 1741, c. 14, § 10, and may be found at page 174 of volume 23, State Records, in which volume the laws still extant from 1686 to 1791 are collected and reprinted. Some slight changes were made in 1799. Chapter 531, § 2, and other statutes mentioned in the heading to section 32 of the present Code (of 1883). The statute is also codified in Rev. St. c. 12, § 1, and Rev. Code, c. 12, § 1. Clearly, the object of the statute is in no sense criminal, but is expressed on its face to be a fiscal regulation to compel the mother or (if the father was declared by her, and proved to be such) the father to give sufficient surety "to keep such child from being chargeable to the county" for its maintenance. Accordingly we find that in an unbroken line of decisions down to and including State v. Edwards (1892) 110 N. C. 511, 14 S. E. 741, in which the authorities are collected, and which was a unanimous opinion, it is held that the proceeding, though it has some anomalous features, was civil in its nature, and not even quasi criminal; citing with approval, among other cases, State v. Higgins, 72 N. C. 226, to that effect. Among the long line of cases holding that the proceeding was civil in all essential features are, besides State v. Edwards, supra, the following: State v. Peeples, 108 N. C. 768, 13 S. E. 8; State v. Crouse, 86 N. C. 617; State v. Bryan, 83 N. C. 611; State v. Wilkie, 85 N. C. 513 (all these being cases subsequent to the act of 1879); State v. Higgins, 72 N. C. 226; State v. Hickerson, Id. 421; State v. McIntosh, 64 N. C. 607; State v. Waldrop, 63 N. C. 507; Ward v. Bell, 52 N. C. 79; State v. Thompson, 48 N. C. 365; Adams v. Pate, 47 N. C. 14; State v. Brown, 46 N. C. 129; State v. Pate, 44 N. C. 244; State v. Carson, 19 N. C. 368; and "there are others." All these were unanimous opinions, and the point was presented. In State v. Pate, 44 N. C. 244, Pearson, J., calls attention to the fact that this proceeding was not begun by presentment or indictment, and could not be criminal in its nature. In Myers v. Stafford (1894) 114 N. C. 234, 19 S. E. 764, it was held for the first time, and by a divided court (dissenting opinion, 114 N. C. 689, 19 S. E. 764), that bastardy was a misdemeanor; the dissent calling attention to the fact that, if it was a crime, and not a police regulation, as theretofore held, then the woman must be equally guilty. This case was followed by State v. Ostwalt (1896) 118 N. C. 1208, 24 S. E. 680, 32 L. R. A. 396, and State v. Ballard (1898) 122 N. C. 1024, 29 S. E. 899, both by a divided court, two judges dissenting each time. These cases have not been affirmed since, and, indeed, seem to have been questioned in State v. Pierce, 123 N. C. 748, 31 S. E. 847. The result of these cases, all by a divided court, has been practically to destroy almost entirely the efficacy of the proceeding by requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt, a disparity of challenges, a denial of appeal by the woman or the state, and of the competency of the woman's affidavit (though all these are expressly given in the statute), and by exacting other incidents of a criminal trial. We feel impelled, as the point is now presented for the first time since State v. Ballard, supra, to review these latter cases, and give some of the reasons why we cannot sustain them as authority. The above three cases were followed by two or three others of like purport, in which the point was not discussed, as it was not deemed necessary to reiterate the dissent. The cases named were put on the ground that the act of 1879, incorporated into the Code, § 35 (not section 32), a provision that, if the issue of paternity shall be found against the father, there should be, in addition to the bond for maintenance and the allowance to the woman, a fine of $10 imposed upon the father for the benefit of the school fund. But this contention overlooked the fact that in the very section 32 there was, and had been since its first enactment in 1741, a provision that, if the woman should not declare the father, she should give the bond to prevent the child from being chargeable on the county, and "shall pay a fine," which the statute of 1799 made "five dollars," at which it still stands. Yet during all these years the proceeding had been held a civil remedy. If the fine of $5 against the woman in the same section did not make the proceeding a criminal action, the fine of $10 laid in a different section upon the man could not have that effect. Furthermore, three opinions by unanimous courts, subsequent to the act of 1879 (which imposed the fine of $10), held that this provision did not have the effect to change the proceeding into a criminal action. One of these only (State v. Crouse, 86 N. C. 617) was called to the attention of the court, and, though that case was in point, the other two by some oversight were not called to the eye of the court in either of the three cases (Myers v. Stafford, State v. Ostwalt, and State v. Ballard) in which the majority of the court held that the action had been changed into one to punish a misdemeanor. Had the other two cases, to same effect as State v. Crouse, been then called to the attention of the court, doubtless they would have been followed. In one of these—State v. Giles, 108 N. C., at page 396, 9 S. E. 435—Smith, C. J., speaking for a unanimous court, says: "The remaining exception is to the judgment itself as inconsistent with the Constitution, though following the statute, in that it imposes upon the defendant the payment of fifty dollars for the use of the woman and a fine of ten dollars besides, and imprisons for an indefinite period in case of a default in making payment. The fine is quasi penal, but the payment of the residue is not, and the proceeding is not in the exercise of a criminal, but of a civil, jurisdiction in providing for the present support of the child and an indemnity to the county in case of its becoming a further public charge. * * * The error in this contention consists in regarding the requirement of the payment of these amounts and an enforcement of imprisonment as an award of punishment for a criminal offense, which in no sense they are, unless the $10 fine may be so considered. It is but the exercise of a power to compel obedience to the order of the court, and an imprisonment from which the party may be relieved under the insolvent law, as if committed for fine and costs in a criminal prosecution. Code, § 2967; State v. Davis, 82 N. C. 610; State v. Bryan, 83 N. C. 611." This was followed in State v. Edwards, 110 N. C. 511, 14 S. E. 741, in which (at page 512, 110 N. C., page 741, 14 S. E.) it is said that, though "a fine is imposed by the statute," the action remains a civil proceeding. Although this case was cited in State v. Ostwalt and State v. Ballard, this direct ruling on the point was overlooked. The true principle applicable is thus stated by Ruffin, J., in State v. Snuggs, 85 N. C. 541 (upon another section of the Code): "The statute not only creates the offense, but fixes the penalty that attaches to it, and prescribes the method of enforcing it; and the rule of law is that, wherever a statute does this, no other remedy exists than the one expressly given, and no other method of enforcement can be pursued than the one prescribed." This case is cited as authority in State v. Pierce, 123 N. C., at page 748, 31 S. E. 847.

Among the reasons why we return to antiquas vias is that the cases of Myers v. Stafford, State v. Ostwalt, and State v. Ballard were decided by a divided court upon the effect of the statute of 1879, imposing (in another section) a fine of $10, which it is held per se changed the proceeding into a criminal action; whereas three opinions of a unanimous court (two of which were not cited in the three cases just named) had held that the statute of 1879 did not change the nature of the action. Further, because section 32 from 1741 had contained a provision for a "fine of five dollars" against the woman, and, notwithstanding this, our unbroken line of decisions had held the proceeding to be civil in its nature. Because, also, to construe the statute criminal in its nature is contrary to its express provisions, which declare its object to be to secure sureties to prevent the child becoming a charge on the county; and that, if the action were changed into a criminal proceeding, this might negative appeals by the woman and by the state and the use of the woman's affidavit as presumptive evidence (all of which are given by the statute, and are essential to its enforcement), and by further requiring a disparity of challenges and proof beyond a reasonable doubt and other incidents of a criminal action, which would practically make the statute nugatory, and would also repeal the statute of limitations of three years provided by section 36. We do not think such radical changes can fairly be inferred to have been caused by the incidental authorization in another section of a fine of $10. If the fine cannot be levied as an incident in the civil action like the fine of $5 upon the woman authorized by section 32, or the fine of $2,500 authorized to be taxed against a sheriff when judgment is rendered against him on his bond for failure to pay over the taxes in full (Davenport v. McKee, 98 N. C. 500, 4 S. E. 545), then under the rule, "Magis quam valeat quam pereat," either the fine in section 35 should be held invalid, rather than the destruction of the efficacy of the ancient proceeding under section 32, or the $10 fine can be levied in a subsequent and independent criminal proceeding begun under section 35, but based upon the verdict and judgment thereon rendered under the provisions of section 32. Besides, there being already the criminal action for fornication and adultery, there is no need to abolish this proceeding, which was enacted to protect the county against being charged with the maintenance of the child. If it were a criminal proceeding, it is singular that the woman is not made liable when the man is, for, if tried for a criminal offense, both are guilty, since she was present aiding and abetting in its commission. In construing statutes the mischief to be remedied must be considered, and there was in this matter no defect of criminal proceeding, for fornication and adultery was already a complete remedy.

The weight of authority elsewhere recognizes bastardy as a civil proceeding to enforce a police regulation. Bishop's Stat. Crimes, § 691; 2 McLain, Cr. Law, § 1186; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 874; 3 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 277—which cites numerous cases to that effect from Arkansas, Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island, and Vermont; and among the states which hold the proceeding neither strictly civil nor strictly criminal, but quasi civil to enforce a police regulation, are cited Alabama, Florida, Michigan, Ohio, and Wisconsin. To similar effect is 9 Cyc. 644, which adds to states holding as above, Minnesota, New Jersey, Ohio, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Tennessee, and Wisconsin, and sums up the doctrine thus: "The object of these proceedings is not the imposition of a penalty for an immoral or unlawful act, but is merely to compel the putative father to provide for the support of his offspring, and thus secure the public against such support."

We are constrained to return to the former uniform rulings of this court that proceedings in bastardy are essentially civil in their nature, though with some anomalous features. State v. Edwards, 110 N. C. 511, 14 S. E. 741, and cases there cited. Myers v. Stafford, State v. Ostwalt, and State v. Ballard are overruled as to this point, together with any other cases based on the holding by them that bastardy is a criminal proceeding. The presumption in bastardy proceedings is that the woman is single. State v. Peeples, 109 N. C. 768, 18 S. E. 8; State v. Allison, 61 N. C. 346. Here it affirmatively appears that the woman was married both when she made the affidavit and when the child was born. But it was held by Taylor, C. J., in State v. Pettaway, 10 N. C. 623, and by Ruffin, C. J., in State v. Wilson, 32 N. C. 131, cited with approval in State v. Allison, 61 N. C. 346, that, though the statute specifies "any single woman big with child or delivered of a child," the subsequent language in the section that the object is to protect the public against the charge of maintaining bastard children, includes married women, since a bastard child can be begotten upon a married woman as well as upon a single woman. Formerly, a child born of a married woman was conclusively presumed to be legitimate, but now, legitimacy or illegitimacy is an issue of fact resting upon proof of the impotency or nonaccess of the husband. See Woodward v. Blue, 107 N. C. 407, 12 S. E. 453, 10 L. R. A. 662, 22 Am. St. Rep. 897, where the subject is fully discussed and authorities given. This is true even when the child is begotten as well as born in wedlock. For a stronger reason this is true when, as in this case, the child was begotten four or five months before the marriage, and the jury believed the evidence that the husband had no intercourse with the prosecutrix prior to the marriage. The evidence to that effect, and to show the paternity of the defendant, and his admissions, were properly admitted. This disposes of all the other exceptions.

Though there was error in holding the action to be a criminal proceeding, it was harmless error in the view we have taken, and upon the whole case the judgment below is affirmed.

DOUGLAS, J., concurs in result only.

JONES v. MADISON COUNTY COM'RS.*
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 3, 1904.)

VENUE—WAIVER—COUNTIES—INDEBTEDNESS—
ISSUE OF BONDS—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

1. An objection that the summons was made returnable at chambers, instead of at term, is waived by failure to move to transfer the case to the proper docket.

2. Laws 1903, p. 490, c. 289, declaring that for the purpose of funding the floating indebtedness and refunding certain bonds of Madison county the county commissioners are thereby "authorized and empowered" to issue new bonds to the amount of $75,000, etc., is not mandatory.

Connor and Montgomery, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madison County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by W. W. Jones, as receiver, against the commissioners of Madison county. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

The plaintiff, as receiver of the Western Carolina Bank, is the owner of 18 coupon bonds of Madison county, aggregating $21,000, issued by the county of Madison by virtue of an act of the General Assembly of North Carolina entitled "An act to settle the indebtedness of Madison county," ratified March, 1887 (chapter 398, p. 696, Laws 1887). They were issued to pay the necessary expenses of said county. The interest upon said bonds is payable as stated therein, and they mature and become due in the year 1907. In addition to said bonds, the plaintiff is the owner of a certain warrant of indebtedness duly issued by said county for the sum of $5,155.16, which represents interest due and unpaid upon said bonds up to and including the 1st day of June, 1901, but upon this warrant of obligation there are certain credits, as stated in the findings of facts embraced in the judgment of his honor. There is likewise interest due and owing to the plaintiff upon the coupons yet attached to said bonds and upon said warrant, as stated in said judgment and findings of fact of the court below. Under Pub. Laws 1903, p. 490, c. 289, entitled "An act to liquidate and settle the outstanding indebtedness of Madison county, and to authorize the issue of a series of bonds for the purpose of paying off floating debt, old bonds, etc., contracted for the necessary expenses of said county," it is claimed by the plaintiff that it became the duty of the defendants, the board of commissioners of Madison county, to issue certain bonds, not to exceed the amount of $75,000, with which, or the proceeds of which, to refund and pay off and discharge said bonds and certain other indebtedness of the county of Madison therein mentioned. The plaintiff and those under whom he derived his title to said bonds and other indebtedness against the county of Madison at various times demanded of the board of commissioners of Madison county that they issue said bonds as provided by said act of 1903; and at a meeting of said board held in April, 1903, it was resolved by the same that said bonds be issued to an amount sufficient to pay off said indebtedness of said county, not to exceed $75,000; but at a subsequent meeting of said board, held on or about the first Monday in May, 1903, the said board revoked its order of April 20, 1903, and then refused, has since refused, and still refuses to issue said bonds; whereupon the plaintiff again made demand upon said board that they issue said bonds, and in all things comply with the provisions of said act of 1903. Said board again refused to issue said bonds for the reasons stated in their exceptions filed to the judgment, whereupon this proceeding was instituted by the plaintiff against the defendants for the purpose of compelling them by mandamus to issue said bonds, and in other respects comply with the provisions of said act of 1903. Upon the hearing of this case before his honor the judge of the superior court, it was adjudged that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief demanded in his complaint. The defendants duly excepted to said judgment and appealed.

T. S. Rollins and Gudger & McElroy, for appellants. Chas. E. Jones and Davidson, Bourne & Parker, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The first exception is that the summons was returnable before the judge at chambers, when the action, being for a money demand, should have been returnable before the court at term. But, if that be conceded, yet, as held in Eqbank v. Turner (N. C.) 46 S. E. 508, whether an action is returnable before the judge at chambers or at term or before the clerk, it is all before the same court, and, if brought before the wrong department, the remedy is the same as when action is brought in the wrong county. There is no defect of jurisdiction, but an error as to venue merely, and the remedy is for the court either ex mero motu or on motion to transfer the case to the proper docket. The defendant, not having made such motion, has waived his objection. Here, the summons is returnable at chambers, but on a day during the term of court. Authorizing an action to be brought before the judge at chambers is simply intended as a convenient practice in cases where no jury is required, in order to expedite a decision. If it turns out that there are issues of fact requiring a jury, there is nothing to be gained to any one by dismissing the action. It should simply be transferred to the docket at term time for trial. It would seem, moreover, that this action was properly made returnable at chambers. The amount is determined, and it is not sought to recover judgment therefor. The relief asked is a mandamus, not against the treasurer to pay any money, but to compel the county commissioners to issue bonds. Ducker v. Venable, 126 N. C. 447, 35 S. E. 818; Railroad v. Jenkins, 68 N. C. 503. A better founded exception is that the act (Laws 1903, p. 490, c. 289) is not mandatory. The preamble recites that the county has an outstanding bonded indebtedness of $21,000, bearing 6 per cent. interest, and the county will be unable to pay the same at maturity, and that it is to the best interest of the taxpayers that the bonds shall be renewed before maturity at a lower rate of interest, and also that the floating indebtedness of the county incurred for necessary expenses should be funded by issuing a new series of bonds to cover the entire indebtedness of the county, and it is thereupon provided by section 1 that the board of commissioners are "authorized and empowered" to issue not exceeding $75,000 in bonds bearing 5 per cent. interest. Section 3 "authorizes" the commissioners to lay an annual special tax to meet the interest and principal. By section 8 the county commissioners are "authorized, empowered, and directed" to audit and ascertain and adjust the amount of the floating debt, and no bonds to be issued for any part of said debt unless two (of the three) commissioners shall pass upon and allow the same. Section 10 "authorizes" the county commissioners to retire the outstanding bonds by selling so many of the bonds issued under this act as may be necessary. Section 19 provides, "If the bonds authorized by this act are issued," the board of county commissioners shall levy a sufficient tax to pay the principal and interest, as already stated in section 3.

It would be a singular proceeding, and without precedent, we believe, in this state, if the Legislature should assume to know the wishes and interests of the people of any county better than the county commissioners, elected by them to administer county business, and should peremptorily command the commissioners to issue bonds to fund a floating indebtedness, and in advance of the maturity of the bonded debt should order it refunded by new bonds for a time and at a rate fixed by the General Assembly. The long-settled custom has been to authorize and empower the local legislature, the board of county commissioners, to take such steps as may be necessary to fund or refund the debts, with certain limitations upon the rate of interest and duration of the bonds to be issued. Certainly, if the Legislature can order a county to issue bonds, it could as easily fix the interest at one figure as another. If the Legislature had this power, a casual majority could practically confiscate all property in any county by directing the issue, by counties named in the respective acts, of large amounts of bonds, and at an excessively high rate of interest, regardless of the wishes of taxpayers of such county. Unlike state bonds issued by legislative authority, action could be brought in the courts on county bonds thus required to be issued by legislative authority, and payment coerced. The assumption of a power so unprecedented, so contrary to the spirit of local self-government, and so liable to abuse, should be carefully scrutinized by the courts. We are relieved, however, in this case, of the necessity of passing upon the power of the General Assembly to compel a county to issue bonds against its will, for it will be seen from the above extracts from the statute that the Legislature clearly intended no more than to authorize and empower the county commissioners to issue "not exceeding seventy-five thousand dollars." It is for the courts, not the General Assembly, to order the payment of debts, whether by counties or individuals. The courts certainly could not compel the issuance of these bonds unless the Legislature has both ordered the county peremptorily to issue the bonds and had authority so to do.

In Tate v. Commissioners, 122 N. C. 812, 30 S. E. 352, the court, speaking of counties, says: "They are but agencies of the state government. * * * They are subject to legislative authority which can direct them to do as a duty all such duties as they can empower them to do." The court was there speaking of counties in respect to their governmental functions as to which the counties are merely agencies of the state government, and can be abolished, created, or changed at the legislative will. The making of public roads is a public governmental function, and it was held that the Legislature could either empower or order the making of these roads, in which the people of the state generally have an interest, and direct that the county shall lay a tax to pay for the construction of the road. But, so far as the counties are business agencies of the people of a locality, whether county or municipality, the state cannot interfere to make them create a debt or contract, or extend it (as here), or change the terms of the contract, or authorize its violation. This distinction in the double function of counties and municipalities as governmental agencies on the one hand, in respect to which they cannot be sued, and as to which they are subject to legislative control, and, on the other hand, their liability as business agencies of the people of the locality, as to which hence they can be sued, and the Legislature has no power to control nor to create, or relieve from liability, has been drawn in many cases. See McIlhenney v. Wilmington, 127 N. C. 146, 38 S. E. 1007, 50 L. R. A. 470, and cases there cited. The Constitution (article 5, § 6) uses the words "with the special approval of the General Assembly," and not "by special command of the General Assembly."

The plaintiff relies upon an expression in section 11 of chapter 289, p. 493, Laws 1903, that, if any creditor shall desire to exchange his bonds or other evidence of indebtedness "for one or more of the bonds hereby authorized," it shall be the duty of the commissioners to make such exchange at par. But, construed with the contest, this means no more than the expression in section 19 of the act, "If the bonds authorized by this act are issued," the board of commissioners shall levy a tax, etc. If the General Assembly has power to order a county to issue bonds, those acquainted with practical legislation and "senatorial courtesy" know that this important power will be, in effect, placed in the hands solely of those who, for the moment, represent the county in the General Assembly, and at a time when they will have small opportunity to consult the wishes and interests of their constituents, and when, on the other hand, the agents and attorneys of those who desire to receive the bonds will be not only present in person, but very ready with their arguments and advice. It is true the Legislature can abolish counties at will (Mills v. Williams, 33 N. C. 558), and repeal municipal charters, so far as counties and municipalities are governmental agencies; but so far as they are business agencies of the people of the locality to create indebtedness the Legislature cannot impair the obligation of the contract. Can the Legislature then compel the creation of a contract by a county by ordering the issue of bonds for 30 years when the people thereof may prefer a shorter or longer term, and may be able to secure a lower rate of interest. Whether the Legislature has the constitutional power to take such a departure from precedent, and can itself order the issuance of bonds, instead of authorizing and empowering the county commissioners to do so (subject to the restraining power of the court if an excessive amount or an excessive interest is contemplated; a restraint which would not attach to an issue made by legislative command), is happily a matter not before us, for the General Assembly in this statute has explicitly and clearly, and in the usual form, merely authorized and empowered the board of county commissioners to issue "not exceeding $75,000" to fund the floating indebtedness (the amount thereof to be ascertained by the commissioners), and to refund the bonded indebtedness which will mature in 1907. The General Assembly has not attempted to force the hands of the defendant board of county commissioners. It is true that the county commissioners, at a called session on April 20th, being advised by counsel that the act was mandatory, and that they had no discretion, did resolve to issue said bonds, but no action was taken thereon which conferred upon the creditors any vested rights, and at the first regular meeting immediately thereafter on the first Monday in May, the board, being then of opinion that the act merely "authorized and empowered" them to issue bonds, the order was revoked for reasons which they must have deemed good and sufficient, but which are unknown to us.

The mandamus was improvidently granted. Reversed.

WALKER, J. I concur in the conclusion of the court in this case for the reasons stated in my opinion in Bank v. Commissioners (decided at this term) 47 S. E. 1016.

CONNOR, J. (dissenting). The only respect in which this case differs from Bank v. Commissioners, in which I have expressed my views, is that the plaintiff's claim consists of certain bonds, with the coupons representing accrued and past-due interest thereon, issued by the defendants pursuant to the provisions of the act of 1887, and maturing 1907. It is recited in the preamble to the act of 1903, and admitted in the record, that these bonds were issued for an indebtedness incurred for necessary expenses. The liability of the county of Madison for them because of the consideration is settled by this court in Smathers v. Commissioners, 125 N. C. 480, 34 S. E. 554. It is contended that the act of 1903 is invalid in so far as it directs the issuance of new bonds to run 30 years, carrying interest at 5 per cent., to redeem unmatured bonds. If I am correct in the conclusion reached in respect to the power of the General Assembly to direct the payment of county indebtedness incurred for necessary expenses, I cannot perceive why, if, in its judgment, the best interest of the state, in respect to that portion thereof set off for governmental purposes as Madison county, will be promoted by funding its debt rapidly approaching maturity, and for which it is evident no other provision has been made, at a lower rate of interest, it may not so direct. In the establishment of the county, as pointed out by Pearson, C. J., in Mills v. Williams, 33 N. C. 558, there is no contract—"no party of the second part." I do not care to repeat what I have said in Bank v. Commissioners. The distinction between contracts of private persons or corporations and public agencies is clearly pointed out in Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Nebraska, 170 U. S. 57, 18 Sup. Ct. 513, 42 L. Ed. 948. On page 72, 170 U. S., and page 519, 18 Sup. Ct., 42 L. Ed. 948, Mr. Justice Shiras says: "Usually, where a contract not contrary to public policy has been entered into between parties competent to contract, it is not within the power of either party to withdraw from its terms without the consent of the other; and the obligation of such a contract is constitutionally protected from hostile legislation. When, however, the respective parties are not private persons dealing with matters and things with which the public has no concern, but are persons or corporations whose rights and powers were created for public purposes by legislative acts, and when the subject-matter of the contract is one which affects the safety and welfare of the public, other principles apply. Contracts of the latter description are held to be within the supervising power and control of the Legislature when exercised to protect the public safety, health, and morals. That clause of the federal Constitution which protects contracts from legislative action cannot in every case be successfully invoked." See, also, Williams v. Eggleston, 170 U. S. 304, 18 Sup. Ct. 617, 42 L. Ed. 1047. In New Orleans v. Water Co., 142 U. S. 79, 12 Sup. Ct. 142, 35 L. Ed. 943, it is said that a corporation created for purposes of government is to be governed according to the law of the land, and may be controlled, its constitution altered and amended, by the government in such manner as the public interests may require. "Such legislative interference cannot be said to impair the contract by which the corporation was formed, because there is in reality but one party to it; the trustees or governors of the corporation being merely the trustees for the public, the cestuis que trust of the foundation." Mr. Tucker, discussing this question, says: "These charters are based upon no contract with the people, but created by the political authority for its convenience, and for motives of public policy. The relation between the sovereignty and the municipality is not contractual, but is one of delegation by a principal to an agent." Tucker, Com. on Const. 833. For a very able discussion of this subject, see Sharswood, J., in Philadelphia v. Fox, 64 Pa. 160. When, therefore, the state established Madison county with its territorial limit, and conferred upon the inhabitants certain governmental powers, and imposed corresponding duties, it in no manner parted with its rights through the Legislature to exercise that constitutional, governmental dominion and control which is essential to the carrying out of its general policy. It could not abrogate or ever put in abeyance this power, or the exercise of it, without to that extent parting with its sovereignty. This the state never can do in respect to any of its political agencies. They are always subject to legislative control. Mial v. Ellington, 134 N. C. —, 46 S. E. 961. If the contention of the defendant is correct, and the state occupies the status towards the county which is contended for, it would be difficult to justify the appropriation of money from the public treasury to counties for the aid and support of public schools, the sending at the charge of the people of the state of convicts into counties for opening highways and other internal improvements. If each county may assert its own will in respect to assuming the burdens and providing for the costs imposed upon it as an integral part of the state by the General Assembly—as, for instance, making provision for holding the courts at the appointed times, or having a jail, or providing or maintaining a home for the poor—it would be impossible to carry on our governmental system, the wisdom of which has been vindicated by long experience. As is said by Merrimon, J., in White v. Commissioners, 90 N. C. 437, 47 Am. Rep. 534: "The leading and principal purpose in establishing them is to effectuate the political organization and civil administration of the state in respect to its general purposes and policy, which requires local direction, supervision, and control; such as matters of local finance, education, provision for the poor, the establishment and maintenance of highways and bridges, and in a large measure the administration of justice. They constitute a distinguishing feature in our free system of government." They have been termed "an involuntary civil division of the state created by statute to aid in the administration of the government." An interesting and instructive discussion may be found in Smith, Modern Law of Municipal Corporations, §§ 1-65. The Legislature, finding the condition of Madison county, in respect to its indebtedness, such that some provision was necessary to enable it to meet its past-due interest and the approaching maturity of the principal, together with its floating debt, enacted the statute of 1903. No injustice is done the taxpayers of the county. The interest at 6 per cent. on the bonds is overdue and compounding. The credit of the county must soon be seriously impaired. The course pursued is that which all prudent business men, corporations, and governments adopt. The debt is funded at a lower rate of interest by a bond issue extending through the usual period for such bonds. An examination of our statutes for the past 10 years will show that the rate of interest and time fixed for maturity are the same as that of a large majority of the county bond issues authorized. The acts passed at the session of 1903, providing bond issues for other counties, are of the same character in these two respects, and include several of the wealthiest counties in the state. The creditors, of course, cannot be compelled to surrender a 6 per cent. bond maturing in 1907 for a 5 per cent. bond running 30 years, but, as they elect to do so, it is difficult to see how any injustice is done the taxpayers. It will be observed that the treasurer is not permitted to sell the bonds at less than par, and, while the election is given the creditor to take the new bonds in exchange for the old ones, I cannot see why, if the bonds can be sold at more than par, he can complain if his bond be paid him in cash. I think that the judgment below should be affirmed.

I have not discussed the question presented in the record and briefs that the commissioners, having met and adopted a resolution directing the bonds to be issued, have no power to rescind this action, that the power in the nature of a trust once exercised was extinct. This view is not advanced as an estoppel. While, from the view which I take of the case, it is not necessary to decide the question, there is, in my opinion, much force in it.

MONTGOMERY, J., concurs in the dissenting opinion.

J. L. ROPER LUMBER CO. v. ELIZABETH CITY LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 2, 1904.)

DUE PROCESS OF LAW—FORFEITURE OF STATE SWAMP LAND ON GRANTEE'S FAILURE TO PAY TAXES—VALIDITY OF STATUTE.

1. Laws 1889, p. 256, c. 243, § 3, amending Code, § 2522, so as to provide that on the failure of the grantee of state swamp lands to pay the arrearages of taxes levied and assessed thereon, or which ought to have been levied or assessed, on or before January 21, 1890, all the title to and interest in the swamp land vested in the grantee, or his heirs or assigns, shall be forfeited, and vested in the State Board of Education, without any proceeding or judicial determination, is invalid, because depriving the grantee, his heirs or assigns, of property without due process of law, in violation of Const. art. 1, § 17.

2. Where, in an action for trespass on lands, the jury found that plaintiff owned a portion of the lands described in the complaint, but that the defendant had not trespassed on that portion, it was error to include in the judgment a decision that the title to such portion was in plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Camden County; Justice, Judge.

Action by the J. L. Roper Lumber Company against the Elizabeth City Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

E. F. Aydtlett and W. W. Clark, for appellant. Rodman & Rodman and W. M. Bond, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. The main question on this appeal, to which nearly all the exceptions are directed, is the constitutionality of section 3, c. 243, p. 256, of the Laws of 1889, amending section 2522 of the Code. This act was held to be unconstitutional in Parish v. Cedar Co., 133 N. C. 478, 45 S. E. 768, and, after renewed consideration, we deem it our duty to reaffirm our decision to that effect. This destroys the defendant's chain of title, but does not necessarily perfect that of the plaintiff, or render the defendant liable for trespass. The plaintiff brought a civil action in the nature of trespass, alleging its ownership of the land in question, and the defendant's trespass thereon. The jury found, in substance, that the plaintiff owned a part of the lands described in the complaint, but that the defendant had not trespassed upon those particular lands. This was the practical result of the verdict, and its legal effect was to entitle the defendant to a judgment that it go without day, and recover its costs incurred in the action. We do not think that any judgment should have been given, deciding the title to the land, as that was not the essential question involved in the action. Trespass is essentially an offense against the possession, and an action therefor can be maintained by one not holding the fee. On the contrary, it makes no difference who owns the fee, if the defendant has committed no trespass thereon. If both issues had been found in favor of the plaintiff, it may be that he would have been entitled to a judgment on his title, as a necessary requisite to his recovery; but, as he is not entitled to a recovery, a simple judgment for the defendant should have been entered.

The judgment of the court below will be modified by striking out that part decreeing the plaintiff to be the owner of the lands therein described, and then affirmed. Modified and affirmed.

J. L. ROPER LUMBER CO. v. ELIZABETH CITY LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 2, 1904.)

TRESPASS—TITLE—ISSUES—PREJUDICIAL EFFECT OF ISSUE.

1. In an action for trespass on lands, counsel agreed that if the jury should answer the first issue, as to title, "Yes," then it was admitted that defendant had trespassed, and that the amount of damages should be ascertained under the Code. The first issue was whether plaintiff was the owner of the lands described in the complaint, or any part thereof. The second was, "If so, what part?" Held, that it was not error to submit a third issue, as to whether defendant had trespassed on lands described in the complaint, and which were inside a certain grant to plaintiff, where it appeared to the court that the evidence raised a question as to whether defendant might not have trespassed on lands described in the complaint, but which it might be found were not within the grant, and did not belong to plaintiff.

2. The jury having answered "Yes" to the first issue, and having found that plaintiff owned all the lands within the grant, but that defendant had not trespassed on such lands, it was proper to deny a motion to strike out the finding on the third issue; the finding thereon having set aside the agreement as inapplicable.

3. Plaintiff was not prejudiced by the submission of the third issue, since, if it had not been given, the jury could not have answered the first one in the affirmative.

Appeal from Superior Court, Camden County; Justice, Judge.

Action by the J. L. Roper Lumber Company against the Elizabeth City Lumber Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Rodman & Rodman and W. M. Bond, for appellant. E. F. Aydlett and W. W. Clark, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. The exceptions on this appeal all refer to an agreement by counsel which is in the following words: "In this cause it is agreed that if the jury should answer the first issue, as to title, 'Yes,' then it is admitted that defendant has trespassed, and the amount of damages is reserved, to be ascertained by a reference under the Code." The issues were submitted and answered as follows: "(1) Is the plaintiff the owner of the lands described in the complaint, or any part thereof? Ans. Yes. (2) If so, what part? Ans. All the lands conveyed to Weeks and Valentine by accurate measurement, except the M. D. Gregory and Jos. Burgess grants. (3) Has the defendant cut timber or committed other acts of trespass on the lands described in the complaint, and inside the Weeks and Valentine grant? Ans. No." Upon the coming in of the verdict, the plaintiff moved to set aside the finding upon the third issue, and moved that the cause be referred, under the aforesaid agreement, to ascertain the damage, and moved the court to sign the judgment tendered. It further appears from the record that after all the evidence was in, and after all the speeches had been made, except the last speech on each side, the court decided to submit the third issue, and to submit to the jury under the first issue only the question of title as conveyed by the deeds, and under the third issue the location of the grant under which the plaintiff claimed; that the speeches prior to this argued the location under the first issue. To the submission of the issue, and the question of location of the Weeks and Valentine grant under that issue, plaintiff excepted. The plaintiff insisted that the submission of the third issue under the agreement of counsel heretofore set out, and referred to in section 3 thereof, was an error, and that the court should instruct the jury, under that admission, to answer the third issue "Yes." Upon the return of the verdict, the plaintiff moved to strike out the third issue, and the finding thereon by the jury, upon the ground that the same had been submitted contrary to the agreement of the counsel on record in the cause.

We see no error in the action of his honor. We think he had the power to submit such issues as were necessary to properly present the facts of the case. Tucker v. Satterthwaite, 120 N. C. 118, 27 S. E. 45. The finding of the jury upon the issues submitted was, in effect, that the plaintiff owned a part of the lands mentioned in the complaint, but that the defendant had not trespassed on those particular lands. This finding necessarily set aside the agreement as inapplicable. If the defendant had not trespassed upon the plaintiff's lands, it made no difference in this suit if it had trespassed upon lands belonging to some one else. Nor was the plaintiff hurt in any way by the division of the first issue, even under the agreement. The agreement was to be operative only in the event that the jury answered "Yes" to the first issue as then constituted. If that issue had been left so as to include the lands—that is, all the lands—mentioned in the complaint, it could not have been answered "Yes," in view of their actual finding. Their answer would necessarily have been "No," as they found that only a part of the lands were owned by the plaintiff. If upon a division of the issues the jury had found that the plaintiff owned all the lands in question, then it might have become the duty of the court below to enter judgment for the trespass non obstante veredicto, upon the admissions in the agreement, but unfortunately the facts as found do not fit the plaintiff's theory.

The judgment will be modified and affirmed as directed in the defendant's appeal. In this appeal we see no error. Modified and affirmed.

MCGRAW et al. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 3, 1904.)

CARRIERS—PASSENGERS—PERSONS ON PLATFORM OF BAGGAGE CAR.

1. A person who, though having a ticket, boards a train by getting on the platform of the blind baggage car, has no right of action, as a passenger, because of the conductor pulling him off the car, he not having told the conductor, when ordered to get off, that he had a ticket, and the conductor not having seen a ticket, or supposed that he has one.

Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; McNeill, Judge.

Action by Theodore McGraw against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

The plaintiff, together with one White, purchased a ticket from the defendant's agent at Charlotte, entitling him to go to Huntersville. He and White, while the train was standing at the station, went across the street for the purpose of buying a melon. The train moving off, they ran to catch it, and got upon the platform of the first car they reached, being the "blind baggage" car. The train moved slowly until it reached the crossing of the Seaboard Air Line track, where it was required by law to stop. The conductor, finding the plaintiff and White on the platform, pulled them off. The plaintiff alleges that he was a passenger on the defendant's train, and that the conductor violently and wantonly assaulted him, whereby he was greatly injured. He sues to recover damages for his injuries. White also brought suit, and the cases were consolidated. The plaintiff, having testified in regard to the purchase of the ticket and boarding the train, said: "After we crossed the crossing, Tom Rowland [the conductor] came through. I was on the side of the platform next to the door, and White on the right side. When he came up, he said, 'Fall off.' I said, 'I have got a ticket,' and he said, 'You have like hell.' I had a ticket in my hand. He caught me by the left arm, and jerked me off. The train was moving." He was corroborated by White. The defendant introduced the conductor, who testified: "There is a state law requiring all trains to stop at the crossing. My porter, as usual, went over to the engine to see if there were any tramps or people on the train who had no business. On this occasion we stopped as usual. The porter did not come back as usual, and I thought there was something wrong. I jumped on the ground and ran around the mail car. I was on the back of the first-class car. When I got to the front end of the mail car, the train had begun to move, and I saw these two men up there. About the time I got there the baggage master stepped up on the other side. I told the men to come down. They did not get down, and, in order to get them on the ground before the train got up too much speed, I reached up and pulled them down, and let them light on the ground. When I put the second one down, I caught on the back end of the same car. * * * I just caught hold of them and pulled them down. They did not resist. I had no conversation with them. Did not see any ticket. Did not suppose for a moment that they had any ticket, or they would not be there, because it was not a place for passengers, and they could not pass from that end of the car to the other. There is no doorway between the mail car and the baggage car. Passengers are not allowed to go through them at all." He was corroborated by the porter. It was also in evidence that the rule of the defendant company forbade passengers from riding on the platform. The evidence in regard to the injury sustained by the plaintiff was contradictory. His honor directed the jury to answer the first issue "Yes." The defendant excepted, and from a judgment for the plaintiff the defendant appealed.

Geo. F. Bason and L. C. Caldwell, for appellant. Montgomery & Crowell and M. B. Stickley, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. There are a number of exceptions in the record to the instructions given by the court and to the refusal to give special instructions, all of which are duly assigned as error. We are of the opinion that the first exception should be sustained. His honor charged the jury as a conclusion of law that upon all of the evidence the plaintiff was a passenger on the defendant's train; meaning, of course, that he was such for the purpose of maintaining this action. If he was correct in this, the jury must, as a conclusion of law, have answered the second issue "Yes"; thus eliminating the question whether the conductor used excessive force from consideration, except upon the character and amount of damages which should be awarded the plaintiff. For the purpose of disposing of this first exception, we must assume that the conductor's account of the transaction is correct. The instruction is necessarily based upon that assumption. When the relation of passenger is established by entry upon the defendant's premises for the purpose of purchasing a ticket or taking passage on the defendant's train, or entry into the cars for such purpose, the relative rights and duties of the passenger and carrier are fixed and well settled. There is a presumption that a person who enters a passenger car, nothing appearing in his conduct to the contrary, is or intends to become a passenger. Railroad v. Books, 57 Pa. 339, 98 Am. Dec. 229. No such presumption arises when the entry is upon a baggage or mail car, or upon any other portion of the train not assigned to passengers. Elliott on Railroads, § 1578, says: "The presumption may, of course, be rebutted, and it will not ordinarily arise when the person occupies a position on the train which passengers have no right to occupy, or goes upon a train on which passengers are not carried." The general rule is that a person can take passage on such trains only, and only in such places, as the rules of the company provide that passengers shall be carried; and one who does not conform to such rules is ordinarily to be regarded as an intruder or trespasser, and an intruder or trespasser cannot impose upon a railroad company the high duty which a carrier owes to its passengers." Id. § 1581. It was the duty of the plaintiff, when found upon the platform of the baggage car, to promptly inform the conductor that he had a ticket, so that he could be given an opportunity to go into the car provided for passengers. He says that he did so. The conductor says that he did not do so, that he said nothing about having a ticket, and that he (conductor) saw no ticket. The truth of the matter should have been ascertained by the jury. If the plaintiff's version of the transaction is true, he is entitled to maintain his action. If the conductor's version is correct, he is not entitled, as a passenger, to recover. If the jury should find the conductor's version to be true, the plaintiff could recover damages for his ejection only by showing that the conductor used excessive force. Railroad v. Haring, 47 N. J. Law, 137, 54 Am. Rep. 123; Fetter on Carriers, 359. His right to recover punitive damages, if he shows himself entitled to compensatory damages, depends upon well-settled principles. Holmes v. Railroad, 94 N. C. 319.

There must be a new trial.

DOUGLAS, J., concurs in result only.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). The plaintiffs testified that they bought tickets, went across the street, still on the defendant's premises, and bought a musk melon, and, the train starting, they ran and got upon the platform of the baggage car, and the assistant ticket agent of the defendant testified that the "tickets were all right." There is no evidence whatever to contradict this, and his honor, in his charge, said: "I understand that counsel for both sides do not substantially disagree as to the facts of the first issue ('Were plaintiffs passengers?'). They say that this is a deduction of law from the whole of the cause; so, upon the evidence, I advise you that you answer the first issue 'Yes.'" The counsel do not appear to have corrected or objected to this statement of the judge at the time, as they should have done if they did not assent thereto; nor could they have shown any contradiction in the evidence as to the first issue. Their exception, entered after the trial, is clearly to the conclusion of law that those facts made the plaintiffs passengers, but in this there is no merit. The defendant's brief expressly says, "The court was asked to instruct the jury that the plaintiffs were not passengers in contemplation of law;" thus concurring in the uncontradicted testimony as to the purchase of the tickets, but going on to argue that, being on the platform, the plaintiffs were not in law entitled to be treated as passengers, and therefore that the judge instructed the jury wrongly upon the first issue. In both briefs filed by the defendant it is stated that the plaintiffs bought tickets, and the argument is that the judge charged wrongly on that issue because the plaintiffs were not in the car. Whether, in the absence of this direct and uncontradicted evidence that the plaintiffs bought tickets, and the ticket agent's evidence that the tickets were "all right," there would be a presumption that the plaintiffs were or were not passengers because of their being on the platform and not in the car, is a different question, and one which does not arise on the first issue upon this evidence. The tickets were conclusive evidence that they were passengers. Code, § 1963. How far the company should be excused for the conductor's mistake in jumping to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were not passengers because they were on the platform, and not in the car, is a matter to be urged, and doubtless was urged, to the jury on the third issue as to the measure of damages. But such mistaken inference by the conductor did not and could not destroy the effect of the uncontradicted evidence that the plaintiffs had bought and paid for and had "all right tickets," and were in fact on the train, in consequence, as passengers. There could, therefore, be no error in the view taken by the judge as to the first issue. The plaintiffs both say they showed the conductor their tickets. He denies this, but does not say they did not have tickets; nor does he testify that he asked for their tickets before he pulled them off the train, while it was in motion, as he himself testifies. This was a violation of Code, § 1962, and also of the rules of the company, No. 442, which was in evidence.

The following citations are from the very excellent brief filed by the plaintiffs' counsel, and are exactly in point: Section 1963 of the Code says that "on the due payment of freight or fare, legally authorized therefor," railroads "shall take, transport, and discharge such passengers." As between the conductor and passenger, and the right of the latter to travel, the ticket produced must be conclusive evidence. Frederick v. Railroad, 37 Mich. 342, 26 Am. Rep. 531; Hufford v. Railroad, 53 Mich. 118, 18 N. W. 580. In Creed v. Railroad, 86 Pa. 139, 27 Am. Rep. 693, the plaintiff was traveling on a passenger train and on a car "not intended for the use of passengers," and in a suit for damages it was held that the plaintiff was prima facie a passenger, though violating the rules of the company. Brooks v. Railroad, 57 Pa. 346; Thompson Carriers of Passengers (1880) 51. Irregularity in boarding the train does not sever the relationship of carrier and passenger. Smith v. Railroad (Com. Pl.) 18 N. Y. Supp. 759. To get upon the platform of a baggage car does not sever the relationship, nor subject the passenger to the assaults of the conductor. Neither the carrier nor its employees can assume that a person on any car of a passenger train is a trespasser merely because he is not in one of the cars provided for, and usually occupied by, a passenger. Railroad v. Williams (Tex. Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 350. In that case the plaintiff was on the front platform of a baggage car, and had not paid his fare. In Martin v. So. Ry. Co. (this same defendant) 51 S. C. 150, 28 S. E. 303, quoting and approving Williams' Case, it is decided that: "When one having a ticket, and with the intention to ride as a passenger, goes upon the train upon which his ticket entitles him to ride as such, even if he board the train at an unusual time and at an unusual place, he is entitled to the rights of a passenger at least to the extent of not being mistreated by the employees of the company." In Compton v. Van Volkenburgh, 34 N. J. Law, 134, the plaintiff had a ferry ticket, but, instead of passing through the small gate, which was for passengers, he entered the ferry through the large gate, intended for horses and vehicles, and in doing so violated the rules of the company. For this offense he was seized by the collar, and jerked from the railing, and dragged from the boat, not while the boat was moving, however. Chief Justice Beasley, in writing the opinion of the court, says: "This agent of the railroad company had no right to expel this plaintiff from the boat without first informing him of the existence of the regulation of the company; nor had he any right to touch his person without first notifying him that, unless he left the boat, he would resort to such extreme means to put him off. The facts stand thus: A passenger is told by a subordinate officer of a railroad company to get off a boat. The passenger replied, 'I will not; I have a ticket.' The reply is, 'It makes no difference; you must get off here,' and, without more, he is seized by the collar, and, in the presence of many onlookers, he is ignominiously expelled. I do not see but all reasonable men must unite in condemnation of such precipitate violence and indignity." In order to make Compton's Case exactly like the case at bar, the boat should have started off, and then the plaintiff seized and thrown into the water. The learned chief justice further says that "these agents of incorporated companies must be taught that personal violence must not be used except as a last resort, and after explicit notification."

(136 N. C. 328)

REYBURN v. SAWYER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 3, 1904.)

PUBLIC NUISANCES—OBSTRUCTIONS TO NAVIGATION—PRIVATE REMEDY—PECULIAR INJURY—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—INJUNCTION—GROUNDS—INSOLVENCY OF DEFENDANT.

1. The placing of pound nets in a navigable sound so as to obstruct the channel and interfere with the customary navigation under certain conditions of tide and weather, constitutes a public nuisance.

2. While the ordinary remedy for public nuisance is by indictment, one who has suffered unusual and peculiar damages by the erection of such a nuisance distinct from the grievance common to the public may sue to redress his injury.

3. One who suffers peculiar damages through the erection of a public nuisance is not confined for his remedy to an action for damages, especially where the damages arise from the injury and obstruction to the free use and enjoyment of his property, but may maintain a suit for an injunction.

4. The insolvency of defendant, so that a recovery would be of no avail and the injury irreparable, furnishes ground for an injunction to abate a nuisance erected by defendant.

5. Plaintiff was the owner of an island in a navigable sound. Defendant erected fish nets across the channel, which was the natural approach to the island, so as, under certain conditions of tide and weather, to obstruct the approach from that direction. There was, however, a reef extending at right angles to the fish nets, which could be crossed by the craft ordinarily in use on the sound under ordinary conditions, so that the obstruction of the channel in general did plaintiff no harm. On one occasion, however, plaintiff's attorney went to the island to see plaintiff on a matter of business, and while he was there a stiff breeze blew up, and continued to blow for two days, and the waves broke over the reef to such an extent that the boatmen would not cross it, and, owing to the difficulty of crossing the reef and the stakes in the channel, they were afraid to venture out, and the attorney could not leave for two days. Held, that this circumstance entitled plaintiff to an injunction restraining defendant from maintaining fish nets in the channel.

Appeal from Superior Court, Dare County; Justice, Judge.

Action by John E. Reyburn against D. C. Sawyer. From a judgment refusing an injunction, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Action to restrain by injunction the defendant from maintaining a nuisance, referred to have decided all issues of fact and law. The referee, from the evidence, finds the following facts, to wit:

"(1) Durant's Island is a body of land lying in Dare county, surrounded by the waters of Albemarle Sound, Alligator river, East Lake, and the Haulover, and is well known by the name of Durant's Island. All of said waters and land lie wholly within the state of North Carolina.

"(2) Durant's Island is swamp or marsh land, except a little around the shore—sand ridge.

"(3) That on the southern side of the island is a creek or bay making into said island from Albemarle Sound, which creek or bay is known as 'Tom Mann's Creek.'

"(4) On the 18th day of April, 1890, the state board of education made and executed a deed unto John E. Reyburn, the plaintiff, which deed was recorded in Dare county. Said deed describes and the boundaries include Durant's Island.

"(5) Near the shore of Tom Mann's creek the plaintiff has erected several houses, which are now, and have been continuously since April 18, 1890, occupied by plaintiff and his servants or agents.

"(6) The plaintiff has a house known as an icehouse, which is situated over the waters of Tom Mann's creek, which house is connected with the land by a wharf or pier.

"(7) The plaintiff has cut a canal about 10 feet wide and 30 inches deep, which canal connects the waters of Tom Mann's creek with the waters of Frying Pan, and has built some roads on the island. The said canal was cut prior to the erection of the nets hereinafter referred to.

"(8) Since 1890 the plaintiff has continuously kept on said island at least two men, who have lived in the houses which were built by plaintiff, and has also kept thereon a stock of cattle and some poultry.

"(9) In 1890, after the execution of the deed by the state board of education, the plaintiff posted notice on Durant's Island forbidding others from trespassing thereon, and has kept others from trespassing upon said island.

"(10) There is a channel leading from Tom Mann's creek into Albemarle Sound, which channel, after leaving the creek, turns eastwardly and westwardly nearly parallel with the general curvature of the shore of the island, and running eastwardly until it gets near the northeastern end of the island abreast of the Haulover, where it connects with the deep water of Albemarle Sound, which lies to the northward.

"(11) From near the mouth of Tom Mann's creek going eastwardly to where it connects with the deep waters of Albemarle Sound this channel is from 5 to 6 feet in depth, and varies from 175 to 600 feet in width. There are shoals in this channel upon which the water is only 4 feet deep.

"(12) On the northern or sound side of this channel is a reef or shoal running nearly parallel with the shore or island, which reef or shoal terminates nearly opposite the Haulover. This reef or shoal varies in width from 30 to 150 feet. The water on this shoal or reef is from 3 to 4 feet deep, and deeper abreast of Tom Mann's creek than at other parts, except where the shoal terminates nearly abreast the Haulover.

"(13) The channel above mentioned extends to the west of the mouth of Tom Mann's creek.

"(14) On the southern or shore side of this channel the water gradually shoals until it approaches the shore, but in some places it is as deep as in the channel.

"(15) The waters on the southern or shore side of the above-mentioned reef are navigable for boats drawing from three to four feet of water. That part of Albemarle Sound on the inside or shore side of the above-mentioned reef or shoal is usually and almost entirely navigated and used by boats called 'shad boats' or 'sprit-sail boats,' which boats, when loaded, draw about 30 inches of water. Boats of smaller size are also used inside of the said reef or shoal, and occasionally boats of larger size, drawing from 3 to 4 feet, come inside this reef or shoal. Boats drawing as much or more than 7 feet of water can navigate the waters of the Albemarle Sound on the outside of the said reef or shoal, and can pass from Albemarle Sound through connecting waters to the Atlantic Ocean.

"(16) When it is calm, or in moderate weather, boats drawing 30 inches can cross the reef or shoal. In rough weather, and especially when the wind is from the north, northeast, or northwest, boats drawing as much as two feet of water cannot cross the reef or shoal with safety, and in such weather boats of smaller size are not safe in Albemarle Sound. When the wind is from the north, northeast, or northwest, this reef has the effect to break the force of the waves beating upon the lee shore, and it is smoother on the inside of the reef than on the outside, and safer for such boats as usually go on the inside, than it would be on the outside of the reef.

"(17) The defendant, prior to the institution of this suit, placed a line of stakes in the waters of Albemarle Sound, which stakes are from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 inches in diameter at the water's edge, and larger at the bottom, and extend 4 or more feet above the water, and are firmly set or driven in the soil under the water. These stakes are nearly abreast of the Haulover, and run across the mouth of the above-mentioned channel, and are 140 feet from its mouth and 140 feet from the eastern end of the reef, and run parallel with the channel as it empties into the sound, and runs nearly at right angles to the reef. The first pocket or pond is from 100 to 150 yards from the reef on the sound side.

"(18) These stakes for the nets originally began about 100 yards from the shore, and from that point extended out into the sound a distance of from 1,000 to 1,200 yards. There were two stakes between the shore end of said net stakes and the shore, which two stakes have been removed since this suit began. The stakes starting from the net stake nearest the shore are placed about 60 feet apart, running out a distance of 200 to 300 yards. These stakes are called "lead stakes." At about a distance of 200 to 300 yards from the shore end of the line of stakes a square 36 feet each way is formed by stakes of similar size, the stakes forming this square are about 36 feet apart, and have smaller stakes from 12 to 18 feet apart between them. This forms the pocket of the net. From the outer side of this pocket another line of lead stakes starts and runs out about 250 yards, when another pocket is formed, and this continues until four pockets have been formed. The whole row of stakes extend into the sound about 1,200 yards from the stake nearest the shore.

"(19) At certain times during the year a net is attached to these lead stakes running from the stakes nearest the shore to the pound stakes. This net is made of net twine, and is hung upon ninethread manilla rope, which is about three-eighth inches in diameter, which manilla rope is tied to the lead stakes at about the level of the water with marlin. The net drops down in the water. These lead lines sag so as to drop about 12 to 18 inches below the top of the water in the center between the stakes. This is the usual method of setting Dutch nets.

"(20) There is attached to the pocket or pound stakes a pocket or pound net made of similar twine, with smaller meshes, tied to similar ropes, which ropes are tied to the pocket or pound stakes with marlin. This pocket or pound of the net is about 28 feet square, and is level with the water, and is tied to the stakes so as to be kept level with the water and to prevent sagging. About two feet above the pocket another line of rope is tied to the pocket stakes. This line of rope, which is tied to the pocket stakes, is called a 'hand line,' and is about 2 feet above the level of the water line. The mouth of the pocket is on the side next to the lead. This is the usual method of setting Dutch nets.

"(21) When these stakes are broken off and left in the water so that they do not show above it, a boat might run on one of them, and they become more or less dangerous, as they are liable or might knock a hole in the bottom or side of boat.

"(22) The nets are usually set, in that section, about seven months in the year. The referee is unable to find from evidence when the nets in question were hung upon the stakes, or how long they remained, or when taken up. The referee finds that the nets in question were hung to the stakes, or set, and have been taken up at least once, and have been put down again. The stakes have not been taken up since set.

"(23) Boats such as are commonly used and such as can be used in navigating the waters of Albemarle Sound when the nets are not set can with ease and safety pass between the stakes in the lead of the nets, and, should one of such boats strike one of the stakes, it would not necessarily injure or delay the boat. If the stake was rotten, or broken off at or below the water's edge, it would be more apt to injure the boat than if it were sound, and as originally set.

"(24) Shad or sprit-sail boats, and such other boats as usually navigate the waters of that part of Albemarle Sound lying inside of the reef or shoal, can, when the nets are not set, pass between the stakes of the pocket or pound, but not with ease, and these stakes are more apt to injure or delay a boat than the stakes in the lead.

"(25) When the nets are set, shad or sprit-sail boats or smaller boats, and boats as large as any that usually or can navigate the waters of that part of Albemarle Sound lying south of the reef, can, and generally with safety and without delay or hindrance, pass over the nets of the defendant by going over the lead.

"(26) When the nets are set, boats can pass through the pocket or pound, but are liable to be delayed, obstructed, and hindered in their passage.

"(27) There are times when the tide is low, the water rough, and the wind blowing hard, that boats such as are commonly used in that part of Albemarle Sound cannot cross these nets with ease and safety, and might be hindered or delayed by them.

"(28) There are times when there is but little wind, when, in order to pass over the nets, one would have to push down nets so as to let a boat go over. This can be done with safety, and with but little inconvenience, and without any practical delay.

"(29) Plaintiff cannot anchor his yacht where nets or stakes are placed, or so near thereto as will permit her to swing on the nets or stakes. There are no special advantages had by anchoring at the place where the nets are situated, or so near thereto as to permit the yacht to swing on the stakes. The usual, customary, and best anchorage is in or near the Frying Pan. Occasionally the plaintiff anchors his yacht on the outside of the reef or shoal, which he can still do.

"(30) The post office from which plaintiff gets his mail while on the island, and from which the servants of plaintiff get their mail, is Mashoes, four miles to the eastward. In going to this post office, or going to Manteo from the island, you will have to cross the nets of the defendant or go around them.

"(31) In October, 1900, or 1901, Mr. B. G. Crisp, who is the attorney and representative of plaintiff in Dare county, went from Manteo to Durant's Island to see the plaintiff about a matter of business, expecting to return the next day. During the night the wind came on to blow very hard from the northwardly, and continued to blow very hard for two days. The waves were breaking over the reef to such an extent that the boatman who carried Mr. Crisp to the island would not cross the reef. Owing to the rough water on the reef and difficulty in crossing the reef with the breakers on it and the stakes in the channel, the boatmen were afraid to venture out, and Mr. Crisp did not leave for two days. No attempt was made to start.

"(32) There are 11 stands of nets between Durant's Island and Mashoes, and in going to Mashoes from Durant's Island you cross 11 stands of nets besides the nets of the defendant.

"(33) None of the boats of the plaintiff, his servants or agents, have been delayed or obstructed in any passage which they have undertaken, or have been compelled to change their course, or been damaged on account of the stakes or nets of this defendant, and the plaintiff and his servants or agents have not been prevented from taking any passage on the water on account of the nets of the defendant.

"(34) The plaintiff has access to his island from the waters of Albemarle Sound through the western end of the channel inside of the reef just to the west of Tom Mann's Creek; also through the channel at the east end of the island. In coming from the post office or points east of Durant's Island the plaintiff would have to go around or over the nets. In passing from Tom Mann's Creek to the Haulover the plaintiff would have to cross the nets or go around them.

"Upon the foregoing facts the referee finds the following conclusions of law:

"(1) That the plaintiff is the owner of Durant's Island. Code, § 2527; Aycock v. R. R. Co., 89 N. C. 321.

"(2) That the nets and stakes are a public nuisance.

"(3) That as to the plaintiff neither the nets or the stakes are a private nuisance.

"(4) That the plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages for the setting and maintaining said nets, or to have the same abated."

J. W. Hinsdale & Son and B. G. Crisp, for appellant. Ward & Thompson and E. F. Aylett, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. The referee's conclusions of law upon the facts found by him that the action of the defendant in the placing of pound nets in the manner in which they were set constituted a public nuisance was a correct one. State v. Narrows Island Club, 100 N. C. 477, 5 S. E. 411, 6 Am. St. Rep. 618. To prevent a multiplicity of private actions, the law provides a remedy for public nuisances in the way of an indictment, by which the nuisance can be abated, or the offender punished by fine or imprisonment, or in both ways. The plaintiff in this action, however, alleges in his complaint that he has suffered, and, further, that he has shown by the proof that he has suffered, an unusual and special damage on account of the erection of the nuisance by the defendant, and that he therefore is entitled to redress by a civil action; that is, to have the nuisance abated at his own suit. The plaintiff's contention rests upon a sound principle of law, and where the facts go to show that a public nuisance has been the cause of unusual and special damage to an individual or a class of persons, as contradistinguished from a grievance common to the public, that person may bring a civil action for the redress of the injury. In Mfg. Co. v. Railroad, 117 N. C. 579, 23 S. E. 43, the defendant, by erecting a bridge across a river so low as to obstruct the passage of boats plying up and down the stream, thereby prevented a steamboat from carrying a cargo of merchandise for a consignee up the river and beyond the bridge. The court held that the defendant was liable in damages for the injury done to the plaintiff on the ground that the damage was special, and unusual to the plaintiff. The court said there: "It is not material whether this particular boat was licensed, or whether other individuals owned boats that were engaged in navigating the river. If the plaintiff suffered damage common to a class whose business required the transportation of material for manufacturing purposes from a point below the obstruction to a place located above it, but not common to the whole public, his right is not impaired by the fact that the boat was doing business as a common carrier, as well as for the manufacturer who owned it." The same principle was announced in Downs v. City of High Point, 115 N. C. 182, 20 S. E. 385. It is a principle of law found stated in all of the text-writers on the subject of nuisance, and in the decisions of many of the courts of the states. If the facts be such as the plaintiff claims he has shown them to be in this action, his right to relief by a civil action appears to be clearer in principle, and more necessary to the peace and order of society, than were the plaintiff's rights in the cases we have cited.

The plaintiff here is the owner of a tract of land (Durant's Island) situated in the midst of navigable waters, and it is necessary to the full and free enjoyment of his property that his access over the waters to that property and his egress from it should not be obstructed by nuisances erected athwart the channels of approach. The claim of the plaintiff is that not only was the erection of the fish nets in the manner in which they were constructed by the defendant a public nuisance, but that it prevented the free use and enjoyment of his private property, which was a damage and an injury to himself not in common with the public at large, but as extraordinary and special in its effects upon him. In Blanc v. Klumpke, 29 Cal. 156, the court said: "Undoubtedly, if the obstructions only affect the plaintiff in common with the public at large, although in a greater degree, he cannot have his private action; but if he is thereby obstructed in the free use of his property, and its comfortable enjoyment by him is thereby interfered with and to some extent prevented, can it be said he suffers in common only with the public at large? Anything which is injurious to health, or indecent or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property, so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property, is declared to be a nuisance, and the subject of an action; and it is further provided that such action may be brought by a person whose property is injuriously affected." In Wilder v. De Cou, 26 Minn. 10 [1 N. W. 48], the court decided that the owner of a town lot suffers a peculiar damage by the obstruction of a portion of a public street immediately in front of his lot, and that he might therefore maintain an action to prevent such obstruction, although the same may be a public nuisance. In Rex v. Dewanap, 16 East, 196, Lord Ellenborough said: "I did not expect that it would have been disputed at this day, though a nuisance may be public, yet that there may be a special grievance arising out of the common cause of injury, which presses more upon particular individuals than upon others not so immediately within the influences of it. In the case of stopping a common highway which may affect all the subjects, yet if any person sustains a special injury from it he has an action. This must necessarily be a special grievance to those who live within the direct influence of the nuisance, and are therefore parties aggrieved within the statute allowing such parties costs." In Wood on Nuisances, pp. 886, 887, it is said: "Redress may be had through the medium of a private action in behalf of each person specially injured, although the same damage is inflicted upon many persons at one and the same time—as an obstruction of a highway leading to one's premises, or so as to obstruct access thereto, or otherwise producing special damage. The obstruction of a navigable stream so as to hinder or delay passage over the same, or producing actual damage to vessels, or by cutting off the approach to a private wharf or premises so as to injure one's premises, is such a special injury as enables the person so injured to maintain an action." In Park v. Railroad, 43 Iowa, 636, a correct syllabus of the decision may be stated as follows: "Injuries resulting from the obstruction of highways leading to the premises of the party complaining and interfering with access to them are proper grounds of recovery by the injured party, and this is so although many others sustain similar injuries from the same cause." And we are of the opinion that one who suffers damage, through the erection of a public nuisance, unusual and special to himself, is not confined in his remedy to an action merely for damages, especially where the damage arises from an injury and obstruction to the free use and enjoyment of one's property—lands and tenements, as in this case. In 2 Wood on Nuisances, p. 1159, the author says: "Any person injuriously affected by a nuisance, who could maintain an action at law therefor, can maintain a bill in equity for an injunction;" and Barnes v. Hathorn, 54 Me. 127; Thebaut v. Canova, 11 Fla. 143, Peck v. Elder, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 126, Dana v. Valentine, 5 Metc. (Mass.) 8, are cited in support of the text. Indeed, in a case like the present, it would be impossible to fix with any degree of certainty the damages which the plaintiff ought to recover for the obstruction of his access to his property, and this court has said in Jolly v. Brady, 127 N. C. 142, 37 S. E. 153: "But when the damage cannot be reasonably compensated in a suit at law, or the injury is irreparable, the court will stay the injury by injunctive order until the parties shall have the main facts determined by a jury." In Wood on Nuisances, p. 119, it is said that: "When the injury is not susceptible of adequate compensation in damages, or where the injury is a constantly recurring grievance, a court of equity will interpose by injunction." In Works v. Junction R. Co., 5 McLean, 425, Fed. Cas. No. 18,046, the court said: "If such injury exists, no adequate remedy can be found by an action at law. From the nature of the injury its extent cannot be ascertained with precision. It is permanent. Consequently the suits of law for redress must be endless. In such case adequate relief can be given only by injunction. It prevents the wrong. To establish this wrong it need not be measured by dollars and cents. It must be shown to exist; it must be material, but the particular amount of damage need not be shown." But, besides, in this case it appears that, if damages could be made a sufficient compensation for the injury done to the plaintiff, a recovery would be of no avail on account of the insolvency of the defendant, and the injury would therefore be irreparable. In 1 Beach on Injunction, § 34, it is said: "A court of equity, in the exercise of its discretion, may grant an injunction to prevent a breach or an injury for which there can be no other redress on account of the defendant's insolvency," and in Kerlin v. West, 4 N. J. Eq. 449, it was declared that an injury may be irreparable either from its nature or the want of responsibility in the person committing it. 10 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 956.

So far we have considered this case on the theory that the referee had found the facts as the plaintiff insisted they should have been found from the evidence. The referee, however, found as a fact that "none of the boats of the plaintiff, his servants or agents, had been delayed or obstructed in any passage which they have undertaken, or had been compelled to change their course, or been damaged on account of the stakes or nets of this defendant, and the plaintiff and his servants or agents have not been prevented from taking any passage on the water on account of the nets of the defendant." If there had been no other finding of fact by the referee on the subject of the obstruction of the plaintiff's access to his premises, the judgment of the court below upon the referee's report would have to be affirmed. But there was another finding of fact on that subject, and one totally inconsistent with the finding which we have quoted above, which will result in a reversal of the legal conclusion upon those findings. The inconsistent finding of fact referred to is in these words: "In October, 1900, or 1901, B. G. Crisp, who is the attorney and representative of the plaintiff in Dare county, went from Manteo to Durant's Island to see the plaintiff about a matter of business, expecting to return the next day. During the night the wind came on to blow very hard from the northwardly, and continued to blow very hard for two days. The waves were breaking over the reef to such an extent that the boatmen who carried Crisp to the island would not cross the reef. Owing to the rough water on the reef and the difficulty in crossing the reef with the breakers on it and the stakes in the channel, the boatmen were afraid to venture out, and Crisp did not leave for two days. No attempt was made to start." We are of the opinion that upon that finding of fact the court should have given judgment that the plaintiff should have his injunction for the abatement of the nuisance.

McNEILL v. DURHAM & C. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 1, 1904.)

CARRIERS—ILLEGAL PASS—CONDITIONS—PASSENGERS—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—NEG-LIGENCE—PERSONAL INJURIES.

1. Conditions printed on the back of a pass which was void because in violation of Laws 1891, p. 277, c. 320, § 4, forbidding discrimination, have no application in an action by the holder of the pass against the railroad company for injuries received while riding on the pass.

2. The rights, privileges, and protection attaching to the relation of a passenger are imposed by law upon common carriers upon considerations of public policy, independent of contract, and arise from the nature of their public employment.

3. Laws 1891, p. 277, c. 320, § 4, provides that, if a common carrier charge any person a greater or less compensation than it charges any other person for a like service, the carrier shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination liable to fine. Plaintiff was injured by the negligence of the railroad company while riding on a pass which was void under the statute. Held, that he was a passenger, and entitled to recover as such, not being in pari delicto with the company in the violation of law.

Clark, C. J., and Montgomery, J., dissenting.

On Rehearing. Petition allowed, and judgment below affirmed.

For former opinion, see 44 S. E. 34.

DOUGLAS, J. This is a rehearing of the case originally decided in 132 N. C. 510, 44 S. E. 34, 95 Am. St. Rep. 641. We fully concur in our former opinion as to the illegality of the contract by which the defendant agreed to give to the plaintiff free personal transportation to an unlimited extent in consideration of certain advertising. The only ground on which we allow the petition is that the plea in pari delicto, applying solely to the contract of carriage, is not a defense to an action for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant.

The plaintiff testified as follows: "Marshall called on me for my ticket. I told him I had a pass for 1899, and showed it to him, and told him I would pay the regular fare if he wanted it. He said it was all right. I was the editor of the Carthage Blade, a newspaper published at Carthage. In 1899 I made a contract with the defendant to publish its time-table in my paper as the consideration for the pass. I did publish the time-table, and the defendant agreed to continue the contract and renew the pass for 1900. The contract was not in writing."

The superintendent of the defendant company, testified that there was no such contract, but that the pass was a gratuity. This raised a question of credibility, which in the view we take of the case becomes of no practical importance. In any event it would be a question of fact for the jury. The contract for transportation was rendered absolutely void by the statute, founded upon public policy, whether based upon no consideration or upon the inadequate consideration of printing a time-table. The pass, issued in pursuance of an illegal contract and for the purpose of carrying out its unlawful purpose, inherits its invalidity. The defendant was free at all times to decline to carry the plaintiff except upon the payment of the usual fare, and to eject him from its train upon his refusal to pay. The fact that the pass had expired makes no difference, as, in its character as a contract, it never had any legal existence. Being without legal existence, it was equally devoid of legal effect, and, conferring no rights upon the plaintiff, imposed upon him no obligations which the law will enforce. A void contract is thus defined in Lawson on Contracts, § 350: "A void contract is one destitute of legal effect. It is a mere nullity, and good for no purpose whatever. It is binding upon neither party, and may be attacked as invalid by strangers. It does not require any disaffirmance to avoid it, but may be simply disregarded, and it cannot be ratified and made valid."

The pass itself being worthless, the conditions on the back thereof could have no application. They were not independent contracts, and, if they had been, were totally wanting in a legal consideration. Therefore this case does not come within the principle laid down in Northern Pac. R. v. Adams, 192 U. S. 440, 24 Sup. Ct. 408, 48 L. Ed. —, where the pass was recognized as a lawful and valid contract for free transportation. By citing and distinguishing that case, decided by a divided court, we do not mean to express our approval of its argument or conclusion. It is not necessary for us to consider it in the case now before us.

We may here repeat that it is not the unlawful contract for free transportation which renders a railroad company liable to the penalty, but it is the transportation itself. In the view of this statute a free pass is a mere incident, as the same result could be obtained by issuing a thousand-mile ticket or one in ordinary form. The offense consists in the free carriage of a passenger, whether with or without a pass or ticket; and the offense is complete when such passenger is carried any appreciable distance. The railroad company may have issued to him a free pass or ticket from Raleigh to New York with impunity, but would become liable to the full penalties prescribed by the statute as soon as it had transported such passenger to the first station out of Raleigh. In using the term "free transportation," we mean to include all transportation which justly comes within the forbidden principle of discrimination. A mere colorable consideration will neither evade the penalties of the statute upon the one hand, nor confer any rights upon the other.

We must bear in mind that while the statute renders absolutely void any contract for free transportation, so that neither party thereto can acquire any rights thereunder, it imposes the penalty only upon the transportation company. The act of free transportation alone is criminal. The party accepting such transportation is not guilty of a criminal act, whatever moral blame may attach to the reception of unlawful favors. Therefore, in contemplation of law, the parties cannot be considered in pari delicto. This difference is well expressed by Pearson, C. J., speaking for the court in Melvin v. Easley, 52 N. C. 356. That was an action for deceit and false warranty in the sale of a horse on Sunday by a horse trader, in violation of Rev. St. c. 118, § 1. The court says, on page 358, 52 N. C.: "It is said that the plaintiff knew the defendant was a horse trader and concurred in his violation of the statute, and, consequently, was particeps criminis. Does this consequence follow? In crimes, there are accessories; in misdemeanors, all who aid or concur are held to be equally guilty, and are subject to like punishment with the party who commits the offense. This plaintiff is not guilty of violating the law, and is not subjected to a penalty, so he cannot be particeps criminis in the legal sense of the term. He is not in pari delicto, and it is against the policy of the law, and will defeat its object, so to consider him. The court will not aid any person who violates the law; therefore the defendant could not maintain an action. This rule is adopted on the ground of policy, for the purpose of preventing a violation of the law, and, if confined in its operation to the actual offender, its application will be salutary; but if it be extended to the party who is not an offender, so far from checking, it will encourage a violation of it, by letting it be known to 'horse traders,' 'shopkeepers,' and 'all whom it may concern,' that they may cheat with impunity, provided always it may be done on the Lord's Day."

The plaintiff was lawfully upon the defendant's train, and testifies that he offered to pay his fare if required by the conductor. The conductor permitted him to ride free, not as a personal favor to him, but in furtherance of a contract between him and the company itself, acting through its superior officers. There is no suggestion that the plaintiff was seeking to defraud the company in any manner, or that there was any collusion between him and the conductor. He was in every respect a bona fide passenger, and entitled to all the protection incident thereto, unless deprived thereof by the acceptance of free transportation.

The cases relied on to sustain the defense of in pari delicto are chiefly of two classes, those involving a violation of the Sunday laws, and those growing out of the relation of the plaintiff towards the national government during the Civil War. The latter class, evoked from conditions now happily passed away forever, furnishes no criterion for the determination of the case at bar. It is enough to say that in both classes of cases the plaintiffs were actually engaged in the performance of an act expressly denounced as criminal by the law of the land, as construed by the courts in which the actions were necessarily brought. The following are illustrative cases: Turner v. Railroad, 63 N. C. 522; Martin v. Wallace, 40 Ga. 52; Wallace v. Cannon, 38 Ga. 199, 95 Am. Dec. 385; Railroad v. Redd, 54 Ga. 83; Connolly v. Boston, 117 Mass. 64, 19 Am. Rep. 396; Smith v. Railroad, 120 Mass. 491, 21 Am. Rep. 538; Lyons v. Desotelle, 124 Mass. 387; Holcomb v. Danby, 51 Vt. 428. While entertaining the highest respect for the Lord's Day, the Sunday of the new law, we have not deemed it our duty to enforce its observance, so as to make it the shield of wrong. Rodman v. Robinson (at this term) 47 S. E. 19.

In the case at bar the plaintiff is certainly neither a tramp nor a trespasser, as both of those terms imply an unlawful presence against the will of the owner. Hence it is needless to examine the cases dealing with such relations. If the plaintiff's evidence be true, he was not a gratuitous passenger in the full sense of the term, inasmuch as he printed in his paper the schedule of trains in consideration of his otherwise free carriage. This was an inadequate consideration which rendered the contract void as an unlawful discrimination, but it was none the less a consideration of some actual value. But while this might, as between the plaintiff and the defendant, bring the case within the principle of N. Y. C. R. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. Ed. 627, we deem it proper to treat the plaintiff as a gratuitous passenger, in view of the unlawful consideration, and will cite the able opinion in that celebrated case only in so far as it relates to this view of the case at bar.

It is often said that one becomes a passenger by virtue of a contract. This is not always so. A contract is a voluntary agreement between two parties, a coming together of two minds to a common intent, and yet a passenger may become such without a contract, and, indeed, against the will of the carrier. A common carrier has no right to refuse a passenger without sufficient reasons, and such reasons so rarely occur, and are so exceptional in their nature, as to vary the general rule too slightly for practical consideration. Suppose the carrier without legal excuse should refuse to sell a ticket to one having the bona fide intention of becoming a passenger, and that the passenger should then enter the carrier's train in an orderly manner, take his seat in the proper car, and tender his fare to the conductor, would the refusal of such fare deprive him of his legal status as a passenger? Assuredly not. He would be a passenger in the fullest meaning of the term, entitled to all the rights, privileges, and protection attaching to that relation, and yet there would be no actual contract between him and the carrier. But it may be said that the law raises an implied contract. Even if we accept that form of expression, it simply means that the law imposes upon a common carrier certain duties and liabilities which adhere to the nature of his calling. We prefer to adopt the more direct expression and say that those duties and liabilities are imposed by law upon common carriers upon considerations of public policy independent of contract, and arise from the nature of their public employment. Contracts may be made with the carrier, but into all such contracts certain conditions are written by the hand of the law. One such condition is the inherent liability of the carrier for all injuries proximately resulting from its own negligence or that of its servants. But as we have already said, in the case at bar there was no legally existing contract, which is equivalent to saying there was no contract at all. Viewing the plaintiff as a gratuitous passenger, and it appearing from the verdict that he was injured through the negligence of the defendant, we think that he is entitled to recover.

We have given this case most careful consideration, and have examined a very large number of authorities, but will cite those only which directly bear upon the case in the view we take of it, omitting needless repetitions from the same state. Neither time nor space will permit the discussion of cases having no essential relation to that at bar.

It is significant that the greater weight of authority is to the effect that a passenger may recover for injuries received from the negligence of a common carrier or its servants, even when unlawfully traveling on Sunday, or on a lawful pass with conditions indorsed thereon releasing the carrier from all liability. In both cases the cause of action is attributed to injuries resulting from the breach of a public duty. A fortiori the plaintiff can recover for such negligence when the defendant alone is in the commission of an unlawful act, and when there is no release of liability.

We will begin our citations from the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, a court which is not addicted to emotional jurisprudence, and has never shown any disposition to burden railroad management with unnecessary conditions or restrictions. In Railroad v. Butler, 57 Pa. 335, the intestate was killed while riding on a free pass on which a release was indorsed. Sharswood, J., speaking for the court, says on page 337: "The first error assigned has been properly abandoned, as it is too well settled to be now controverted that a stipulation by a common carrier that he shall not be liable for damages does not relieve him from responsibility for actual negligence by himself or servants." This case is cited with approval upon the same point in Burnett v. Railroad, 176 Pa. 45, 84 Atl. 972, the latest case upon the subject.

In Carroll v. Railroad, 58 N. Y. 126, 17 Am. Rep. 221, where the plaintiff was traveling on Sunday, contrary to the statute, it was held that: "The duty imposed by law upon the carrier of passengers to carry them safely, as far as human skill and foresight can go, exists independently of contract. For a negligent injury to a passenger an action lies against the carrier, although there be no contract, and the service he is rendering is gratuitous; and, whether the action is brought upon contract or for failure to perform the duty, the liability is the same. One violating the statute prohibiting travel upon Sunday (1 Rev. St. [Edmond's Ed.] p. 628, pt. 1, c. 20, tit. 8, § 70) is not without the protection of the law. The carrier owes to him the same duty as if he were lawfully traveling, and is responsible for a failure to perform it, the same in the one case as in the other." The court says, on pages 133, 134: "But we deem it unnecessary to decide the question, which was argued with great ability by counsel, touching the liability of the defendant in the action, treating it as founded upon the contract between the parties. The gravamen of the action is the breach of the duty imposed by law upon the carrier of passengers to carry safely, so far as human skill and foresight can go, the persons it undertakes to carry. This duty exists independently of contract, and although there is no contract in a legal sense between the parties. Whether there is a contract to carry, or the service undertaken is gratuitous, an action on the case lies against the carrier for a negligent injury to a passenger. The law raises the duty out of regard for human life, and for the purpose of securing the utmost vigilance by carriers in protecting those who have committed themselves to their hands. The liability of the carrier is the same, whether the action is brought upon contract or upon the duty, and the evidence requisite to sustain the action in either form is substantially the same, and when there is an actual contract to carry, it is properly said that the liability in an action founded upon the public duty is coextensive with the liability on the contract. This case, therefore, is not within the principle of many of the cases cited, which forbid a recovery upon a contract made in respect to a matter prohibited by law, or for a cause of action which requires the proof of an illegal contract to support it."

In Railroad v. Trautwein, 52 N. J. Law, 166, 19 Atl. 178, 7 L. R. A. 435, 19 Am. St. Rep. 442, it was held that the plaintiff could recover although unlawfully traveling on Sunday, the court saying, on pages 171, 172, 52 N. J. Law, page 179, 19 Atl., 7 L. R. A. 435, 19 Am. St. Rep. 442: "A contract to carry, made on Sunday, or to be performed on Sunday, is, by force of the statute, illegal and void. No action could be maintained for the breach of such a contract, nor for services performed under it, where the right of action rests exclusively upon a contract, express or implied. It is also clear that a plaintiff will fail where, to make a cause of action, he is compelled to rely upon an illegal contract. But the duty of persons engaged in these public employments to safely and securely carry is independent of contract. It is a duty imposed by law from considerations of public policy, and arises from the fact that persons or property are received in the course of the business of such employments. Nor was the plaintiff's violation of the Sunday law, in a legal sense, the cause of her injury. It was only the occasion for an injury by the defendant's wrongful act, and hence her wrongdoing did not contribute to the injury in such a sense as to deprive her of her right of action; it was merely a condition, and not a contributory cause of the injury."

In State, Use of Abell, v. Railroad, 68 Md. 433, it was held that "when a carrier undertakes, without any special contract, to carry a passenger gratuitously, the passenger is entitled to the same degree of care as if he had paid his fare." The court says, on page 443: "The principle announced in this decision, that the duty of the carrier to convey safely does not result from the consideration paid, but is imposed by law, has been recognized by this court on the motion to reargue the case of Baltimore City Pass. Railway Co. v. Kemp and Wife, 61 Md. 619, 48 Am. Rep. 134, where the court says that a common carrier who accepts a party to be carried owes to that party a duty to be careful, irrespective of contract, and this court illustrates the principle by the example of a child for whom no fare is charged, but who could recover in case of injury, the result of negligence."

In Lemon v. Chanslor, 68 Mo. 340, 30 Am. Rep. 799, a gratuitous passenger injured by the breaking down of a hack was allowed to recover. The court says, on page 357: "This, we think, was sufficient to authorize the instruction. The principle announced in it, that, although plaintiff might have been a gratuitous passenger, such fact constituted no defense, is supported by all the authorities which have come under our observation. While in some of them intimations are made that in the case of a gratuitous passenger the carrier may only be liable for gross negligence, it has not been held in any of them that such fact would exempt the carrier from all liability. On the contrary, the weight of authority favors the doctrine of holding the carrier of passengers to the same degree of diligence in all cases where one has been received as a passenger, on the principle that if a man undertakes to do a thing to the best of his skill, when his situation or profession is such as to imply skill, an omission of that skill is imputable to him as gross negligence."

In Jacobus v. Railway, 20 Minn. 125 (Gil. 110), 18 Am. Rep. 360, it was held that the plaintiff could recover although riding on a pass, as the same degree of care was required of the common carrier as if the plaintiff had been a passenger carried for hire. The court says, on page 129, 20 Minn. (Gil. 112), 78 Am. Rep. 360: "In the case at bar, however, the plaintiff was not merely a gratuitous passenger, i. e., a passenger carried without payment of fare or other consideration. He was a passenger upon a free pass expressly conditioned that the defendant should not be liable to him for any injury of his person while he was using or having the benefit of such pass. Does this circumstance distinguish his case from that of a merely gratuitous passenger? * * * There are two distinct considerations upon which the stringent rule as to the duty and liability of carriers of passengers rests. One is a regard for the safety of the passenger on his own account, and the other is a regard for his safety as a citizen of the state. The latter is a consideration of public policy growing out of the interest which the state or government, as parens patrie, has in protecting the lives and limbs of its subjects. * * * So far as the consideration of public policy is concerned, it cannot be overridden by any stipulation of the parties to the contract of passenger carriage, since it is paramount from its very nature. No stipulation of the parties in disregard of it, or involving its sacrifice in any degree, can, then, be permitted to stand. Whether the case be one of a passenger for hire, a merely gratuitous passenger, or of a passenger upon a conditioned free pass, as in this instance, the interest of the state in the safety of the citizen is obviously the same. The more stringent the rule as to the duty and liability of the carrier, and the more rigidly it is enforced, the greater will be the care exercised, and the more approximately perfect the safety of the passenger. Any relaxation of the rule as to duty or liability naturally, and, it may be said, inevitably, tends to bring about a corresponding relaxation of care and diligence upon the part of the carrier. We can conceive of no reason why these propositions are not equally applicable to passengers of either of the kinds above mentioned."

In Tibby v. Railway Co., 82 Mo. 292, the intestate was killed while riding on a free pass on top of a cattle car. The plaintiff was allowed to recover, the court saying, on page 300: "The contract of exemption from damages was properly excluded. A common carrier is not permitted to stipulate against its own negligence. (Citing cases.) This rule in its application to the carriage of passengers has never been relaxed."

In Opsahl v. Judd, 30 Minn. 126, 14 N. W. 575, the plaintiff, unlawfully traveling on Sunday, was permitted to recover. The court says, on page 128, 30 Minn., page 576, 14 N. W.: "It is further contended that the deceased was, by accepting passage upon the steamboat, engaged in an unlawful act, and was particeps criminis with the defendants and their agents in violating the Sunday law. It is a sufficient answer to this objection that the defendants on that day occupied the relation of common carriers of passengers, and their general obligation to use such care and diligence as the law enjoins is not limited by the contract with the passengers, nor with the person who engaged the use of the boat and the services of the crew for that day, but is governed by considerations of public policy. That the undertaking was unlawful does not touch the question. Carroll v. Staten Island R. Co., 58 N. Y. 126, 134; Jacobus v. St. Paul & Chicago Ry. Co., 20 Minn. 125 (Gil. 110), 18 Am. Rep. 360. As remarked by the court in that case, 'any relaxation in the rule as to duty or liability naturally, and, it may be said, inevitably, tends to bring about a corresponding relaxation of care and diligence upon the part of the carrier.'"

In Rose v. Railroad, 39 Iowa, 246, it was held, quoting the headnote, that: "The payment of fare is not necessary to create the relation of common carrier and passenger. A railroad company was held to be liable for causing the death of a passenger by the negligence of its employes, notwithstanding he was at the time riding upon a free pass, upon which was a stipulation, signed by himself, releasing the company from all liability for injury to his person or property while using the same." In its opinion the court adopts the language used in Railway Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 468, 14 L. Ed. 502.

In Russell v. Railroad, 157 Ind. 805, 61 N. E. 678, 55 L. R. A. 253, 87 Am. St. Rep. 214, the release from liability given by a Pullman porter was held valid on the ground that he was not a passenger, but the court uses the following language on page 309, 157 Ind., page 679, 61 N. E., 55 L. R. A. 253, 87 Am. St. Rep. 214: "The decisions of this state firmly establish that a common carrier of goods or passengers cannot contract with a customer for a release of the carrier from liability resulting from the latter's negligence. (Citing cases.) The grounds upon which this prohibition rests are variously stated by the court. It has been said that such exemptions are against public policy, that the public is interested in the exercise of care and diligence on the part of the carrier, that it is unreasonable for any person or corporation to contract for the privilege of being negligent, and that the public is concerned with the life and security of every citizen. The fundamental reason, however, for holding common carriers, such as the appellee, liable for the results of their negligence, notwithstanding contracts exempting them therefrom, is that the state has granted them privileges which they exercise for the benefit of the public; in return for these, the common carrier impliedly undertakes to use due care and diligence in the transportation of both goods and passengers. This being a main inducement for the grant of its special rights, the carrier cannot by any special contract rid itself of the burden of responsibility, which is one of the conditions of its creation. Were it permitted to escape liability by entering into exonerating agreements, its position of advantage over its patrons would in almost every instance enable it to force from them such stipulations as it desired, and the object of the state in creating the carrier would be virtually defeated, the carrier thus being able to abandon the duty imposed upon it by the state. As said in the case of Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Faylor, 126 Ind. 126, 25 N. E. 869, at page 180, 126 Ind., page 869, 25 N. E.: 'A stipulation that the carrier shall not be bound to the exercise of care and diligence is in effect an agreement to absolve him from one of the essential duties of his employment, and it would be subversive of the very object of the law to permit the carrier to exempt himself from liability by a stipulation in his contract with a passenger that the latter should take the risk of the negligence of the carrier or of his servants. The law will not allow the carrier thus to abandon his obligation to the public, and hence all stipulations which amount to a denial or repudiation of duties which are of the very essence of his employment will be regarded as unreasonable, contrary to public policy, and therefore void.' In Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Curran, 19 Ohio St. 1, 2 Am. Rep. 382, at page 12, 19 Ohio St., 2 Am. St. Rep. 362, the court says: 'Carriers, of the class of the plaintiff in error, are creatures of legislation, and derive all their powers and privileges by grant from the public. They are created to effect public purposes, as well as to subserve their own interest. They are intended, by the law of their creation, to afford increased facilities to the public for the carriage of persons and property, and, in performing this office, they assume the character of public agents, and impliedly undertake to employ in their business the necessary degree of skill and care. This obligation arises from the public nature of the employment, and is founded on the policy of the law for the protection of the persons and property of the public, which must of necessity be committed to a very great extent to the care of public carriers. It cannot be denied that pecuniary liability for negligence promotes care, and, if public carriers in conducting their business can graduate their charges so as to discharge themselves from such liability, the direct effect will be to encourage negligence by diminishing the motives for diligence.'" In Davis v. Railway Co., 93 Wis. 470, 67 N. W. 16, 33 L. R. A. 654, 57 Am. St. Rep. 985, it was held: "A stipulation in a contract for the carriage of a passenger, exempting the carrier from liability for injuries caused by its negligence or the negligence of its agents or employes, is void as against public policy;" the court saying, on page 479, 93 Wis., page 18, 67 N. W., 33 L. R. A. 654, 57 Am. St. Rep. 985: "It is very well established in this state that a contract for such an exemption from liability of a common carrier is void as against public policy. The defendant could not by any agreement, however plain and explicit, wholly relieve itself from liability for injuries caused by its negligence or the negligence of its agents or employes."

In Railway Co. v. McGown, 65 Tex. 640, it was held, quoting the headnotes, that: "A common carrier of passengers cannot by contract relieve itself from responsibility, or even limit its liability, for injuries to a passenger resulting from the negligence of itself or its employes or agents in the scope of their employment; and this is so with reference as well to passengers traveling free of charge as to those paying full fare. The liability of the carrier of passengers does not depend on the fact that compensation for the passenger has been paid to it, but the same degree of care is incumbent on the carrier in the case of a passenger traveling on a free pass as in the case of one paying full fare." The court says, on page 648: "The relation of passenger and carrier is created by contract, express or implied, but it does not follow from this that the extent of liability or responsibility of the carrier is in any respect dependent on a contract. In reference to matters indifferent to the public, parties may contract as they please, but not so in reference to matters in which the public has an interest. For the purpose of regulating such matters, rules have been established, by statute or the common law, whereby certain duties have been attached to given relations and employments. These duties attach as matter of law, and without regard to the will or wish of the party engaged in the employment, or of the person who transacts business with him, in the course thereof; and this is so for the public good. Duties thus imposed are not the subject of contract. They exist without it, and cannot be dispensed with by it. The violation of such a duty is a tort. The law declares that it is the duty of a public carrier of passengers to use the highest degree of care to insure their safety. Why was not this left to be settled by the contract of the carrier and passenger? Certainly for no other reason than that the employment itself was of such a nature as to make it a matter of public concern. None could be of greater public concern at the present day than these employments by which men, women, and children are transported by millions, by agencies of a most dangerous character, and with a speed heretofore unknown."

In Railroad v. Crudup, 63 Miss. 291, it was held that a mail agent traveling on a "free ticket" could recover, the court saying, on page 302: "The court properly excluded the evidence proposed by the defendant to show that the deceased had accepted a 'free ticket,' by which he relieved the company from liability for the negligence of its servants. By their contract with the government the company received compensation for transporting both the mail and its custodians, and there would have been no consideration for the obligation entered into by the deceased to waive damages; and in addition to this it may be added that such a contract is against public policy. The duty which common carriers owe to all persons carried by it, viz., not to be guilty of negligent injury, is one against the breach of which they may not protect themselves by private contract."

In Railroad v. Hopkins, 41 Ala. 486, 94 Am. Dec. 607, the court says: "We do hold, however, that it makes no difference whether the service is performed gratuitously or not, in regard to the obligation to perform it well, after it is once entered upon; for ever since the decision of the leading case of Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 82, it has been regarded as sound law that 'the confidence induced by undertaking any service for another is a sufficient legal consideration to create a duty in the performance of it.' And we hold, further, that, in undertaking the performance of gratuitous transportation, the common carrier can no more stipulate for exemption from liability for damage occasioned by the negligence, or willful default, or tort of himself or his servants, than he can when he receives a reward for the service to be performed; both are alike prohibited by a sound public policy, which also forbids a gratuitous bailee, not bound by the considerations of public duty attached to the office of a common carrier, from stipulating that he may be fraudulently negligent or safely dishonest. Railroad companies are incorporated in part, at least, from public considerations, and for the public good. As carriers of persons and property, it has been held they may be considered as acting in a public capacity, and as a kind of public officers. The exercise of honesty, care, and diligence by them or their agents and employés is a public duty resulting from their position, the obligation to perform which cannot be thrown off by contract. If thus thrown off, the effect would be to relax or modify the performance of the duty, and to promote a relaxation of proper care in the selection of agents and servants for its performance."

In Waterbury v. Railroad (C. C.) 17 Fed. 671, it was held that: "The right which a passenger by railway has to be carried safely does not depend on his having made a contract, but the fact of his being there creates a duty on the part of the company to carry him safely. It suffices to enable him to maintain an action for negligence if he was being carried by the railroad company voluntarily, although gratuitously, and as a mere matter of favor to him." Wallace, C. J., says, on page 672: "A careful examination of the evidence shows quite satisfactorily that the case did not justify the assumption, in any aspect of it, that the plaintiff was entitled to be carried as a passenger, as an implied condition of the contract to carry his cattle. The most that can be fairly claimed for the plaintiff upon the evidence is that he was riding upon the engine permissively. If he was riding there with the consent of the defendant, express or implied, it is not material, so far as it affects the defendant's liability for negligence, whether he was there as a matter of right or a matter of favor, as a passenger or a mere licensee. It suffices to enable him to maintain an action for negligence if he was being carried by the defendant voluntarily. If the defendant undertook to carry him, although gratuitously, and as a mere matter of favor to himself, it was obligated to exercise due care for his safety in performing the undertaking it had voluntarily assumed. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 468 [14 L. Ed. 502]; Steamboat New World v. King, 16 How. 469 [14 L. Ed. 1019]. The carrier does not, by consenting to carry a person gratuitously, relieve himself of responsibility for negligence. When the assent to his riding free has been legally and properly given, the person carried is entitled to the same degree of care as if he paid his fare Todd v. Old Colony, etc., R. Co., 3 Allen, 18 [80 Am. Dec. 49]. As is tersely stated by Blackburn, J., in Austin v. Great Western Ry. Co., 15 Wkly. Rep. 863: 'The right which a passenger by railway has to be carried safely does not depend on his having made a contract, but the fact of his being there creates a duty on the part of the company to carry him safely."

In Railroad v. Derby, 14 How. 468, 14 L. Ed. 502, it was held that a gratuitous passenger could recover, the court saying, on page 484, 14 How., 14 L. Ed. 502: "The liability of the defendants below for the negligent and injurious act of their servant is not necessarily founded on any contract or privity between the parties, nor affected by any relation, social or otherwise, which they bore to each other. It is true, a traveler by stage-coach or other public conveyance, who is injured by the negligence of the driver, has an action against the owner, founded on his contract to carry him safely. But the maxim of 'respondeat superior,' which, by legal imputation, makes the master liable for the acts of his servant, is wholly irrespective of any contract, express or implied, or any other relation between the injured party and the master. If one be lawfully on the street or highway, and another's servant carelessly drives a stage or carriage against him and injures his property or person, it is no answer, to an action against the master for such injury, either that the plaintiff was riding for pleasure, or that he was a stockholder in the road, or that he had not paid his toll, or that he was the guest of the defendant, or riding in a carriage borrowed from him, or that the defendant was the friend, benefactor, or brother of the plaintiff. These arguments, arising from the social or domestic relations of life, may in some cases successfully appeal to the feelings of the plaintiff, but will usually have little effect where the defendant is a corporation, which is itself incapable of such relations or the reciprocation of such feelings. In this view of the case, if the plaintiff was lawfully on the road at the time of the collision, the court were right in instructing the jury that none of the antecedent circumstances or accidents of his situation could affect his right to recover."

* * * This duty does not result alone from the consideration paid for the service. It is imposed by the law, even where the service is gratuitous. "The confidence induced by undertaking any service for another is a sufficient legal consideration to create a duty in the performance of it." See Coggs v. Bernard, and cases cited in 1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 95. It is true, a distinction has been taken in some cases between simple negligence and great or gross negligence, and it is said that one who acts gratuitously is liable only for the latter. But this case does not call upon us to define the difference (if it be capable of definition), as the verdict has found this to be a case of gross negligence. When carriers undertake to convey persons by the powerful but dangerous agency of steam, public policy and safety require that they be held to the greatest possible care and diligence. And whether the consideration for such transportation be pecuniary or otherwise, the personal safety of the passengers should not be left to the sport of chance or the negligence of careless agents. Any negligence in such cases may well deserve the epithet of 'gross.' The citations of this celebrated case will be found in 5 Rose's Notes (U. S.) 275-284.

In Steamboat New World v. King, 16 How. 469, 14 L. Ed. 1019, Curtis, J., speaking for the court, says, on page 474, 16 How., 14 L. Ed. 1019: "In the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company v. Derby, 14 How. 468 [14 L. Ed. 502], which was a case of gratuitous carriage of a passenger on a railroad, this court said: 'When carriers undertake to convey persons by the powerful but dangerous agency of steam, public policy and safety require that they should be held to the greatest possible care and diligence. And whether the consideration for such transportation be pecuniary or otherwise, the personal safety of passengers should not be left to the sport of chance or the negligence of careless agents. Any negligence in such cases may well deserve the epithet of "gross." We desire to be understood to reaffirm that doctrine, as resting, not only on public policy, but on sound principles of law.'

In the celebrated case of Railroad v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. Ed. 627, than which there are few opinions more able or more widely cited and approved, it was held, quoting the language of the court at the conclusion of its opinion on page 384, 17 Wall., 21 L. Ed. 627, that: "First. That a common carrier cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility when such exemption is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law. Secondly. That it is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law for a common carrier to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants. Thirdly. That these rules apply both to carriers of goods and carriers of passengers for hire, and with special force to the latter. Fourthly. That a drover traveling on a pass, such as was given in this case, for the purpose of taking care of his stock on the train, is a passenger for hire. These conclusions decide the present case, and require a judgment of affirmance. We purposely abstain from expressing any opinion as to what would have been the result of our judgment had we considered the plaintiff a free passenger instead of a passenger for hire." The plaintiff was traveling on what was called a "drover's pass," which expressly stipulated that the acceptance of the pass was to be considered a waiver of all claims for damages or injuries received on the train. The court held that, while the pass was professedly gratuitous on its face, it was in fact given as part of the original contract for shipping the cattle. The case is treated as a carriage for hire, but the reasoning of the opinion clearly applies to all classes of passengers. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court, says, on page 376, 17 Wall., 21 L. Ed. 627: "It is argued that a common carrier, by entering into a special contract with a party for carrying his goods or person on modified terms, drops his character and becomes an ordinary bailee for hire, and therefore may make any contract he pleases. That is, he may make any contract whatever, because he is an ordinary bailee; and he is an ordinary bailee because he has made the contract. We are unable to see the soundness of this reasoning. It seems to us more accurate to say that common carriers are such by virtue of their occupation, not by virtue of the responsibilities under which they rest." Again the court says, on page 877, 17 Wall., 21 L. Ed. 627: "In regulating the public establishment of common carriers, the great object of the law was to secure the utmost care and diligence in the performance of their important duties—an object essential to the welfare of every civilized community. Hence the common-law rule which charged the common carrier as an insurer. Why charge him as such? Plainly for the purpose of raising the most stringent motive for the exercise of carefulness and fidelity in his trust. In regard to passengers, the highest degree of carefulness and diligence is expressly exacted. In the one case the securing of the most exact diligence and fidelity underlies the law, and is the reason for it; in the other it is directly and absolutely prescribed by the law. It is obvious, therefore, that if a carrier stipulate not to be bound to the exercise of care and diligence, but to be at liberty to indulge in the contrary, he seeks to put off the essential duties of his employment. And to assert that he may do so seems almost a contradiction in terms." And again, on page 381, 17 Wall., 21 L. Ed. 627: "Hence the exemptions referred to were deemed reasonable and proper to be allowed. But the proposition to allow a public carrier to abandon altogether his obligations to the public, and to stipulate for exemptions that are unreasonable and improper, amounting to an abdication of the essential duties of his employment, would never have been entertained by the sages of the law." The extent to which this case has been cited and approved will be shown by reference to 8 Rose's Notes U. S. 48.

In Railway Co. v. Stevens, 95 U. S. 655, 24 L. Ed. 535, the court says, on page 660, 95 U. S., 24 L. Ed. 535: "Since, therefore, from our view of the case, it is not necessary to determine what would have been the rights of the parties if the plaintiff had been a free or gratuitous passenger, we rest our decision upon Railroad Company v. Lockwood, supra. We have no doubt of the correctness of the conclusion reached in that case. We do not mean to imply, however, that we should have come to a different conclusion had the plaintiff been a free passenger instead of a passenger for hire. We are aware that respectable tribunals have asserted the right to stipulate for exemption in such a case, and it is often asked, with apparent confidence, 'May not men make their own contracts, or, in other words, may not a man do what he will with his own?' The question, at first sight, seems a simple one. But there is a question lying behind that: 'Can a man call that absolutely his own, which he holds as a great public trust, by the public grant, and for the public use as well as his own profit?' The business of the common carrier, in this country at least, is emphatically a branch of the public service; and the conditions on which that public service shall be performed by private enterprise are not yet entirely settled."

In Railroad v. Sullivan, 120 Fed. 799, 57 O. C. A. 167, 61 L. R. A. 410, it was held that: "Riding in the coach set apart for colored passengers, contrary to the rules of the carrier and provisions of the statute, is not negligence on the part of a white person which will prevent a recovery for his death through the negligence of the carrier, although he would not have been injured had he not been in that coach."

In the earlier English reports the doctrine was uniformly held that an action to recover damages for negligent injury by a common carrier arose from a breach of duty imposed by the common law, and needed no contract to support it. In course of time, by some unexplained change of judicial sentiment, the courts began to recognize stipulations for release of liability, until, finally, common carriers were practically allowed to absolve themselves, by stipulation, from liability for all negligence, however gross. This led to the passage of the act of 1854, called the "Railway and Canal Traffic Act," declaring that railway and canal companies should be liable for the negligence of themselves or their servants, notwithstanding any notice or condition, unless the judgment or court trying the cause should adjudge the condition just and reasonable. The practical effect of this statute was to bring the law back to its original status. However, all the cases seem to hold that there is no implied release in the absence of written stipulations or fraudulent concealment of material facts. This is shown by the following cases, which are typical of others: In Bretherton v. Wood, 7 E. C. L. 345, the court says, on page 348: "This action is on the case against a common carrier, upon whom a duty is imposed by the custom of the realm, or, in other words, by the common law, to carry and convey their goods or passengers safely and securely, so that, by their negligence or default, no injury or damage happen. A breach of this duty is a breach of the law, and for this breach an action lies, founded on the common law, which action wants not the aid of a contract to support it."

In Marshall v. Railway Co., 11 C. B. E. O. L. 78, Jervis, C. J., says, on page 661: "But upon what principle does the action lie at the suit of the servant for his personal suffering? Not by reason of any contract between him and the company, but by reason of a duty implied by law to carry him safely." In the same case Williams, J., says, on page 663: "I am of the same opinion * * *. It seems to me that the whole current of authorities, beginning with Govett v. Radnidge, and ending with Pozzi v. Shipton, establishes that an action of this sort is, in substance, not an action of contract, but an action of tort against the company as carriers. That being so, the question is whether it was necessary to allege any contract at all in the declaration. The earliest instance I find of an action of this sort is in Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium, Writ de Trespass sur le Case, where it is said (9b): 'If a smith prick my horse with a nail, etc., I shall have my action upon the case against him, without any warranty by the smith to do it well, for it is the duty of every artificer to exercise his art rightly and truly as he ought.' There is no allusion there to any contract. That being so, it seems to me to follow that the allegation of a contract in a case of this kind is altogether unnecessary."

In Austin v. Railway Co. (1867) 2 Q. B. 442, it was held that a child over the free age prescribed by statute, and having no ticket, and no fare having been asked or paid, could recover for injuries received. Blackburn, J., concurring, says, on page 444: "I am also of opinion there should be no rule. I think that what was said in the case of Marshall v. Newcastle & Berwick Railway Company was quite correct. It was there laid down that the right which a passenger by railway has to be carried safely does not depend on his having made a contract, but that the fact of his being a passenger casts a duty on the company to carry him safely."

A large number of authorities could be cited in addition to those above, but it is needless to do so. We have already quoted at greater length than we should, but for the fact that we wished to show, not simply the decision of the cases, but especially the essential principles by which those results were reached. We will now close by citations from the leading text-books.

In 5 A. & E. Enc. 507, it is said: "The carrier is liable to persons whom it accepts for transportation over its line, and from whom it demands no fare, to the same extent that it is liable to passengers who pay fare. * * * A person riding on a free pass is as much a passenger as if he were paying full fare, and if the pass is given for a valuable consideration he is a passenger for hire. * * * The fact that the carrier is prohibited by law from issuing free passes does not render a person a trespasser who travels upon such a pass unlawfully issued to him. If the pass is unlawful, the conductor should demand the regular fare, and his failure to do so will not make the passenger a trespasser, nor destroy his right as a passenger."

In 6 Oyc. 544, it is said that: "While it is no doubt true, as indicated in the definition, that public carriers of passengers are those who carry passengers for hire, there is not in the case of carriers of passengers a distinction as to liability between passengers carried for compensation and those carried gratuitously, analogous to that recognized as to carriers of goods between cases where goods are carried for compensation and those where they are carried free. One who is accepted for transportation as a passenger, without any compensation to be rendered, is nevertheless entitled to all the care and protection which the carrier is under obligation to furnish to paying passengers."

In Lawson on Contracts, it is said, in section 335: "A carrier of a passenger who has paid a consideration for his passage cannot exempt himself from liability for damages caused by his own negligence, or that of his servants, by any contract which he may have induced his customer to approve. Such a contract is void as against the policy of the law, even though the passenger is a gratuitous one, riding free and paying no fare."

In 2 Beach, Mod. Law of Contracts, it is said, in section 1502: "The weight of authority in this country favors the rule that a common carrier cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility when such exemption is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law, and that it is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law for a common carrier to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants."

In Fetter on Carriers of Passengers, § 220, it is said: "It is now well settled that a carrier, by its acceptance of a passenger as a passenger, comes under an obligation to take due and reasonable care for his safety, which obligation arises by implication of law, and independent of contract, so that it may exist though the contract of carriage is illegal, or though there is no express contract of carriage. Hence the fact that a contract of carriage is entered into on Sunday, and that plaintiff, when injured, was traveling on Sunday, in violation of a statute, does not preclude him from maintaining an action against the carrier for the injuries. In the language of the New York Court of Appeals: 'It is certainly a startling proposition that the thousands and tens of thousands of persons who travel on business or for pleasure on Sunday, upon railroads and steam and ferry boats in this state, are at the mercy of incompetent or careless engineers and servants, and that there is no remedy for loss of life or limb resulting from this negligence.'"

In Bishop on Noncontract Law, § 1074, it is said: "Such, therefore, is both the policy of the law and the law itself, in the highest sense fundamental and unyielding. The result of which is that, in just legal reason, it will under no circumstances be competent for a railroad or other common carrier, whether of goods or passengers, to cast off this responsibility by any resort to a by-law, to a usage, or even to an express contract with the party. Particularly in the carriage of passengers, if the road could by contract exempt itself from responsibility for its own negligence, its next step would be to refuse all passengers who would not enter into the contract; thereupon the railroad corporations, freed from the only motive to carefulness which they could appreciate, the danger of being mulcted in damages, would conduct their business with a recklessness rendering travel a horror to every person not permitted to remain at home." See, also, section 1078.

In Cooley on Torts, on page 826 (685) it is said: "Carriers of passengers, it is also held, cannot relieve themselves from the obligation to observe ordinary care by any contract whatsoever, even in the case of 'drovers' passes,' which are given without charge to those who accompany consignments of cattle, or in cases where free passage is given as mere matter of courtesy or favor." The learned author then proceeds to say that, while there are certain exceptions permitted in two states, "the weight of authority is most distinctly the other way, both in this country and in England"; that is, in favor of the rule as stated above.

In Hutchinson on Carriers it is said, in section 566: "It is enough that the person is being lawfully carried as a passenger, to entitle him to all the care which the law requires of the passenger carrier; and the same vigilance and circumspection must be exercised to guard him against injury when he is carried gratuitously, as upon what is known as a free pass, or by the carrier's invitation, as when he pays the usual fare." See, also, sections 565 and 567.

In Wharton's Law of Negligence it is said, in section 355: "Is a free passenger to be placed in a different position, so far as concerns his rights to protection from neglect, from a pay passenger? This question, also, was at one time answered in the affirmative, the courts being led astray by the mistaken view of mandates which will be hereafter pointed out. But there is now an almost uniform acquiescence in the true view that a person who undertakes to do a service for another is liable to such other person for want of due care and attention—the diligencia of the bonus et diligens paterfamilias—in the performance of the service, even though there is no consideration for such undertaking. Or, as the question is elsewhere put, the confidence accepted is an adequate consideration to support the duty. Eminently is this the case with what are called 'free' passengers on the great lines of common carriage. As has been already observed, there is, in such cases, not merely confidence tendered and accepted, but some sort of business consideration, though this be a mere courteous interchange of accommodations. For these and other reasons noticed under the last head, the carrier is bound to exhibit the same diligence and skill towards passengers of this class as he is to passengers who pay money for their tickets." Again, the same author says, in section 354: "But if a trespasser take his seat openly in a carriage, in the place assigned to passengers generally, there is no reason why a different standard of care should be applicable to him than is applicable to other passengers. Waiving for the present the point elsewhere discussed, that even a trespasser, supposing him to continue such, is not withdrawn from the protection of that law which requires that no man shall negligently injure another, the carrier, if he permits such trespasser to continue in the carriage, cannot regard him, after such permission, as a trespasser. The carrier has a right to expel the trespasser at once from the carriage. If the carrier omits to do this, and if the person in question remains voluntarily with the carrier's assent, then the trespass passes into a quantum meruit contract of carriage. On the one side, the person so entering the carriage is bound to the carrier for reasonable pay for the carriage. On the other side, the carrier is bound, from the time he assents thus to carry such person, to exercise towards him the diligence, prudence, and skill of a good carrier in that particular kind of transport; in other words, the particular kind of diligence, prudence, and skill which the carrier is bound to exercise towards all other passengers."

In Watson on Dam. for Personal Injuries, it is said, in section 280, p. 279: "At the outset it may be stated, as a general rule, that the mere fact that the plaintiff, at the time of the injuries received, is engaged in the commission of an unlawful act, is not sufficient to relieve the author of the wrong of liability in damages therefor. 'The question how far a person can defend an otherwise indefensible act,' it has been said, 'by showing a criminal or unlawful act on the part of the party injured, has of late years been fully discussed in the courts of this country and England. The result, generally reached, is that no man can set up a public or private wrong committed by another as an excuse for a willful, or unnecessary, or even negligent injury to him or his property. This principle is defended on the grounds of morality and law, and it reaches and determines a great variety of cases.'" The same author further says, in section 238: "The liability of the owners of a steamboat for injuries to a passenger is not affected by the fact that the person injured was, at the time the injuries were received, engaged in an excursion with other passengers upon defendants' steamboat in violation of the Sunday law. One traveling on Sunday in violation of a statute prohibiting is not, by reason thereof, without the protection of the law. The carrier owes him the same duty as if he were lawfully traveling, and is liable in damages for personal injuries resulting from a failure to perform it." In section 231 the author adopts the language of an able and elaborate opinion by Dixon, C. J., in Sutton v. Wauwatosa, 29 Wis. 27, 9 Am. Rep. 534, as follows: "Himself guilty of a wrong, not dependent on nor caused by that charged against the plaintiff, but arising from his own voluntary act or his neglect, the defendant cannot assume the championship of public rights, nor to prosecute the plaintiff as an offender against the laws of the state, and thus to impose upon him a penalty many times greater than what those laws prescribed. Neither justice nor sound morals require this, and it seems contrary to the dictates of both that such a defense should be allowed to prevail. It would extend the maxim, 'Ex turpi causa non oritur actio,' beyond the scope of its legitimate application, and violate the maxim equally binding and wholesome, and more extensive in its operation, that no man shall be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong. To take advantage of his own wrong, and to visit unmerited and overrigorous punishment upon the plaintiff, constitute the sole motive for such defense on the part of the person making it."

In 3 Thompson's Law of Neg. § 3326, it is said: "It is thoroughly settled in the American law that a common carrier of passengers cannot, by a contract with one who is a passenger for hire, relieve himself from liability for damages caused by the negligence of himself or his servants." The same author says, in section 3328: "The principle is well settled that a carrier owes the same duty of protection to a simply gratuitous passenger as to a passenger for hire."

In Buswell on Law of Pers. Injuries, the author, in laying down the rule that a breach of public duty is the foundation of the action for personal injuries, says, in section 3: "The custom of the realm of England, long made a part of the common law, imposes upon common carriers of passengers certain public duties in respect of such passengers, for a breach of which a passenger injured may have his remedy by an action of tort." Again, the author says, in section 116: "In the United States the weight of authority is in favor of the rule that, as to passengers for hire, the stipulation by a common carrier that he will not be liable for damages in case of injury to the passenger will not relieve him from responsibility for the results of the negligence of himself and his servants." Again, the same author says, in section 117: "If a common carrier accepts a person as passenger, there being no contract to relieve the carrier from the legal consequences of his negligence in the case of accident, it is held generally, in the United States, that the carrier remains liable for such negligence, although the plaintiff was to be transported gratuitously. For, having admitted the plaintiff to the rights of a passenger, the defendant is not permitted to deny that he owes to him the duty which, as carrying on a public employment, he owes to all his passengers."

In 2 Parsons on Contracts, the author, after referring to various authorities, says, on page 222: "Whether a common carrier is liable to a passenger to whom he has given passage, and from whom he has therefore no right to demand fare, is not so certain; but he would certainly be liable for gross negligence, and probably liable for any negligence.

He is certainly not excused by mere nonpayment, unless payment has been demanded and refused." In note "x" it is said: "It is now quite generally held that for negligence there is the same liability to persons riding on free passes as to those who pay full fare."

In 2 Wood on Railroads it is said, on page 1207: "In all cases where the company is required by law to carry a person free, or where he is riding free by the consent of the company fairly obtained, he is a passenger, and entitled to all rights and privileges as such. In the case of a free pass the carrier is under the same obligations as to care and vigilance as he is to a passenger for hire, and as to passengers to whom passes are given which are predicated upon any consideration he cannot absolve himself from liability for injuries resulting from gross negligence by any notice to that effect printed upon the pass, as such conditions are against the policy of the law. It has been held, however, that, when tickets or passes are purely gratuitous, the person receiving may by special agreement assume all risks of the journey incident to the mere negligence of the company."

In Whitaker's Smith on Negligence, while the text does not seem to treat the subject, there are full notes on page 306 showing that the rule is that a common carrier "must exercise the same care and attention in the transportation of gratuitous passengers as of those who have paid their fares, and is liable to the same extent for negligence."

These authorities tend to show that this rule is generally held even in the face of express stipulations of exemption, and universally so in the absence of such stipulations.

In 4 Elliott on Railroads it is said, in section 1497: "The rule, supported by the weight of authority, is that a common carrier cannot by any kind of a contract exempt itself from liability as such for loss or injury occasioned by its own negligence or that of its servants. This rule rests upon considerations of public policy, and upon the fact that to allow the carrier to absolve himself from the duty of exercising care and fidelity is inconsistent with the very nature of his undertaking." The employment of a common carrier is a public one, and the fundamental principle upon which the law of common carriers was established was to secure the utmost care and diligence in the performance of their duties. For this reason they are held to the extraordinary liability of insurers. To permit them to contract against liability for their own negligence or that of their servants would be contrary to the whole spirit and policy of the law governing common carriers, and would, in effect, authorize them to abandon the most essential duties of their employment. When we also consider that the parties do not stand upon an equal footing, and that railroad companies are given many special privileges as corporations for the very reason that they have such duties to perform for the public, there can be no doubt of the justice of this rule, especially as applied to such corporations." The same author says, in section 1578: "We think it is safe to say that the general rule is that every one on the passenger trains of a railroad company, and there for the purpose of carriage, with the consent, express or implied, of the company, is presumptively a passenger. * * * Persons who pay a consideration for passage, no matter in what form, are generally regarded as passengers." And again, in section 1004, he says: "The general rule is that a person riding on a railway train on a free pass, the possession of which was lawfully and rightfully obtained, is a passenger. The possession of the pass must be lawful, for, if it was obtained by fraud or the wrong of the person attempting to use it, he is not a passenger, and the carrier owes him no duty as such." And again, in section 1606, he says: "But where the person riding on a pass is regarded as a passenger, the carrier usually owes to him the same degree of care that it owes to a passenger paying full fare." Again he says, in section 1608: "Passes usually contain a stipulation which in terms exempts the carrier from liability for negligence. As to the validity of such stipulations the authorities are not agreed, some holding that they are valid and binding upon the persons using the pass, others that they are not. In the majority of the states the courts hold that such a stipulation is void and not binding upon the person using the pass, and that the carrier is liable for injuries negligently inflicted upon a person using a pass containing such a stipulation." Again he says, in section 1609: "The relation which the person using the pass bears to the railroad company is also an important element in determining the liability. If he is regarded as a passenger, then the company is bound to use the highest practical degree of care, and for a failure to use such care it will be liable for all injuries approximately caused thereby. But where the person using the pass is an employé, then the carrier will only be liable for such injuries as result from negligence in failing to perform the duties owing to such employés. * * * The general rule is that, where the holder of the pass is to be regarded as a passenger, any act of negligence may give a right of action."

We cannot better close these citations than by the following clear and terse statement of the principles from 2 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, which is fully sustained by the authorities we have examined. The eminent authors say, in section 491: "It is well settled that, in the absence of a special contract, a passenger traveling gratuitously has a perfect right of action for injuries suffered by him through the carrier's negligence. The fact that a traveler who ought to pay has not paid and does not intend to pay his fare does not, in the absence of actual fraud, deprive him of redress for injuries. There is no practical difference between the degree of care which a free passenger has the right to claim, and that to which a paying passenger is entitled."

To our minds these authorities, taken in connection with the cases cited in them, are conclusive of the questions before us. The greater weight of authority is decidedly in favor of the doctrine that a common carrier cannot in any event stipulate against its own negligence, including that of its servants, while it is overwhelming to the effect that, in the absence of such stipulations, it owes to a gratuitous passenger the same degree of care that it does to those that pay. In the case at bar the plaintiff appears to have been a bona fide passenger, and was so recognized by the conductor in charge of the train. Both are conclusively presumed to have known that the contract for a pass was illegal and void, but there is no evidence that either acted in fraud or bad faith. There is evidence that the plaintiff gave some consideration, although legally inadequate; but in any event the worst position in which he can be placed is that of simply a gratuitous passenger. There were no existing stipulations of exemption between him and the defendant. None had ever existed, except the conditions on the back of the pass. These conditions can have no effect, because, in the first place, the pass had expired, and, secondly, had no legal existence before its expiration. A condition, like the leaf on a tree, must be attached to something from which it can draw its life and strength. By practically all the authorities, in the absence of such express conditions, the plaintiff is held entitled to recover. What would have been the legal effect of such conditions if they existed is not strictly before us. We have shown that the decided weight of authority is against their validity, but we did so to show that, if the liability of a common carrier to a gratuitous passenger could not be waived by an express stipulation, it certainly existed in the absence of any such stipulation. Even those courts that hold it may be waived, necessarily admit its existence in the absence of waiver. If it exists in the absence of contract, and cannot be waived by contract, it must necessarily owe its existence to the policy of the law.

It is contended in behalf of the defendant that there was error in the court below refusing to charge "that there is no evidence to support the plaintiff's allegation [in the complaint] that he was traveling on the defendant's road, on the occasion complained of, as a passenger for hire or compensation." We see no error in its refusal, as, in our view of the case, it was immaterial.

The defendant also contends that its exception to the following charge of the court should be sustained, to wit: "If, when the plaintiff was called on for his fare, he produced to the conductor the pass which had been exhibited in evidence, and the conductor accepted it, the plaintiff was a passenger on the train." We think that whatever error may be found in this instruction is harmless. The pass was in legal effect a blank piece of paper. It had expired by its own limitation, if that can be said to have expired which has never legally existed. Its only effect could have been to convince the conductor of the truthfulness of the plaintiff's statement that he had a contract with the company under which he was entitled to ride free. The result seems to have been his acceptance as a passenger by the conductor, who, being in control of the train, is in the very nature of things the only officer or servant of the company who can accept a passenger. He is charged with that duty by the defendant, who must therefore abide the consequences of his act, especially as there is no evidence of fraud or deception on the part of the plaintiff. The evidence tends to prove that the plaintiff was on the train as a bona fide passenger under an agreement for so-called "free transportation," but ready to pay his fare if demanded. The fact that the previous contract was illegal, and no fare was either demanded or paid, can have no further effect than to reduce the plaintiff to the condition of a merely gratuitous passenger, having no binding contract, and therefore subject to no limitations of liability. As such we now think he was entitled to recover. The petition to rehear is allowed, and the judgment below affirmed.

Petition allowed.

CLARK, O. J. (dissenting). This is a petition to rehear this cause and reverse our opinion filed therein. 132 N. C. 510, 44 S. E. 34, 95 Am. St. Rep. 641. That opinion is itself a precedent, and to be set aside, like any other precedent, only upon good cause shown. We have had the benefit of full and able argument upon both hearings, and find, after diligent re-examination of the argument and the authorities, that our former decision is in accord with our own precedents and those to be found elsewhere.

The complaint alleges that on 6th April, 1900, "the plaintiff being a passenger on said defendant road," he was injured by the derailment of the car in which he was riding, caused by the negligent construction of the roadbed and the negligent failure of the defendant to provide sufficient crew for said train, and its negligent failure to use such air brakes and other machinery as were necessary to the safe and proper operation of said road. There is no allegation of willful and wanton injury, nor proof of such. The complaint alleges that "the plaintiff was a passenger on said railroad for compensation, * * * the defendant having contracted and agreed to carry the plaintiff between said stations for a valuable consideration," and for a negligent breach of such contract of safe carriage this action is brought.

The plaintiff testified that he was editor of a newspaper; that when called on by the conductor for his fare he told him he had a pass for 1899, and showed it to him; that in 1899 he had made a contract with the defendant to publish its time-table in his paper as consideration for the pass, and the defendant had agreed to continue the contract and renew the contract; that he told the conductor he would pay the regular fare if he wanted it, but the conductor accepted his statement and took him as a passenger without payment of fare or ticket, on the strength of the alleged renewal by the company of the contract of 1899. Such contract was illegal, and is forbidden, under the authority of the lawmaking power in this state, under a penalty of "not less than one thousand dollars nor more than five thousand dollars" against the company, and, this not being a valid but an illegal transaction, the plaintiff cannot be accessory to and participate in such act and then ask a court of justice to give him damages for the defendant's negligence in executing such illicit arrangement.

The General Assembly has declared that public policy forbids discrimination in the exercise of their quasi public duties by common carriers, and, as was said by us in this case, 132 N. C., at page 512, 44 S. E. 35, 95 Am. St. Rep. 641, "nothing could be more clearly a discrimination than the ground upon which the plaintiff asked for and received free passage on this occasion, to wit, that for the year previous he had advertised the schedule of the defendant company in his paper, and had received therefor a free pass over its line for the previous year, and that this contract had been renewed for the year current. It does not appear what was the value of the advertising done, charging for the space at the rates as would be charged others, but, let it be what it may, it could not amount exactly, 'neither more nor less,' to the value of a free pass to travel ad libitum an unstipulated number of miles over the defendant's road. Besides, it was an illegal discrimination to sell the plaintiff transportation on credit and not payable in money." We need not repeat the discussion and construction of this statute as laid down in the able and exhaustive opinion of Mr. Justice Montgomery in State v. Railway, 122 N. C. 1052, 30 S. E. 133, 41 L. R. A. 246, and in the very able opinion of Mr. Justice Douglas in that case, in which he referred to evidence of $250,000 of free transportation being given away annually in this state, the cost of which was necessarily considered in fixing the rates charged the unprivileged many. That opinion and subsequent ones have been long published, and the Legislature has not seen fit to change the statute by making editors "a privileged class," who can ride free or on credit, with rates unknown, and thus have the cost of their transportation added to the price of transportation charged the public at large. One ground for this legislation is that discrimination in rates gives these corporations improper weight and influence, and this applies with as much force at least to discriminations and favors to editors as to others. The court at last term, in Greenleaf

v. Bank, 133 N. C. 292, 45 S. E. 638, held that lawyers and judges were not a privileged class, and we cannot hold that editors are, unless the General Assembly shall give them special privileges as to free or reduced transportation which is forbidden to the public generally.

Either (1) the plaintiff, having produced no ticket nor paying cash for his transportation, was on the train without authority of any contract, in which case, by all the authorities, he was entitled to what is known as "ordinary care," and hence can recover no damages unless there was willful and wanton injury (which in this case is neither alleged nor shown)—Pierce v. Railroad, 124 N. C. 83, 32 S. E. 899, 44 L. R. A. 816; Cook v. Railroad, 128 N. C. 333, 38 S. E. 925; Lewis v. Railroad, 182 N. C. 382, 43 S. E. 919; Higley v. Gilmer (Mont.) 35 Am. Rep. 450; Hendryx v. Railroad, 45 Kan., at page 379, 25 Pac. 893, and cases there cited; Railroad v. Burnsed (Miss.) 12 South. 958, 35 Am. St. Rep. 656; Railroad v. Mehlsack (Ill.) 22 N. E. 812, 19 Am. St. Rep. 17; Reary v. Railroad (La.) 3 South. 390, 8 Am. St. Rep. 497; Railroad v. Mecham, 91 Tenn. 428, 19 S. W. 232; Whitehead v. Railroad, 99 Mo. 263, 11 S. W. 751, 6 L. R. A. 409—for neither the conductor nor the company could give legal assent to his riding contrary to law, without payment of fare, and his condition was that of a trespasser, not being a passenger.

Or (2) the plaintiff, as he alleges in his complaint, sues for injuries sustained by breach of the contract of safe carriage caused by negligence of the defendant, and one of his prayers for instruction is based upon the theory that the plaintiff was a passenger for hire and compensation. In such case the rule is thus stated (1 Sutherland, Damages, § 5 [3d Ed.]): "It may be assumed as an undisputed principle that no action will lie to recover a demand or a supposed claim for damages, if to establish it the plaintiff requires aid from an illegal transaction, or is under the necessity of showing and depending in any degree upon an illegal agreement to which he was a party"—citing numerous cases. Judge Sutherland further says that: "A bank is not liable for failure to perform its contract to lend or advance money to be used in speculating in futures. Moss v. Bank, 102 Ga. 808 [30 S. E. 267]. The sender of a telegram relating to a gambling contract in stocks cannot invoke such contract, or the loss or gain resulting from it, to measure the damages sustained in consequence of its nondelivery. Morris v. Tel. Co., 94 Me. 423 [47 Atl. 926]." In Griswold v. Waddington, 16 Johns. 489, Chancellor Walworth says, at page 486: "The plaintiff must recover upon his own merit, and if he has none, or if he discloses a case founded upon illegal dealing and founded on an intercourse prohibited by law, he ought not to be heard, whatever the demerits of the defendant may be. There is, to my mind, something monstrous in the proposition that a court of law ought to carry into effect a contract-founded on a breach of law. It is encouraging disobedience and giving to disloyalty its unhallowed fruits. There is no such mischievous doctrine to be deduced from the books." In Bowman v. Phillips (Kan.) 21 Pac. 230, 3 L. R. A. 631, 13 Am. St. Rep. 292, it is held: "The courts will not enforce illegal contracts, nor any supposed rights founded thereon, but will leave the parties and those in pari delicto where they find them." In Oscanyan v. Arms Company, 103 U. S. 261, 26 L. Ed. 539, an action for damages for breach of contract, the court held that when such contract is void, because against public policy or in violation of law, the court will nonsuit the plaintiff. In Phalen v. Clark (Conn.) 1 Am. Rep. 253, the court held: "Where the plaintiff requires any aid from an illegal transaction to establish his demand, he must fail."

In Welch v. Wesson, 6 Gray, 505, it is said: "It may be assumed as an undisputed doctrine that no action will lie to recover a claim for damages if, to establish it, the plaintiff requires aid from an illegal transaction, or is under the necessity of showing or in any manner depending upon the illegal act to which he is a party." In Pullman v. Transportation Co., 171 U. S., at page 150, 18 Sup. Ct. 813, 43 L. Ed. 103, Mr. Justice Peckham quotes with approval from Lord Mansfield in Holman v. Johnson (decided in 1775) 1 Cowper, 341: "The objection that a contract is immoral or illegal * * * sounds at all times very ill in the mouth of the defendant. It is not for his sake, however, that the objection is ever allowed, but it is founded on general principles of public policy. * * * The principle of public policy is this: Ex dolo malo non oritur actio. No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or an illegal act." It can make no difference whether the action is to recover upon such contract, to enforce specific performance; or (as here) to recover damages for breach thereof. The precise point here presented has been three times passed upon in this court, not only in the case here sought to be reversed, 182 N. C. 510, 44 S. E. 34, 95 Am. St. Rep. 641, but in two other cases. In Turner v. R. Co., 63 N. C. 522, it was held that where a soldier contracted with a railroad for transportation to Johnston's army, and was injured en route by negligence of the company, he could not recover damages (though there the contract was legal when made), Reade, J., saying that, the contract being illegal (in the purview of the court trying the action), the parties were in pari delicto, and the court "would consult its dignity and not interfere in their dispute." Exactly the same decision was made in Wallace v. Cannon, 88 Ga. 199, 95 Am. Dec. 385; Martin v. Wallace, 40 Ga. 52; Redd v. Railroad, 48 Ga. 102; Railroad v. Redd, 54 Ga. 33—in all which the court held, as in 40 Ga. 55: "While so engaged, the parties were in pari delicto, and the courts * * * cannot lend their aid to assist either in the case of injury sustained by the negligence or misconduct of the other." Another case in this state is Waters v. Railroad, 110 N. C. 333, 14 S. E. 802, 16 L. R. A. 834, where the court hold (at page 342, 110 N. C., 14 S. E. 802, 16 L. R. A. 834) that, where the illegal purpose of the shipper or passenger enters into the consideration of the contract of transportation, the railroad is exempt from liability for negligence, meaning, evidently, that the court will not take jurisdiction of such controversies. Here both parties participated in the illegal purpose of transporting the plaintiff, contrary to law, without payment of fare, and, as in the above cases, "while so engaged the parties were in pari delicto, and the courts cannot lend their aid to assist either in the case of injury sustained by the negligence or misconduct of the other." It is immaterial whether the plaintiff had in his pocket a free pass from the president of the railroad company, or was allowed by the conductor to ride illegally, without payment of fare, in consideration of the plaintiff's statement that the company had promised to renew the pass. The conductor, no more than the president, could give the plaintiff the legal right to ride free, unless the plaintiff came within one of the excepted classes entitled to that privilege, as railroad employes and officials, charity cases, and the like. It was an illegal contract equally whether made by the conductor or the president. Whether the conductor had the legal right to bind the company by his action, so as to subject it to the penalty denounced by the statute, is not before us. But if he had not, then the plaintiff had no claim to a contract of passage on that ground, and comes under the first head above, not being a passenger, and could only recover for willful and wanton injury.

The point here presented is well settled in the text-books, and, by decisions in other states, that the plaintiff cannot recover when he is negligently injured while on the train without any valid contract of carriage, i. e., when he is a licensee or trespasser. In such cases he can only recover if wantonly and willfully injured, or, as it is sometimes styled, for "gross negligence," which is the synonym for "willful and wanton injury," in those cases. Bouvier, Law Dict. (Rawle's Rev.), "Passenger," says that a passenger is "one who has taken his place in a public conveyance by virtue of a contract for the purpose of being transported from one place to another on the payment of fare or its equivalent [Bricker v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co.] 182 Pa. 1 [18 Atl. 983, 19 Am. St. Rep. 585]. * * * A carrier is not liable to one who rides by stealth [Railroad v. Michie] 83 Ill. 427, or who is a trespasser [Muehlhausen v. St. Louis R. Co.] 91 Mo. 332 [2 S. W. 315], although invited to ride by an employe of the carrier [Railroad v. Campbell] 76 Tex. 174 [13 S. W. 19], or a voluntary assistant to an express messenger or mail clerk [Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Nichols (Kan.)] 12 Am. Rep.

475, or a newsboy permitted to ride free [Flower v. Pennsylvania R. Co.] 69 Pa. 210, 8 Am. Rep. 251; [Snyder v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co.] 60 Mo. 413." Certainly the plaintiff, who was on this train by an arrangement denounced by the statute, under a penalty of "not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 fine," is not in so good a situation as those above named as debarred of recovery.

Hutchinson on Carriers, § 555, says: "To be entitled to the right of a passenger, the plaintiff who sues for an injury occasioned by the negligence of the company must have been lawfully upon its train;" and that if sued for the injury it can defend upon the ground that the plaintiff had induced the servants of the company to carry him upon a ticket on which he had no right to ride. 2 Minor's Wood, Railways (2d Ed.) 1213, instances, among persons not entitled to recover for negligent injuries, one "who, contrary to the rules, gets on a freight train, even with the assent of the conductor, and pays no fare, or a trespasser upon a regular passenger train." If the assent of the conductor does not make him a passenger when riding contrary to the rules of the company, such assent cannot set aside a statute forbidding the plaintiff to ride without paying fare. 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 1255, says: "A railroad company owes trespassers no contract duty. Indeed, it owes them no duty except not to willfully injure them." 1 Fetter, Passengers, § 240, uses almost the same language: "The only duty due by a railroad company to one who is an intruder or trespasser on its trains is to refrain from wantonly, willfully, or intentionally injuring him. It is not liable for an injury caused by the mistake, inadvertence, or negligence of its employees." 2 Shear. & Red. Neg. § 489, holds that "one who, by collusion with a servant of the carrier, rides without intending to pay fare, * * * does not bring him into contract relation with the company so as to make it liable to him as a passenger." To same purport, Thomp. Carriers, 43. Booth, Street Railways, § 326, says: "The duty of a common carrier does not extend to the personal safety of one who is not actually a passenger;" and the same work, at section 335: "Newsboys who enter street cars for the purpose of selling papers are not passengers, but mere licensees, who assume all the risks of ordinary negligence on the part of the company's servants." Certainly the newsboys who are legally on the car with the assent of the company cannot have greater rights than this plaintiff, who was riding without payment of fare, in violation of law. Bishop, Noncontract Law, § 60, says: "If the negligent running of a railroad train injures one who is on it without right, he can recover nothing." 2 Jagard, Torts, 1081, says, "When no consideration is paid, though the plaintiff was aboard the train by the invitation or request of defendant's employes, he cannot recover for negligence," citing numerous cases.

All the above are based upon the idea that no one can recover for negligent injuries unless a passenger, and that no one is a passenger unless there is a legal contract, express or implied—a legal obligation to convey him. The above citations from text-books are amply sustained by authorities, among which: "A railroad company owes no duty to a trespasser on its trains, except to abstain from wantonly or maliciously injuring him." Railroad v. Harris, 71 Miss. 74, 14 South. 263. "One who is allowed by the conductor to ride as an assistant express messenger without paying fare, under a misapprehension of the conductor that he need not pay, cannot recover damages for injuries sustained by negligence of the carrier." Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Nichols, 8 Kan. 505, 12 Am. Rep. 475. In the very interesting opinion by Judge Valentine, he says: "The conductor did not attempt to confer upon the plaintiff any right to ride upon that train, but simply left the plaintiff with the right which he supposed the plaintiff already had, independent of any authority from himself"—the same facts as in this case, though under our statute the conductor could confer no right to ride free when the company itself was prohibited by statute from doing so. In Railroad v. Meachem, 91 Tenn. 423, 19 S. W. 233, it is held that the company is not liable for injuries sustained by a trespasser or intruder upon its trains, "except to refrain from willfully, wantonly, or intentionally injuring him," and defines a trespasser as one who rides without payment of fare or authorized invitation. In Railroad v. Beggs, 85 Ill. 84, 28 Am. Rep. 613, the same ruling as to nonliability was made as to one riding illegally upon a free pass which had been issued to another person, and this has been cited and affirmed in Railroad v. Mehlsack, 131 Ill. 61, 22 N. E. 812, 19 Am. St. Rep. 17. The pass there used was not more illegal than the pass which the plaintiff in this case presented. Eaton v. Railroad, 57 N. Y. 382, 15 Am. Rep. 513, held that one not lawfully upon the train, as one riding upon a freight train, could not recover for negligent injuries, though upon the train by the invitation of the conductor. In Railroad v. Campbell, 76 Tex. 174, 13 S. W. 19, it was held that one injured negligently while riding on a freight train could not recover because unlawfully there; and the same ruling was made, and on the same ground, as to one injured while riding upon the engine by permission of the engineer. Railroad v. Michie, 83 Ill. 427. The plaintiff in the present case was not lawfully upon the train, it being forbidden by law to carry him without prepayment of fare, and neither the conductor nor the company had authority to receive him on the train without it. In Condran v. Railroad, 67 Fed. 522, 14 C. C. A. 506, 23 L. R. A. 749, it is held that one who wrongfully evades payment of fare cannot recover for injuries unless wantonly and willfully inflicted.

In Railroad v. Berry, 53 Kan. 112, 36 Pac.

53, 42 Am. St. Rep. 278, it is held that one riding upon a railroad train merely by permission of the conductor and without payment of fare cannot recover for personal injuries like a passenger, affirming Railroad v. Wheeler, 35 Kan. 185, 10 Pac. 461. In McVeety v. Railroad (Minn.) 47 N. W. 809, 11 L. R. A. 174, 22 Am. St. Rep. 728, it is held that one "who knowingly induces the conductor of a railway company to carry him without charge" cannot recover as a passenger. In Williams v. Railroad (Miss. 1895) 19 South. 90, it was held that one illegally riding free by consent of the conductor could not recover, and the same was held in Railroad v. McAfee (1893) 71 Miss. 70, 14 South. 260, as to one riding free by collusion with the railroad crew and beaten by them. The latter case is put on the ground of in pari delicto—that he had "participated in the violation of duty."

One riding on a train illegally, for instance, contrary to a rule of the company known to him, though with permission of the conductor, cannot recover for injuries sustained by negligence. Purple v. Railroad, 114 Fed. 123, 51 C. C. A. 564, 57 L. R. A. 700; Railroad v. Campbell, 76 Tex. 174, 13 S. W. 19; Greenfield v. Railroad (Mich. March, 1903) 95 N. W. 546. "The only duty a common carrier owes to one not a passenger is not to injure him wantonly." Hendryx v. Railroad (Kan.) 25 Pac. 893. "One riding on a railway train free of charge, by invitation and permission of the conductor, is not a passenger so as to entitle him to recover for injuries received." Stalcup v. Railroad (1897) 16 Ind. App. 584, 45 N. E. 802. And there are numerous other decisions to the same effect.

The bed-rock principle deduced from all the decisions and text-writers is that an action for injuries for negligence of a common carrier is an action of tort arising on contract, and can never be sustained except when there is a breach of a legal and valid contract of safe carriage; that, as to torts not arising out of contract, recovery can only be had when the injury was inflicted wantonly and willfully. This is sound in principle, and well settled, if any principle can be settled by precedent.

Taking it in the most favorable light for the plaintiff, he was riding on an extension of an illegal pass. That being so, upon the authorities in our state and those from other states and text-writers above cited, the plaintiff cannot recover damages sustained by the negligent breach of such illegal contract of carriage. There are other authorities to the same purport. In Massachusetts, where traveling on the Lord's Day, except from necessity or for purposes of charity, was made illegal, it was held in an opinion by that eminent lawyer, Shaw, C. J., in Bosworth v. Swansey, 10 Metc. 363, 43 Am. Dec. 441, that one so traveling illegally could not recover damages caused by a defect in the highway; and to the same purport is Conolly v. Boston, 117 Mass. 64, 19 Am. Rep. 396, and Davis v.

Somerville (1880) 128 Mass. 594, 35 Am. Rep. 399. The same was held as to recovery of damages sustained by negligence of a street car company by one traveling thereon on Sunday (Stanton v. Railroad, 14 Allen, 485), and as to one negligently injured at a railroad crossing while illegally traveling along the public road on Sunday (Smith v. Railroad, 120 Mass. 492, 21 Am. Rep. 538). In Gregg v. Wyman, 4 Cush. 322, it was held that the owner of a horse, who let him for driving on Sunday, against the statute, could not recover damages for the death of the horse by immoderate driving, because the parties were in pari delicto, the court saying its conclusion "is fully sustained by numerous decisions both in England and the various states of the Union," many of which it cites, and the same is held in Way v. Foster, 1 Allen, 408, and Parker v. Latner, 60 Me. 529, 11 Am. Rep. 210. In Lyons v. Desotelle, 124 Mass. 387, it was held that one traveling on the Lord's Day in violation of the statute, and who had fastened his horse at the side of the road, could not invoke the aid of the courts to recover damages for injuries to his horse, caused by the negligent act of another in driving against it. In McGrath v. Merwin, 112 Mass. 467, 17 Am. Rep. 119, it was held that one injured by the negligence of the defendant while clearing out a wheel pit, though gratuitously and as an act of kindness, on the Lord's Day, could not recover damages, because participating at the time the injury was sustained in an act in violation of law. In Wallace v. Navigation Co. (1883) 134 Mass. 95, 45 Am. Rep. 301, it was held that one sailing his yacht on Sunday, in violation of the statute, could not recover damages for being negligently run into by a steamboat, because he was there in violation of law, as the plaintiff was in this case. These decisions are uniform in that state till changed by statute as to injuries from common carriers (St. 1877, p. 629, c. 232), which provides that the general statute (chapter 84, § 2) "prohibiting travel on the Lord's Day shall not constitute a defense to an action against a common carrier of passengers for any tort suffered by a person so travelling." There is no statute in North Carolina taking away from common carriers the defense of in pari delicto in case of one traveling on a free pass. The defendant relied on Carroll v. Railroad, 58 N. Y. 126, 17 Am. Rep. 221, where it was held that the plaintiff, injured on a ferryboat while traveling on Sunday, contrary to the statute, could recover; but the court put its decision on the ground (page 182, 58 N. Y., 17 Am. Rep. 221) that if the plaintiff was going in a case of necessity or charity he was not traveling illegally, and, as the defendant had the right to carry him and to enforce payment of the fare, if the illegal purpose of the plaintiff was unknown to the defendant, the latter made a valid contract of carriage, and was liable for negligence in executing it. Here the plaintiff solicited the illegal carriage by saying his pass had been renewed, and the conductor acted upon it. Both parties knew of the illegality.

In Smith v. Rollins, 11 R. I. 464, 23 Am. Rep. 509, where a livery stable keeper let his horse for driving on Sunday, contrary to the statute, and the other party drove to a different place and brought the horse back damaged, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover, the court saying (page 472, 11 R. I., 23 Am. Rep. 509): "If the tort cannot be made to appear without proof of the contract, certainly the contract can hardly be considered immaterial, or as not affecting the liability of the defendant, even though it may not be a part of the cause of action." In Holcomb v. Damby, 51 Vt. 428, the court says (page 435), affirming previous cases: "It has been repeatedly held in this state that, if a party sustain injury by reason of the insufficiency in the highway while such party is traveling in violation of the statute, he cannot recover of the town for such injury." In Lord v. Chadbourne, 42 Me. 429, 66 Am. Dec. 290, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover damages for the alleged seizure of his whisky if he was keeping it for sale in violation of law.

Among many cases holding that a party participating in an illegal act cannot obtain from the court relief for an illegal act or neglect of the other party, if such conduct of the defendant cannot be shown without showing the precedent conduct of the plaintiff in violation of law, is Light Co. v. Veal, 145 Ind. 506, 41 N. E. 384, 44 N. E. 353, which held that a county treasurer loaning out county funds contrary to law cannot maintain an action to recover them back. Haggerty v. Ice Co. (Mo.) 44 S. W. 1114, 40 L. R. A. 151, 65 Am. St. Rep. 647, holds that, where it is contrary to law to have game in possession during the "close season," one who has deposited game, in violation of the statute, with a cold-storage company, "cannot recover damages for violation of the contract or for negligence in its performance," the court saying the complaint shows "that the plaintiff contracted with the defendant corporation for the commission of a misdemeanor. * * * The law will not stultify itself by promoting on the one hand what it prohibits on the other, and will for this reason leave the parties to the suit where it finds them, unsanctioned by its favor and unaided by its process." That case is identical in principle with this, the plaintiff having committed no misdemeanor, but having procured the defendant to contract to do an indictable act, as in this case.

Upon similar grounds, in Kitchem v. Greenbaum, 61 Mo. 110, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover a prize drawn on a lottery ticket, upholding the maxim, "In pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis et possidentis"; not that the defendant has right on his side, but because the court will help neither party to an illegal transaction. In Youngblood v. Trust Co. (Ala.) 12 South. 579, 20 L. R. A. 58, 36 Am. St. Rep. 245, it was held: "No rights can spring from or be rested upon an act in the performance of which a criminal penalty is incurred, and all contracts which are made in violation of a penal statute are absolutely void." In Brewing Co. v. Wall, 98 Mich. 158, 57 N. W. 99, it was held that a liquor dealer doing business in violation of the statute could not recover damages for violation of a contract by a company to make him its exclusive agent in that locality. The plea that he could legally buy, though he could not legally sell, was overruled on the ground that he was buying to illegally sell. In Kelly v. Courter, 1 Okl. 277, 30 Pac. 372, it was held that a tenant selling liquor in violation of law could not recover damages to such liquor caused by the failure of the landlord to supply ice as agreed, the court resting its decision upon a citation from Ewell v. Daggs, 108 U. S. 146, 2 Sup. Ct. 412, 27 L. Ed. 682, that the law will not lend its aid where the contract "appears to have been entered into by both the contracting parties for the express purpose of carrying into effect that which is prohibited by the law of the land (Broom's Leg. Max. 108)"—which was the case in this transaction now before the court. The Oklahoma court neatly sums up thus: "The principle to be extracted from all the cases is that the law will not lend its support to a claim founded upon its violation." Many cases to like purport could be added, but it is useless to multiply authorities upon a principle so well settled in the law and in reason.

The same general principle that no action can be sustained if based in any wise upon an illegal contract which must be put in evidence—ex turpi causa actio non oritur—is supported by all the precedents in this court in which a contract was necessarily alleged, as in this case. Basket v. Moss, 115 N. C. 448, 20 S. E. 738, 48 L. R. A. 842, 44 Am. St. Rep. 463; Burbage v. Windley, 108 N. C. 357, 12 S. E. 839, 12 L. R. A. 409; Puckett v. Alexander, 102 N. C. 95, 8 S. E. 767, 3 L. R. A. 43; Griffin v. Hasty, 94 N. C. 438; Covington v. Threadgill, 88 N. C. 186; King v. Winants, 71 N. C. 469, 17 Am. Rep. 11; Whitaker v. Bond, 63 N. C. 290; Carter v. Greenwood, 58 N. C. 410; McRae v. Railroad, Id. 395; Ingram v. Ingram, 49 N. C. 188; Ramsay v. Woodard, 48 N. C. 508; Allison v. Norwood, 44 N. C. 414; Sharp v. Farmer, 20 N. C. 255; and "there are others." The plaintiff cannot recover for negligence without showing he was on the train under a valid contract of carriage, and the contract he shows is one against public policy, and makes at least one of the parties indictable. Whether the other party is not also indictable as an accessory in procuring such violation of law is an interesting question, but not now before us.

The plaintiff's allegation is that he was on the train by virtue of his contract for a free pass. Such transaction being a discrimination, as above shown, the penalty denounced by the statute upon the common carrier for such violation of law is a fine "not less than one thousand dollars nor more than five thousand dollars," and the penalty of the law upon the other party is that, if negligently injured during such illegal transportation, he cannot recover in the courts, since he must put forward such illegal transaction as the basis of his action. If his own act was not indictable, he procured an act by the defendant which was a misdemeanor, and obtained transportation thereby. A court of equity will not interfere with a contract, if it be illegal and against state policy, where the contractors are in pari delicto. Taylor v. McMillan, 123 N. C. 398, 31 S. E. 730, citing Grimes v. Hoyt, 55 N. C. 271. If there was no contract of carriage, the plaintiff had no rights as a passenger, but only the right to be protected against wilful and wanton injury, which is not alleged here. If he had any contract, it was one void under our decisions, being forbidden by statute and against public policy, and he is in no better condition.

The former judgment of this court ordering a new trial should be affirmed, and the petition to rehear dismissed, upon at least three other grounds, not heretofore discussed, because not deemed necessary. It was error to refuse the defendant's prayer that, if the free pass were legal, the plaintiff was estopped from recovery because of the stipulation upon the back of the pass releasing the company from liability for negligent injuries sustained while riding thereon. While there has been some conflict in authorities upon this point (4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1808; 2 Jaggard on Torts, 1082), the Supreme Court of the United States, in a recent and well-considered opinion, filed February 23, 1904 (Railroad v. Adams, 24 Sup. Ct. 408, 48 L. Ed. —), holds that such stipulation is valid, and cites an array of precedent showing that it is sustained by the overwhelming weight of authority. That opinion says: "But one answer can be made to the question. The railroad company was not, as to Adams, a carrier for hire. It waived its right as a common carrier to exact compensation. It offered him the privilege of riding in its coaches without charge if he would assume the risks of negligence. He was not in the power of the company and obliged to accept its terms. If he had desired to hold it to its common-law obligations as a passenger, he could have paid his fare and compelled the company to receive and carry him. He freely and voluntarily chose to accept the privilege offered, and, having accepted that privilege, cannot repudiate the conditions." The reason—the waiver of the common-law right to recover for negligence—applies equally here, where there was no valid contract of carriage at all, the plaintiff choosing by an illegal arrangement to become a mere licensee or trespasser. It would be strange if one claiming passage upon an illegal contract, which embraced as a part of it a release from liability for negligence, could recover when the bearer of a legal free pass with the same stipulation cannot recover.

In a still more recent case in the United States Supreme Court, Boering v. Railroad, 193 U. S. 442, 24 Sup. Ct. 515, 48 L. Ed. —, it is said that a stipulation in a free railway pass requiring the user to assume the risk of injury due to carrier's negligence is binding on the person accepting the privilege, although notice of such stipulation may not have been brought home to such person. For a stronger reason it applies to the plaintiff, who testified that he knew of such stipulation. For a stronger reason still, whatever different ruling to above may have been in some courts as to persons injured while riding on legal free passes, the plaintiff cannot invoke them as authority when asking for transportation and accepting it on an illegal free pass which had expired. The conductor had no right to receive him as a passenger, and plaintiff was fixed with knowledge of such illegality, and is in no condition to ask the court for damages not inflicted wantonly and willfully. Irrespective of the validity or illegality of the free pass upon the alleged extension of which the plaintiff obtained transportation without payment of fare, the contract of the plaintiff himself on the back of the free pass, that in consideration of obtaining passage upon it he released the company from liability for injuries to his person, is an independent contract, valid and binding upon him, and of itself puts an end to this action. The pass was put in evidence, and the language on the back (adopted by the plaintiff by using the pass) is as follows: "The person accepting this pass assumes all risks of accidents, and expressly agrees that the company shall not be liable, under any circumstances, for an injury to the person or loss or damage to baggage of the person using it." Why is he not bound by it when he seeks to hold the defendant bound by the illicit contract of carriage, for it is only when there is a contract of carriage that plaintiff can recover for damages caused by carrier's negligence, and not willfully and wantonly?

Jones, a witness for the defendant, testified that he sent the plaintiff the pass as a gratuity, upon his application; that he paid nothing for it; that there was no contract to publish the time-table; and that he made no agreement to renew the pass when it expired. The defendant asked the court to charge "that there is no evidence to support the plaintiff's allegation [in the complaint] that he was traveling on the defendant's road, on the occasion complained of, as a passenger for hire or compensation." It was error to refuse this, for, whether the plaintiff's or the defendant's testimony was correct, whether the pass had been renewed or not, the plaintiff was not a "passenger for hire or compensation." State v. Railway Co., 122 N. C. 1052, 30 S. E. 133, 41 L. R. A. 246.

The defendant also excepted properly to this charge of the court: "If, when the plaintiff was called on for his fare, he produced to the conductor the pass which has been exhibited in evidence, and the conductor accepted it, the plaintiff was a passenger on the train." The pass on its face had expired, and there was no testimony that it had been renewed. The judge does not add the proviso "if it had been renewed," and, if it had not been, certainly it could not make him a passenger. On the contrary, if the plaintiff's own evidence was true that a pass was issued in consideration of publishing the time-table, and, further, that the defendant had agreed to renew it, this being an agreement to make a contract forbidden by our statute against discrimination, the plaintiff was equally not a passenger. In any aspect this instruction was erroneous.

The point here presented has been admirably discussed by Sanborn, United States Circuit Judge, in the recent case, above cited, of Purple v. R. R., 114 Fed. 123, 51 C. C. A. 564, 57 L. R. A. 700, which holds: "One who, knowing that a conductor has no authority to grant free transportation, rides upon a train under an agreement, or tacit understanding, with the conductor that he shall ride free, is not a passenger, but a mere trespasser, to whom the only duty of the company is to abstain from willful or reckless injury. A contract of carriage is indispensable to a recovery, and the implied contract from plaintiff's being on the train was conclusively negatived upon showing the illegal agreement to transport without payment of fare." Here the plaintiff was fixed with notice in law that neither the company nor the conductor could transport him without payment of fare. A still stronger case is McGraw v. R. R. (at this term) 47 S. E. 758, which holds that, though one has a ticket, he cannot recover for willful expulsion if the conductor erroneously, but reasonably, supposed he had no ticket. A fortiori, the plaintiff cannot recover when he had no ticket, which the conductor knew, and there was no force used, but merely negligence is averred.

VANN v. EDWARDS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 1, 1904.)

MARRIED WOMEN—SEPARATE PROPERTY—DISPOSITION—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—CONSTRUCTION—BILLS AND NOTES—PRESUMPTION FROM POSSESSION—GIFTS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—APPEAL—LAW OF THE CASE.

1. Where by the Constitution a married woman is vested with the power of disposing of her personal property, that power cannot be divested or taken from her by any act of the Legislature.

2. In the construction of constitutions and statutes, technical words must be construed according to their legal definition, in the absence if anything to clearly indicate that the words were not intended to be so used.

3. Const. art. 10, § 6, providing that the real and personal property of a married woman shall remain her sole and separate estate, and shall not be liable for any debts or engagements of her husband, "and may be devised and bequeathed, and with the written assent of her husband, conveyed by her as if she were unmarried," permits a married woman to dispose of her property by gift without the assent of her husband, except in those cases where a written instrument or conveyance is required by law for that purpose.

4. Const. art. 10, § 6, providing that the property of a married woman shall remain her sole and separate estate, and shall not be liable for any debts of her husband, and may be devised and bequeathed, and, with the written assent of her husband, conveyed by her as if she were unmarried, does not remove the incapacity which prevents a married woman from contracting debts or pecuniary obligations, but so far as the power to contract is concerned, the disability of coverture remains as at common law, except where changes have been made by statute.

5. Where on a first appeal the only question presented was whether defendant's possession of a note raised the presumption of payment, the Supreme Court was not precluded, under the doctrine of the law of the case, on a subsequent appeal, from passing on the validity of the indorsement of the note by defendant's mother to him.

6. Where defendant's mother, by indorsement and delivery of a note executed by defendant to her, made a gift of it to him, the fact that defendant's father at the time of his death had possession of the note would not of itself defeat defendant's title acquired by the gift.

7. Whether defendant's mother, by indorsement and delivery of a note executed by defendant to her, made a gift thereof to defendant, or whether the note belonged to defendant's father, who had possession of it at the time of his death, was a question for the jury.

Montgomery, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; Justice, Judge.

Action by T. E. Vann, administrator of Darius Edwards, against D. K. Edwards. From the judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

L. L. Smith, for appellant. Winborne & Lawrence and Geo. Cowper, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover the amount of two notes, one for the sum of $450, and the other for the sum of $500. We are concerned only with the latter note, as the other is not in controversy. The note for $500 was executed by the defendant to his mother, Sarah F. Edwards, on the 8th day of June, 1888, and was payable eight years after its date, with 6 per cent. interest. The defendant, having admitted the execution of the note, avers that it was transferred, indorsed, and given to him by his mother, and he also avers that, if the transfer from his mother was void, he acquired title to the note by gift from his father. At the time the note was executed, and also at the time it was alleged to have been transferred to the defendant by his mother, Darius Edwards, the husband of Sarah F. Edwards, was living, and did not assent to the transfer, and the same was made, if at all, without his knowledge, and with the belief, on the part of Mrs. Edwards and the defendant, that he would not assent to the transfer. There was evidence in the case tending to prove that after Mrs. Edwards' death the note passed into the possession of her husband, who survived her, and remained in his possession until his death. There was evidence, on the contrary, which tended to prove that, while the note was in the possession of Darius Edwards after the death of his wife, it was delivered by him to the defendant, who kept it until the death of his father, and had possession of it until this suit was brought, when it was handed by the defendant's wife to one of the defendant's attorneys. When the case was here before, it was held that the defendant's possession of the note after the death of his father, in whose possession it had been subsequent to the death of his wife, who was the original owner and holder of the note, would, if established, raise a presumption that such possession was lawful, and that he is the owner of the note, and a new trial was granted to the defendant because of an erroneous ruling in the court below upon this point. At the second trial an issue was submitted to the jury as to the ownership of the note, the plaintiff asserting title to it as the administrator of Darius Edwards. The jury found against the defendant, and, judgment having been rendered upon the verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant excepted and appealed. The only exceptions which we need notice were taken to the charge of the court, and to an instruction of the court given to the jury at the plaintiff's request, which is as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the defendant acquired possession of the $500 note by delivery from his mother, without the knowledge or consent of his father, Darius Edwards, then no title to the note would pass to the defendant thereby; and if that were his only claim to the note, you should answer the first issue 'Yes.'" The court also charged the jury, among other instructions, to which no exception was taken, as follows: "If the note was executed by the defendant to his mother, and by her indorsed and transferred to the defendant without her husband's knowledge or consent, and that was his only claim, that would avail the defendant nothing, and the note would have passed to the husband as his property upon the death of his wife, subject to the payment of her debts." Defendant excepted. These two exceptions are in substance the same, and may be considered together, and they involve the question whether a married woman can make a valid transfer to another of a note belonging to her, without the written consent of her husband.

The Constitution (article 10, § 6) provides as follows: "The real and personal property of any female in this state, acquired before marriage, and all property, real and personal.

to which she may, after marriage, become in any manner entitled, shall be and remain the sole and separate estate and property of such female, and shall not be liable for any debts, obligations or engagements of her husband, and may be devised and bequeathed, and with the written assent of her husband, conveyed by her as if she were unmarried." It is provided by the Code (section 1826) that "no woman during her coverture shall be capable of making any contract to affect her real or personal estate, except for her necessary personal expenses, or for the support of the family, or such as may be necessary in order to pay her debts existing before marriage, without the written consent of her husband, unless she be a free trader, as hereinafter allowed." Our answer to the question we have stated must be in the affirmative. The decision of the case turns upon the construction of section 6 of article 10 of the Constitution, for if, by that section, a married woman is vested with the power of disposing of her personal property, such as the note upon which the suit was brought, this power cannot be divested or taken from her by any act of the Legislature, and section 1826 of the Code can have no operation in such a case, assuming it to be fully sufficient in its scope to embrace her executed contracts of sale or her gifts. It is provided by the Constitution, which is the higher, and indeed the supreme, law, to which all conflicting legislation must yield, that the property of every female, whether acquired before or after her marriage, shall be and remain her sole and separate estate, and shall not be liable for any of the debts, obligations, or engagements of her husband. If this were all of the section, we would have to conclude that, as a married woman is thus vested with full and complete ownership of things real and personal acquired by her before or after her marriage, having both the legal and equitable title, she must necessarily have also acquired every right which inheres in or is incidental to such ownership, and the most important and most valuable among them is the right of alienation, or what is commonly known in the law as the jus disponendi. While this may not accord with the view taken of that section in one or two of the cases, it will be found upon examination that they did not involve a decision of the question of a married woman's right to dispose of her personal property, but of her power to contract so as to bind her property generally, and it was held that, notwithstanding the provision of section 6, art. 10, of the Constitution, the disability of coverture remains as it was at common law, and prevents her from making a valid executory contract.

It will be observed that it is ordained by the Constitution that all that a married woman has or acquires in things real and personal shall be her sole and separate estate and property. The word "property" is of very broad signification. It is defined as;

"Rightful dominion over external objects; ownership; the unrestricted and exclusive right to a thing; the right to dispose of the substance of a thing in every legal way, to possess it, to use it, and to exclude every one else from interfering with it. Property is the highest right a man can have to anything, being used for that right which one has to lands or tenements, goods or chattels, which no way depends on another man's courtesy. A right imparting to the owner a power of indefinite user, capable of being transmitted to universal successors by way of descent, and imparting to the owner the right of disposition. * * * The right of property is that sole and despotic dominion which one man claims and exercises over the external things of the world, in total exclusion of the right of any other individual in the universe. It consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all a person's acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only by the laws of the land." Black's Law Dict. pp. 953, 954. The word "estate," which is also used in the Constitution, denotes the interest which any one has in lands, or in any other subject of property. An estate in lands, tenements, and hereditaments, says Blackstone, signifies such interest as the tenant has therein. 2 Bl. Com. 103. It also signifies the condition or circumstance in which the owner stands with regard to his property.. Both words are also used to describe the thing, real or personal, in which one has an estate or the subject-matter of ownership, or over which the right of property is exercised, and in this sense, perhaps, they were intended to be used in the Constitution. But the very word "property" implies the exclusive right of possessing, enjoying, and disposing of a thing, and, when used subjectively, it means that with respect to which this right exists, or that which is one's own. So it must be admitted that, if there were no words in section 6 of article 10 of the Constitution to limit the scope of that part of the section which we have just quoted, a married woman would have the same dominion over her separate estate and property as if she were a feme sole. But there are such words of limitation, and how and to what extent they restrict the right of alienation is the difficult and delicate question presented for solution. After exempting her property from any debt, liability, or obligation of her husband, it is provided that she may devise and bequeath the same. This power is absolute. She may will her property with the same freedom as if she were unmarried or sui juris. And by the last provision of the act she may, with the written assent of her husband, "convey" her property as if she were a feme sole. A correct analysis of this section brings us to this conclusion: that a married woman may dispose of her property in any way she may see fit to do so, except that, when she conveys it, the written assent of her husband is essential to the validity of her conveyance.

But what is meant by the word "convey"? The act by which she passes to another the title to her property must in law be a conveyance. Discussing a kindred subject in Kelly v. Fleming, 118 N. C., at page 188, 18 S. E. 81, this court, by Mr. Justice Macitae, says: "The word 'convey,' in its broadest significance, might embrace any transmission of possession; but we are restrained to its legal meaning, which, ordinarily speaking, is the transfer of property from one person to another by the means of a written instrument and other formalities. Rapalje & Lawrence Law Dict.: 'Convey; Conveyance.' According to Webster, a conveyance is 'an instrument in writing by which property or the title to property is conveyed or transmitted from one person to another.' The meaning of this word being well understood at common law, it must be understood in the same sense when used in a statute. Smithdeal v. Wilkerson, 100 N. C. 52 [6 S. E. 71]." A conveyance is "an instrument in writing under seal (anciently termed an 'assurance'), by which some estate or interest in lands is transferred from one person to another; such as a deed, mortgage, etc." Black's Law Dict. p. 273, citing 2 Blackstone. In Pickett v. Buckner, 45 Miss. 245, the court, in construing the dower act of that state, says: "In employing the term in the dower act 'conveyance,' or 'conveyed,' we suppose that the Legislature meant the sense in which the word is ordinarily used in our jurisprudence. It is a technical or quasi technical word, of precise and definite import. As defined by Bouvier (1 Law Dict. 348), 'Conveyance' 'is the transfer of the title to land by one person to another.' The instrument itself is called a conveyance." In Nickell v. Tomlinson, 27 W. Va. 720, the word "convey" is thus defined: "But the language now used is probably just as open to criticism as the language used one hundred years ago. The language now used is: 'shall operate to convey from the wife her right of dower in the real estate embraced in the deed.' Now 'convey' means transfer the title of land from one person or class of persons to another. See Bouvier's Law Dict. vol. 1, p. 399. Clearly, an inchoate dower interest is no title to land. It is no estate, present or future, vested or contingent, and the term 'convey' can be properly used only when the transfer of some 'estate in land' is spoken of." Again, the court says: "Conveyance is a transfer of an estate in land from one person to another." In Thompson v. Hart, 58 App. Div., at page 449, 69 N. Y. Supp. 229, the court, in construing the word "convey" with reference to its sufficiency as a legal term to pass personal property, said: "Manifestly the word 'convey' is inappropriate to the transfer of personal estate."

In Klein v. McNamara, 54 Miss. 105, the word "conveyance" is said to be a general word, and "comprehends the several modes of passing title to real estate. It is defined to be the transfer of the title of land from one person, or class of persons, to another." Lambert v. Smith, 9 Or. 193; Edelman v. Yeakel, 27 Pa. 27. Defining the word in Jenckes v. Court of Probate, 2 R. I. 255, the court says: "The term 'convey' is a technical term, long known or used in deeds conveying real estate." We believe all the lexicographers generally adopt, as the definition of the word "convey," the transfer of the title to realty, and of the word "conveyance" the instrument by which this is done. Anderson's Law Dict. p. 254; 1 Bouvier's Law Dict. (1897) p. 434; 1 Rapalje & L. Law Dict. 289; Abbott's Law Dict. 284. Blackstone emphasizes the distinction between instruments used in the alienation of "real estate" and those by which personal property and effects are transferred. "The former," he says, "being principally such as serve to convey the property of lands and tenements from man to man, are commonly denominated conveyances; which are either conveyances at common law, or such as receive their force and efficacy by virtue of the statute of uses." 2 Blk. 309. And, speaking again of conveyances, he says: "The legal evidences of this transmutation of property are called common assurances of the Kingdom, whereby every man's estate is assured to him, and all controversies, doubts, and difficulties are either prevented or removed." 2 Blk. 294, 295. Referring to this definition of Blackstone, the court, in McCabe v. Hunter's Heirs, 7 Mo. 357, says: "It has been argued that there is nothing in our statute concerning conveyances which requires an instrument conveying lands to be sealed. The statute uses the word 'conveyance' to designate all the instruments conveying lands from one to another. Blackstone says deeds which serve to convey the property of lands and tenements from man to man are commonly denominated 'conveyances.' 2 Blk. 309. We have seen that in England the word 'conveyance' carries with it the idea of a sealed instrument. This word is used by our Legislature in the sense in which it is understood in England." But if the framers of the Constitution used the word "convey" in its widest sense, as meaning transfer of property or the title to property from one person to another by means of a written instrument and other formalities, and its substantive "conveyance" as signifying the instrument itself by which the transfer is effected (Prouty v. Clark, 73 Iowa, 55, 34 N. W. 614), we do not think it can affect the result in this case. The word "convey" must still be restricted in its operation to such property as is by law required to be transferred by a written instrument. The words "convey and devise" are technical terms relating to the disposition of interests in real property. It would not be technically or legally correct to speak of conveying personal property by a verbal sale of it, or even by a writing, any more than it would be to speak of devising it by last will and testament; not that a draftsman may not use a technical word to express his meaning without intending that it shall be construed in its strictly technical sense, but, in the absence of anything to clearly indicate that the word was not intended to have its commonly accepted meaning in the law, but was used in some other and different sense, we must adopt the legal definition of the word, because, in the first place, it must be presumed to have been used in that sense, and, in the second, because it would be unsafe to reject that well-understood meaning for another, unless the latter had been most clearly indicated; and this principle should especially apply to constitutions and statutes, which are generally written by those learned in the law, and are intended to declare what the law shall be. It must be assumed in such a case that the state of the law and the meaning of its technical terms at the time of the enactment were known, for we are required, in construing written laws, especially those changing the common law, to consider the old law, and, in comparing it with the new so as to gather the intent, words of well-known legal signification must have the meaning thus attached to them by the law, and especially must they be understood in the sense which they have acquired by actual judicial interpretation, unless, by such construction, we defeat the intention which clearly and distinctly appears from some other part of the enactment or from its context. It may be added that the framer of section 6, art. 10, of the Constitution, must have been familiar with the meaning of technical or legal terms, for he made the proper distinction between the disposition of realty and the disposition of personality by will, when he used the words "devise" and "bequeath." It may fairly be assumed that he knew also that a writing was not essential to the transfer of personality, and that when he used the word "convey" he intended it should have its technical meaning.

There is another reason why the restriction upon the wife's right of alienation should be confined to that kind of property which can be transferred only by a written instrument. Section 6 of article 10 of the Constitution provides that a married woman's separate estate and property may be conveyed by her, with the written assent of her husband, as if she were unmarried. Property in things personal, generally speaking, may pass from one person to another by mere delivery or by word of mouth. An unwritten sale or gift is quite sufficient for that purpose. This being so, can it be supposed to have been intended by that section to require that, in every case where the wife makes a sale or gift of her personal property by delivery or by word of mouth, however small or however inconsiderable in value the article of property may be, the husband must give his written assent thereto? Or, to put the case more strongly, is it intended by that section that, if the wife wishes to sell or give to another her personal estate or any part of it, however small that part, she cannot do so by delivery or by word of mouth—a usual and immemorial method of transferring such property—but she must, in every instance, reduce the transfer to writing, in order that her husband may assent in writing to it, and that without this kind of written assent a valid transfer cannot be made? Either one or the other of the two alternatives must be adopted, unless the restriction upon her right to convey her separate estate and property is held to apply only to her realty, or to property the title to which can pass only by a written instrument. It further appears from an examination of section 6, art. 10, of the Constitution, that it was not intended to vest in the wife merely the naked title, or power to hold in her own name this "sole and separate estate and property," without any of the usual incidents of ownership, and without the right of direct control or dominion over it; but it was manifestly the purpose that, as it was vested in her own right, it should become her sole and separate property as if she were a single female, subject only to the limitations of that section. It is an enabling provision of the law, and should be construed in the spirit which prompted its enactment, and, as it authorized the wife to take and hold property to her sole and separate use, without the interposition of a trustee, and has thus made her capable of holding it by herself and for herself, independently of her husband, she should be adjudged to have the capacity of disposing of it, except in so far as she may be expressly or impliedly restrained. That this was the spirit and purpose of the lawmakers is evidenced by the fact that she is given the absolute right to dispose of her estate by will, which is certainly something more than the naked right to own and possess it, and then she may also convey it. It is therefore perfectly clear that it was intended she should have the right of disposition, in one form absolutely, and in another under certain restrictions. As she is vested with her property, including the incidental right of disposing of it inter vivos, subject only to one condition, it must follow that in all other respects her right of alienation is left free and unfettered. The expression of the one limitation upon this right is the exclusion of all others. When the law says that in one case she shall be under the restraint of her husband, it means, necessarily, that in all other cases she shall be free. We may well ask why should a wife be permitted to devise and bequeath her property, real and personal, and be allowed to convey only her real estate. If the use of the word "convey" restricts the right of alienation to the real estate, as we have shown that it does, then as to the personal property she is left without the right of disposition, unless it was the intention to confer upon her a general power to dispose of her property, with the proviso that real estate should not be conveyed without the assent of her husband. There is no valid or sufficient reason for making any distinction between the right to dispose of real estate, and the right to dispose of personal property, which would deprive her of the latter right. We think the true meaning of section 6, art. 10, is that a married woman may dispose of her property without the assent of her husband, except in those cases where a written instrument or conveyance is required for that purpose. This construction of the Constitution seems to be strongly favored by the court in Withers v. Sparrow, 66 N. C. 138. Referring to Knox v. Jordan, 58 N. C. 175, Boyden, J., for the court, says: "But the court in that case seems unwilling to sanction the doctrine that, as to the separate estate of the wife, she was to be regarded as a feme sole in all respects, as held in England and also in the state of New York. But however proper this unwillingness of the court to recognize that doctrine might have been at the time of that decision, there can be no reason, since the adoption of our present Constitution, why the English and New York doctrine should not now be followed in our state." We understand the court to mean that a married woman has under the Constitution the right to dispose of her separate estate in any manner, save in so far as she may be restricted to any particular method of alienation pointed out in that instrument, and not that she may contract generally, so as to subject her separate estate at law to the payment of her debts, as would be the case if she were sui juris. We are not at all disposed to change or impair the doctrine so frequently announced by this court with reference to the capacity of a married woman to contract. That question is not now directly before us. Nor do we think it necessary to disturb the principles established in Frazier v. Brownlow, 38 N. C. 237, 42 Am. Dec. 165, Harris v. Harris, 42 N. C. 111, 53 Am. Dec. 393, Knox v. Jordan, 58 N. C. 175, and more recently in Pippen v. Wesson, 74 N. C. 438, Dougherty v. Sprinkle, 88 N. C. 300, Flaum v. Wallace, 106 N. C. 296, 9 S. E. 567, and Farthing v. Shields, 106 N. C. 289, 10 S. E. 998, and still more recently in Harvey v. Johnson, 133 N. C. 352, 45 S. E. 644.

Our decision of the question involved in this case does not conflict with what this court has so often said, and which is thus clearly stated by Ruffin, J.: "At law a feme covert is incapable of making a contract of any sort, and any attempt of hers to do so is not simply voidable, but absolutely void. If, however, she be possessed of separate property, a court of equity will so far recognize her agreement as to make it a charge thereon. But even in that case, and in that court, her contract has no force whatever as a personal obligation or undertaking on her part. Nor was there any change wrought in this particular by the alterations made in our court system under the Constitution of 1868, or by the adoption of the statute known as the 'Married Woman's Act.' It was in reference to those very alterations, and the effect of the statute, that the court declared in Pippen v. Wesson, 74 N. C. 437, and Huntley v. Whitner, 77 N. C. 392, that no deviation from the common law had been produced thereby as respects either the power of a feme covert to contract, the nature of her contract, or the remedy to enforce it; that as a contract her promise is still as void as it ever was, with no power in any court to proceed to judgment against her in personam." Dougherty v. Sprinkle, 88 N. C. 304; Flaum v. Wallace, 106 N. C. 296, 9 S. E. 567. The Constitution does not remove the incapacity which prevents a married woman from contracting debts or pecuniary obligations. So far as her power to thus contract is concerned, the disability of coverture remains as it was at common law, except where changes have been made by statute. In this connection the language of the court in Pippen v. Wesson, 74 N. C., at page 445, is appropriate: "We conceive that while it would be beyond the power of the Legislature to destroy or alter the essential qualities of the separate estate given by the Constitution, as by giving the personal property to the husband, by making the property liable for his debts, or by destroying the wife's power of disposition, yet it is within its power to regulate the manner in which the separate estate shall be held, to prescribe what contracts and what dispositions of their estates, other than those specifically authorized by the Constitution, married women may make, and by what forms and ceremonies all their contracts shall be made and authenticated, and their free consent thereto ascertained. The Legislature may abolish all the incapacities of married women, and give them full power to contract as femes sole. The question is, has it done so?"

In what respect the method of charging in equity a married woman's separate estate with liability for her agreements may be affected, if at all, by this decision, is not now presented for our consideration. We simply hold that, without the assent of her husband, she may dispose of any of her property, unless the law requires the disposition to be evidenced by a conveyance or a writing.

It is argued that the case of Walton v. Bristol, 125 N. C. 419, 34 S. E. 544, is at variance with the conclusion we have reached, but we do not think so. The conflict, if there is any, is more apparent than real. The note in that case, which belonged to the wife, was indorsed by her alone, and deposited by her with the Piedmont Bank as collateral security for her husband's indebtedness to that bank. His indebtedness having increased to the amount of $3,000, an arrangement was made by which the husband borrowed to the amount of his indebtedness from the Wilmington Bank, and gave his note to that bank for the loan, and, with the proceeds realized on his note to the Wilmington Bank, he paid the debt due the Piedmont Bank, which bank had indorsed his note to the Wilmington Bank, for his accommodation, upon an agreement with him that the note for $1,250 should be deposited with it as collateral security or indemnity for its indorsement, and the husband so notified the Wilmington Bank, by letter, both before and after that bank loaned him the $3,000. The wife did not assent to, and, so far as appears in the case, had no knowledge of, this new arrangement. Upon these facts it is clear, we think, that, as the wife could only be liable as surety for her husband by reason of the indorsement and deposit of her note at the bank (Purvis v. Carstaphan, 73 N. C. 575; Trust Co. v. Benbow [at this term] 47 S. E. 435), the change in the arrangement fully discharged her, whether it be regarded as an extension of the time of payment to her husband (Fleming v. Barden, 126 N. C. 450, 36 S. E. 17, 78 Am. St. Rep. 671; Id., 127 N. C. 214, 37 S. E. 219, 53 L. R. A. 316), as a novation of the debt, or as a payment of the debt and an extinction of her liability, the last being the correct view, as we think. If the wife did not assent to the agreement by which her note was to be retained by the Piedmont Bank as indemnity against any loss resulting from its indorsement of her husband's note to the Wilmington Bank, and could not, in any view of the matter, be bound thereby, why inquire whether her indorsement of the note was valid and binding upon her? The indorsement had been virtually canceled and nullified by the payment of the note due the Piedmont Bank, whether it was originally valid or not, and the court so treated it, for it says "the wife never assented to the new arrangement," and was therefore not bound. The question as to the validity of her indorsement was not in the case, but, if it was, we would not be inclined to follow the decision, in so far as it conflicts with the conclusion which we have reached in this case. The point was not presented in Rawls v. White, 127 N. C. 20, 37 S. E. 38, which is also cited for the plaintiff.

But the plaintiff's counsel, in his well-prepared brief, insists that the point was decided in this case when it was here on a former appeal (128 N. C. 425, 39 S. E. 66), and also on the rehearing of that appeal (130 N. C. 70, 40 S. E. 853), and that it is res judicata, and has become the law of the case, whether the decision was right or wrong. We may admit the general proposition that the decision of a court of final resort upon a given state of facts becomes the law of the case upon a second trial and another appeal in regard to those facts, if they are substantially the same as those upon which the former decision was made, and yet, with that principle conceded, we do not think the question we are now considering has been finally adjudicated, as between the parties to this suit, so as to foreclose any further discussion of it and make any expression in either of the former opinions upon that question, whether correct or not, the law of the case. An examination of the record in the first appeal will show that the only question presented, and upon which the decision therein could have been made, was whether the defendant's possession of the note raised a presumption that he was the lawful holder of it, or, to speak more accurately, raised a presumption that the note had been paid. In passing upon this question, it could make no difference whether the note had been legally indorsed to defendant by his mother or not, for, if it had not been, he would still be entitled to the benefit of the presumption raised by the law from the fact of his possession of the note. When this court decided with him in regard to the presumption, it was not necessary to consider the other question as to the legal effect of the indorsement of his mother, even if it had been presented in a way to call for an adjudication of this court upon it. We have therefore concluded that the question as to the validity of the indorsement of the note by the defendant's mother to him is now open for our consideration.

The question as to the right of a married woman to dispose of her personal property without the written assent of her husband is directly and squarely presented in this case by the defendant's request for instructions and the charge of the court to which exception was taken, and it is the first time, as we think, that it has been so presented. Having held that the transfer of the note by his mother to the defendant was valid, it follows that the court erred in refusing to give the instruction requested by the defendant, and in giving the instruction to which he excepted, because, if the indorsement and delivery of the note to the defendant constituted a valid gift of it to him, the fact that the jury have found that he did not have possession of the note at the time of his father's death should not defeat his title to it acquired by the gift, as the defendant may be able to show that, even if his father had possession of the note at the time of his death, and there is therefore a presumption in favor of plaintiff, he is himself the real owner of it by virtue of the gift from his mother. This is a question for the jury to decide upon all the facts of the case and under proper instructions from the court, and, by holding that defendant acquired no title to the note by his mother's indorsement, the court deprived him of the use of that important fact in developing his defense. The error thus committed entitles the defendant to another trial.

New trial.

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). I still am of the opinion that the law on the subject of the right of a married woman to dispose of her separate estate, whether it consists of real or personal property, was properly decided in the case of Walton v. Bristol, 125 N. C. 419, 34 S. E. 544. The opinion in this case overrules that case. In Walton v. Bristol, supra, the court said: "The Constitution, as we have seen, so far as the wife's power to convey her separate estate is concerned, makes no difference between real property and personal property. If she undertakes to convey either species of property, the written assent of her husband must be had." Article 10, § 6, of the Constitution, is in these words: "The real and personal property of any female in this state, acquired before marriage, and all property, real and personal, to which she may, after marriage, become in any manner entitled, shall be and remain the sole and separate estate, and property of such female, and shall not be liable for any debts, obligations or engagements of her husband, and may be devised and bequeathed, and with the written assent of her husband, conveyed by her as if she were unmarried." It will be seen from reading that section of the Constitution that the words "real and personal property" are always associated, and that the copulative conjunction "and," leading the last clause, connects both real and personal property with the mode of conveying them. If inconveniences arise practically in the disposition of small articles of personal property by the wife, the written assent of the husband being required, the difficulties are created by the section of the Constitution above quoted, and this court cannot dispense with them. I can add nothing to what I said for the court in Walton v. Bristol, supra.

BRINKLEY v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 31, 1904.)

RAILROADS — CHANGES IN ROADBED — REMOVAL OF PUBLIC HIGHWAY — LIABILITY TO LANDOWNER — STATUTES.

1. A railroad company acquired a right of way through plaintiff's land under Laws 1854-55, p. 264, c. 228, § 29, providing that, in the absence of contract in relation to lands through which the road may pass, it shall be presumed that the land over which the road may be constructed, together with 100 feet on each side thereof, has been granted by the owner to the company, and that the company shall hold it so long as used for the purposes of the road, unless the owner shall apply for an assessment of the value within two years after the road has been located. The track was originally laid in the center of the right of way, and so remained for over 30 years, when defendant changed the track by removing it about 5 feet on and along the right of way, and also changed the grade by substituting in one place a cut for a fill. Held, that the owner of the servient estate was not entitled to compensation for the change as for a new taking of the land.

2. Under Code, § 1957, subsecs. 3, 5, providing that a railroad company may use any portion of a public highway in constructing its road, and that when this is done the company shall construct another highway in place thereof, a railroad, in making a change in its track, has a right to change a county road within the limits of its right of way without rendering itself liable to the owner of the servient estate as for a new taking of the land.

Douglas, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Burke County; Shaw, Judge.

Action by Henry Brinkley against the Southern Railway Company for compensation for change in defendant's roadbed, in which it was agreed, inter alia, that defendant's predecessor in ownership located and constructed the line of railroad in question in 1868 or 1869, that by the change in location of the roadbed it became necessary to change the public road or highway running along the railroad, and that all of the changes were within 100 feet of the roadbed as originally constructed. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Avery & Avery and Avery & Ervin, for appellant. S. J. Ervin, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. The question for consideration is whether or not a railroad company can use, for any and all purposes connected with the conduct of railroad business, the entire strip of land which it may have acquired by process of condemnation, or as a result of law growing out of the provisions of its charter. The defendant claims the right of way over the land in dispute, under a purchase of the interest in the same of the Western North Carolina Railroad Company, chartered by the General Assembly of this state. Laws 1854-55, p. 257, c. 228. There was no condemnation of the land, but it is agreed that the Western North Carolina Railroad Company acquired the right of way over it by virtue of section 29 (page 264) of the act of incorporation, which is in these words: "And in the absence of any contract or contracts in relation to the lands through which said road may pass, it shall be presumed that the land over which said road may be constructed, together with 100 feet on each side thereof, has been granted by the owner or owners to the company, and the said company shall have good right and title thereto, and shall have, hold and enjoy the same so long as it shall be used for the purposes of said road and no longer, unless the owner or owners shall apply for an assessment of the value of said land as hereinbefore directed, within two years after that part of the said road has been located." When that part of the road located on the land in dispute was finished, the track was laid in the center of the right of way, and remained there until March, 1902, when the defendant changed the location by removing it about five feet to the southward from its original position for a part of the way on and along the right of way. The defendant also at the same time changed the grade of the original railroad track by substituting in one place a cut about 6 feet deep for a fill of about 2½ feet in height. The plain tiff contends that that action of the defendant company was a new taking of his land, and for the trespass and taking he is entitled to compensation in damages. His contention, in his own words (in the brief), is "that, while the company could build side tracks on the same grade and inside of its right of way, if necessary for corporate purposes, it had no right, first, to inflict additional damage upon the owner of the servient tenement by changing a cut into a fill or a fill into a cut on his premises; second, that a change of location of the main line necessarily involved a change in the center of the right of way, and, when the defendant moved its right of way five feet south of the original location and changed the center of that track, it involved an additional taking of the land of the plaintiff on the south of the track, and a corresponding abandonment of a strip of equal width on the land of the abutting owner just north of Brinkley and on the opposite side of the track. This must be a new taking, being such a change as would change the location of the entire right of way along the plaintiff's front."

The right of the defendant to the free use of its right of way for railroad purposes is involved in the case. The question is not whether the Western North Carolina Railroad Company acquired the fee-simple interest or an easement in the right of way (that question has been determined in favor of the latter view in Blue v. Railroad, 117 N. C. 644, 23 S. E. 275; Railroad v. Sturgeon, 120 N. C. 225, 26 S. E. 779; Shields v. Railroad, 129 N. C. 1, 30 S. E. 582), but rather whether under the easement the defendant has the right to use the whole of the right of way for railroad purposes, including the right to change the grade of the roadbed, or to remove the location of its main track at any time to any point on the right of way. In the cases last above cited it was decided that railroad companies, if they should need the whole of the right of way for railroad purposes, had the right to use the whole. Some of those uses were mentioned in the decisions, viz., roadbed and drains, side tracks, and houses for their employés, warehouses and station houses, with convenient ingress and egress. Under those decisions, railroad companies could build as many side tracks over any part of the right of way as might be necessary to a proper conduct of their business, with a view to the safety of the traveling public, as well as for its own and the public interests. Why, then, have they not the right to change the grade of the main track, or alter the location of the main track, whenever the safety of their service is improved or the public interests require it? We can see no reason to the contrary.

If the plaintiff's house was situated on the right of way at the time the railroad was finished, and he acquiesced in the appropriation, he would have rights if the railroad company should have afterwards built high embankments or made deep excavations so near his residence as to materially interfere with the free use and enjoyment of his home. But no such matter is now before us. There is no such claim or demand in the complaint. The naked question before us is this: Whether or not a railroad company has a right to change the grade of its roadbed, or to remove it to any point on its right of way? We think it has that right. In Mills on Eminent Domain, at section 211, the author says: "There is a vast difference between the location of a right of way and the location of a track on a right of way. The company has the right to locate its track at its will and pleasure upon any part of its right of way. One location of its track does not deprive it of the right to make another location." Dougherty v. Wabash Ry. Co., 19 Mo. App. 419; State v. Sioux City R. Co., 43 Iowa, 501; Munkers v. Railroad, 60 Mo. 334; Com. v. Haverhill, 7 Allen, 523. In Pierce on Railroads the writer says: "It [the railroad company] may lay its tracks, side tracks as well as main tracks, at any place within the location, and shift them from place to place within it." The defendant had the right to make the change in the county road under subsections 3 and 5 of section 1957 of the Code.

No error.

WALKER, J. (concurring). This case, in my judgment, is correctly decided, and for the reasons given in the opinion of the court as written by Mr. Justice MONTGOMERY. So far as the questions incidentally referred to in the opinion, and which relate to the control of a railway company over its right of way, are concerned, it is best that I should withhold even any intimation of opinion in regard to them, until they are directly presented for decision, when my judgment can be formed after mature consideration and reflection. As I view those questions, they involve important interests, not only of private individuals and of the railway companies, but of the public as well.

DOUGLAS, J. (dissenting). I do not think the real question at issue is correctly stated in the opinion of the court, which assumes as a fact the ownership by the defendant of a right of way of 200 feet in width. If the defendant railway company had actually condemned or bought or had given to it 100 feet on each side of its track through the plaintiff's land, the case would be different. I do not understand that there is any pretense that the defendant paid anything whatever for its right of way, or was actually given any more land than it actually occupied. Its only claim for 200 feet of land seems to rest upon a naked presumption founded upon a legal fiction in an unpleaded private statute. If a neighbor asks me to give him a few roasting ears, and I tell him to help himself, am I to be held to have given away my entire corn crop? Suppose the agents of a railroad company come to a generous citizen and say to him, "We want to go through your land; we will locate our track over 100 feet from your house, and so nearly on grade as to permit you to cross at any point without putting you to any discomfort or inconvenience," and he should say, "Go ahead, I will not charge you for merely going through my land;" by what process of reasoning can such permission be construed into a grant under which the company, by altering its location and changing its grade, can take his land, injure his remaining property, and destroy his home? Oh, but it is said, he should have brought suit within two years. Brought suit for what? He had neither the right nor the inclination to bring suit for the land he had given to the railroad, and I am ignorant of any authority by which he could have brought suit for land which was claimed by no one else, and of which he alone was in actual and undisturbed possession adverse to all the world. I cannot bring myself to hold that the Legislature had either the power or the intention of taking the land of an individual and giving it to a corporation without compensation or the opportunity of obtaining it. Why should the corporation, the creature of the law, have any greater privileges than the citizen, the creator of the law?

I have no desire whatever to unnecessarily interfere in the slightest degree with the construction or operation of railroads, and I am aware that their public character and the proper performance of their public duties justify and require the exercise of certain powers and privileges not possessed by the individual. An instance is the exercise of the power of eminent domain inherent in the state as the concrete representative of the sovereign people. But all such privileges, given alone for the public benefit, are subordinate to the public welfare, and must be exercised with due regard to the inherent and inalienable rights of the individual. If they need his land, let them take it; but let them pay for it. Let them take it openly and fairly, so that he may know what they claim; and let them pay for it, not in legal fictions or irrebuttable presumptions, but in money or money's worth. In the words of the Court of Appeals of New York, "Take, but pay." The plaintiff is not seeking to prevent the defendant from changing the location and grade of its track, but simply to obtain compensation for the additional injury done to him by such change. My views upon these questions are fully expressed in my dissenting opinions in Jones v. Commissioners, 130 N. C. 457, 42 S. E. 144, and Dargan v. Railroad, 131 N. C. 626, 42 S. E. 979, wherein I have attempted to discuss principles which to me seem to underlie the foundations of our government.

PAUL v. CITY OF WASHINGTON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 8, 1904.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—REASONABLENESS—EQUITABLE RELIEF—INJUNCTION—SCOPE.

1. An injunction will not lie to restrain a city from enforcing ordinances regulating the liquor traffic within its corporate limits, and from revoking and canceling complainant's license for violation thereof, and to declare such ordinances void on the ground that they impose unreasonable, vexatious, and oppressive restrictions on the business of selling liquors by those licensed to do so by the city authorities.

2. Under Priv. Laws 1903, c. 170, p. 362, § 18, incorporating the city of W., and providing that the board of aldermen of such city shall have power to regulate, control, license, or prevent the sale of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, and preserve the peace, order, and tranquillity of the city, such board had power to pass reasonable ordinances to restrict and regulate the liquor traffic in such city, and to prohibit the same, at their election.

3. City ordinances regulating the liquor traffic prohibited the use of any contrivance obstructing the view of the interior of the saloon from the outside; required all liquors to be served and drunk at the counter; prohibited the use of tables, lounges, etc.; declared that the saloon keepers, their servants or employees, should not use any side or rear doors, trap doors, elevators, or stairways for the purpose of selling or delivering liquor; established business hours between 6 o'clock in the morning and 8 o'clock in the evening; prohibited the saloon keeper or his employees from being in the saloon during closing hours; prohibited the use of billiard tables, pool tables, gaming devices, tenpin alleys, or other devices in saloons; and also prohibited the maintaining of any restaurant or committee rooms connected with the barroom of the saloon, or in the same building where liquors were sold, unless the places were separated by one or more solid perpendicular walls, with no openings of any kind therein; and authorized the board of aldermen to revoke the license of a saloon keeper, in addition to the imposition of a fine, for breach of such regulations. Held, that such regulations were not objectionable as unreasonable.

Douglas, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Hoke, Judge.

Bill by Smith Paul against the city of Washington to restrain defendant from enforcing certain liquor ordinances. From an order dissolving a restraining order, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an appeal of the plaintiff from an order made by Judge Hoke in which he dissolved a restraining order theretofore made in the case. The plaintiff was, before the 1st day of January, 1904, and at the time this action was commenced (January 18, 1904), engaged in retailing liquor in the city of Washington, N. C., in a large two-story brick building situated at the corner of Main street and Whitecar alley. There is a front door upon Main street and a side door upon Whitecar alley, and also a door from the rear of the building opening into the lot upon which the building stands; and there has been, and still is, a cellar beneath the building, with a trapdoor leading to the cellar and the cellar has been used and could be used for storage purposes. Prior to the 1st day of January, 1904, the plaintiff rented out the second story of the building as a general restaurant, and a part of the time conducted the same on his own account. On the 4th of November, 1903, the board of aldermen of the city of Washington enacted and adopted (to go into effect on the 1st day of January, 1904) the following ordinances:

"(1) That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation, carrying on the business of selling spirituous, vinous or malt liquors in Washington, or for any agent, servant or employee of such person, firm or corporation, to have, use, permit or allow in their saloons, sales room or place of business, any storm doors, partitions, screens, blinds, stained glass, or any contrivance which shall in any manner obstruct the view of the interior of his or their saloon, sales room or place of business or any part thereof, or which shall in any manner conceal or cut off any view of any person or persons in such saloon, sales room or place of business from and through the front door and windows thereof. All front doors shall be glass paneled, one glass to the shutter; the bottom of said panel shall not be more than four feet in height from the level of the sidewalk; the bottom of glass in all front windows shall not be more than four feet in height from the level of the sidewalk; all glass in front windows and front doors shall be kept clean of dirt, specks or anything that will dim or obstruct the view of the interior of such saloon, sales room or place of business. No counters shall extend more than fifty feet from the front door or doors of said saloon or saloons. All liquor shall be served at the counter, and all liquors drunk in said saloon or saloons shall be drunk at the said counter or counters; and any person violating this ordinance shall, upon conviction thereof be fined fifty dollars. Each and every day upon which a violation of this section shall be committed or continued shall constitute a separate offense.

"(2) That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation, carrying on the business of selling spirituous, vinous or malt liquors in Washington, or for any agent, servant or employee of such person, firm or corporation to use, permit or allow any side door or rear door, trap doors, elevators or stairways for entrance to or exit from his or their saloon, sales room or place of business by side or rear door or place of entrance or exit; nor shall any spirituous, vinous or malt liquors be sold or delivered through any window or other opening, and any person violating this ordinance shall upon conviction thereof be fined fifty dollars. Each and every day upon which a violation of this section shall be committed or continued shall constitute a separate offense; provided nothing herein contained shall prevent the use of such back or side doors by the person or persons carrying on said business, his or their agents, servants or employees for purposes other than the sale or delivery of liquors.

"(3) That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to whom shall be granted a license to sell spirituous, vinous or malt liquors by the board of aldermen of Washington, or for any agent, servant or employee of such person, firm or corporation to sell, give away or in any manner part with directly or indirectly any liquor or drinks in his or their saloon, sales room or place of business between the hours of eight o'clock in the evening and six o'clock in the morning, or permit or allow the doors of his or their saloon, sales room or place of business to be opened or remain open between said hours; and every person violating this ordinance shall upon conviction thereof be fined fifty dollars. Each and every day upon which a violation of this section shall be committed or continued shall constitute a separate offense.

"(4) That in every saloon or room where the business of selling spirituous, vinous or malt liquors shall be carried on under a license from the board of aldermen of Washington, the person, firm or corporation, holding such license shall keep burning throughout the period of darkness, each and every night, a gas or electric light of such brightness that objects in the rear of said room may be plainly seen; and no such room shall be entered, opened, kept open or occupied by any person whomsoever between the hours of closing on Saturday night at eight o'clock and the hours for opening on the next Monday morning at six o'clock. Any person, firm or corporation, or his or their servant, agent or employee who shall violate this ordinance, shall upon conviction thereof be fined fifty dollars.

"(5) That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation carrying on the business of selling spirituous, vinous or malt liquors in Washington, or for any agent, servant or employee of such person, firm or corporation to have, use, permit or allow in his or their saloons sales room or place of business, or in any room connected therewith, any billiard table or pool table, tenpin alleys, gaming tables or any games or gaming devices whatsoever, whether the same be played or used or played for amusement and exercise or for anything of value, and shall also be unlawful to have, use, permit or allow in his or their saloon, sales room or place of business or in any room connected therewith, any restaurant, eating house, room or table or any means or contrivance whatever for providing, supplying or furnishing food, whether the same is to be provided, supplied or furnished for giving away or for selling to customers, and it shall be unlawful to permit or allow in his or their saloon, sales room or place of business, obscene pictures, the printing to be exposed to view on the walls thereof or elsewhere in the room.

Any person, firm or corporation, his or their agents, servants or employees who shall violate this section shall upon conviction be fined fifty dollars.

"(6) No saloon shall be conducted, or shall any spirituous, vinous or malt liquors be sold or disposed of in any building in which there is a restaurant, eating house, room, table, or any means or contrivance whatever for providing, supplying or furnishing food, whether the same be provided, supplied or furnished free or for pay: provided this shall not apply where the saloon or place wherein liquor is disposed of and the room or place where food is furnished or supplied shall be separated by one or more solid, upright, perpendicular walls, with no doors, nor openings of any kind therein. Any person, firm or corporation, his or their agents, servants or employees who shall violate this section, shall upon conviction be fined fifty dollars.

"(7) That any and all licenses hereafter granted by the board of aldermen of Washington for the sale of liquors shall be issued by the said board and be accepted by the applicant therefor upon the express condition that a violation of any of the foregoing ordinances, of any statute or ordinance regulating the sale of liquors in or at the saloon, sales room or place of business for which the license has been granted, shall work a forfeiture of said license, and that the board of aldermen upon satisfactory evidence of such violation shall have the power of declaring such license revoked, and such condition shall be incorporated in the license when granted. Upon complaint made to the mayor that any person, company or firm has violated any of the said ordinances or statutes, he shall forthwith summon such person, company or firm to appear before the board of aldermen at a given time, not less than three days notice being given, to show cause why such license should not be revoked."

On January 2, 1904, the ordinances being in full force, a license to retail liquor was granted to the plaintiff by the board of aldermen upon a condition inserted in the license that a violation of any of the ordinances should work a forfeiture of the license.

Chas. F. Warren, for appellant. Bragaw & Ward, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. (after stating the facts). The plaintiff commenced this action for relief by injunction, his object being to avail himself of the benefits of his license and at the same time to restrain and enjoin the defendant from enforcing the ordinances on the ground that they were oppressive, vexatious, and unreasonable. He is met in limine by the contention on the part of the defendant that he cannot try the validity of an ordinance of a municipal corporation by injunction, and that he can have no relief in equity because he can have full relief in a court of law if the ordinance be unlawful. The cases of Cohen v. Commissioners, 77 N. C. 2, Wardens v. Washington, 109 N. C. 21, 13 S. E. 700, Scott v. Smith, 121 N. C. 94, 28 S. E. 64, were cited in the argument of the defendant's counsel here in support of the contention.

In answer to that position, the counsel of the appellant, while questioning the correctness of the law of those cases, yet insists that the facts there can be distinguished from those in the present case; that the reason assigned in those cases by the court for denying redress in equity is that the plaintiff could have complete redress in an action at law for damages; that the court certainly could not have meant that damages could be recovered against the municipal corporations, for the reason that municipal corporations are not liable for torts in the nature of trespass committed by their officers—policemen—when they undertake to enforce unconstitutional and void ordinances enacted in the attempted exercise of police powers or public or governmental functions; nor could it have intended to say that damages could be recovered against the members of the board of aldermen of cities and towns individually or personally, for municipal officers who enact ordinances under a claim of power from the legislative branch of the government are vested with the immunities and privileges of government, and consequently are exempt from liability if they have made a mistaken use of their powers; and that the court must have meant, therefore, that the policemen who actually made the arrests under an unconstitutional municipal ordinance are liable in damages to the person aggrieved. And the counsel of the appellant further insisted that, as in the present case the policemen are and were insolvent, and on that account a recovery against them would be worthless, and afford no redress to the appellant for injuries he may have sustained if the ordinances are void, the case was easily to be distinguished from Cohen v. Commissioners, supra, and the other similar cases mentioned, where it did not appear that the officers making the arrests were insolvent. The counsel further contended that the suggestion made in Wardens v. Washington, supra, that one who doubts the validity of a municipal ordinance might raise the question by a defense of himself when he might be arraigned upon a criminal charge for an alleged violation of a town ordinance, places the complainant at a disadvantage; that it would be a hard law to compel a citizen who has no redress in the way of damages against the municipal corporation or its aldermen personally, or from the constable or policeman (on account of his insolvency) who makes the arrest under an unlawful ordinance, to compel him to violate the law—the ordinance—at his peril in order to test its validity.

The writer of this opinion is in sympathy with the argument of the counsel of the appellant, but the majority of the court are of the opinion that the law as laid down in the cases above cited is correct in principle, and applies to the facts of this case, and to all others in which the attempt may be made to test the validity of a municipal ordinance by injunction. That view of the case by the court would relieve us of the consideration of the question of the alleged unlawfulness of the ordinance, but, as a decision upon that branch of the case will be of so much importance to the public, we will now take up that question for discussion and decision.

No question can be raised in this case as to the power of the board of aldermen to pass reasonable ordinances to restrict and regulate the liquor traffic in Washington, and even to prohibit it if they see fit to do so. In section 18 of chapter 170, p. 362, Priv. Laws 1903, entitled "An act to incorporate the city of Washington," it is enacted "that among the powers conferred on the board of aldermen are these: They may * * * regulate, control, tax, license or prevent the establishment of junk and pawn shops, their keepers or brokers, and the sale of spirituous, vinous or malt liquors; * * * provide for the proper observance of the Sabbath, and the preservation of the peace, order and tranquillity of the city." It was argued in this court for the defendant that, as the board of aldermen were given the power to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors within the city limits, therefore, under the maxim that "the greater includes the less," ordinances regulating and restricting the traffic, if the aldermen should see fit not to prevent, but to license, whether reasonable or unreasonable, were matters in their discretion, and not reviewable by the courts. We think that that is not a proper view of the powers of the aldermen, or of the rights of those who may be licensed to sell liquor by the board. They, as we have said, had the right to prevent or prohibit entirely the sale of liquor. They had also the power to license the traffic, and to regulate it, and, having adopted as a choice the plan of licensing and then regulating, it must follow that the regulations and restrictions must be such as are reasonable, and their reasonableness must be, in case of contest, finally decided by the courts. State v. Taft, 118 N. C. 1190, 23 S. E. 970, 32 L. R. A. 122, 54 Am. St. Rep. 768; State v. Yopp, 97 N. C. 477, 2 S. E. 458, 2 Am. St. Rep. 305.

In the consideration of the reasonableness of these ordinances, it must be understood that they are to be discussed from the point of view of our state legislation on the subject of the liquor traffic, and the decisions of our court upon that legislation. The restrictions and limitations with which the legislative branch of our government for many years past, at the demand of a strong and aggressive sentiment, individual and public, against the evils of intemperance, have environed this traffic, and the firm support of this legislation by the courts, afford unmistakable evidence that the traffic is dangerous to society in its moral effects, and injurious to the material welfare of the commonwealth. The police power, directly through the Legislature and indirectly through municipal corporations, is being more and more exercised in the regulation and suppression of the sale of liquor, on the theory that it is evil in its nature, until such legislation has grown into a system of temperance legislation. Each encroachment, however, has been stubbornly resisted by those engaged in the trade. This court has in no uncertain language approved of the legislation on this subject. In Bailey v. Raleigh, 130 N. C. 209, 41 S. E. 281, 58 L. R. A. 178, the court said, referring to the restrictions in the prohibition act for Raleigh, "This is done under the exercise of the police power, owing to the evil tendency of the business;" and in State v. Ray, 131 N. C. 817, 42 S. E. 960, "Liquor itself is regarded as an evil, an enemy of civilization and good government." From the standpoint of the statute law on the subject and the decisions of the court, the rule with reference to what the law would regard as undue restrictions upon a useful business cannot be the same as that applicable to the liquor traffic. What would be a deprivation of the use of property without due process of law, or an infringement of personal liberty against one engaged in a useful trade, would not be such when considered in connection with the property or person with one engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquors, as is pointed out in State v. Ray, supra, where the court said: "It must be understood that they [saloons] stand on a very different footing to the sale of dry goods and family groceries. Liquor itself is regarded as an evil, an enemy of civilization and good government. Its sale without a license is condemned and prohibited by law, and the regulations closing at certain hours such shops might well be put upon the implied power as being for the public good." In looking at the ordinances as a whole, it is readily seen that the aldermen in enacting them had in view the purpose to cause the licensee to give publicness to whatever might go on inside of the place in which liquors might be sold, instead of allowing secrecy about the matter; to break up, as far as possible, loafing and loitering in saloons; to prohibit the young, or those who might not be permitted to enter the front doors, to come in by means of side and rear doors in a clandestine manner, or to get liquor from rear and side doors, or to do indirectly the same thing by means of having eating houses connected with the drinking places; to take from the saloons enticements and allurements which have a tendency to attract the senses, and to develop and foster the susceptibility of vice and immorality; to close the saloon at hours when general work is over for the day, to the end that the inexperienced, the young and impressionable, and the unfortunate of those who have been at work in useful occupations may not be induced to spend their evenings and their money in the bar-room; and to have lights kept burning and doors closed during prohibited hours that the officials may more easily preserve the public peace and order, and that the public may know that the laws in respect to the retailing of intoxicating liquors are being obeyed.

In respect to the first ordinance it is insisted for the plaintiff that that part forbidding the use of partitions was not only enacted without authority, and is unreasonable, but that it is positively mischievous, in that it prevents the separation of the white and negro races while they are drinking in the saloon. The law has no requirement for race separation in barrooms, and, if their keepers think it necessary to make the separation, there is really nothing in the ordinance that prevents them from so doing. The partition can be run from the front toward the counter, and one side can be allotted to one race and the other to the other, and the ordinance will not be violated; for it only provides that the partitions or screens shall not "conceal or cut off any view of any person or persons in such saloon, sales room, or place of business from and through the front doors and windows thereof." We have no decisions of this court on the subject of the power of municipal corporations, or even of the General Assembly, to prohibit the use in saloons of stormdoors, screens, stained glass, or any contrivances which obstruct the view of the interior of saloons, or as to what kind of doors and windows, whether of glass or of other material, shall be used; but the decisions from other states fully sustain the requirements of the first ordinance in all these respects, and we are of the opinion that the ordinance is a reasonable one.

We think further that that part of that ordinance which requires that all liquors shall be served at the counter, and shall be drank at the counter, is also a reasonable requirement, being calculated to prevent loafing and loitering, and also to diminish the quantity that might be drank. Drinking to excess would certainly be more apt to take place where guests could be seated around tables or lounges with other attractions that might be offered.

In regard to the second ordinance the contention of the plaintiff is that it is "arbitrary, oppressive, vexatious, unreasonable, and void" in that it deprives the plaintiff of the use and convenience of his property without due process of law. By that ordinance saloon keepers and their servants and employes are not permitted to use any side or rear doors, or trapdoors, elevators, or stairways, for the purpose of selling or delivering liquor through such communications; but the ordinance does not prohibit the use of such entrances and exits for any other purposes than the sale and delivery of liquors. That certainly is a restriction upon the plaintiff's property, but, in our opinion, it is not an unreasonable restriction; certainly not one so unreasonable as to warrant us to declare it void. As was said in the case of State v. Yopp, 97 N. C. 477, 2 S. E. 458, 2 Am. St. Rep. 305: "Such statutes [police regulations] are valid, unless the purpose or necessary effect is not to regulate the use of property, but to destroy it. As we have said, it is the province of the Legislature to decide upon the wisdom and expediency of such regulations and restraints, and the courts cannot declare them void, or interfere with their operation, unless they are so manifestly unjust and unreasonable as to destroy the lawful use of property, and hence are not within the proper exercise of the police power of the government. Courts cannot regulate the exercise of this power; they can only declare the invalidity of statutes that transcend its limits. The exercise of this power does not extend to the destruction of property under the form of regulating the use of it, unless in cases where the property or the use of it constitutes a nuisance." The plaintiff's property is not destroyed by this ordinance. It is true the regulations concerning its use by the aldermen are stringent, but we cannot say they are too much so, when the purposes for which the building is being used are taken into consideration. The board of aldermen have said that that part of the plaintiff's building which he uses for the sale of liquor is a suitable place, and sufficient for that purpose, and that the use of the forbidden parts of that building in connection with the sale of liquor are not necessary, and would prevent, if so used, the proper regulation of the sale of spirituous liquors. We have no doubt that the defendant, under the power given in the charter, had a right to confine the sale of liquor to a particular room in that building, and to prohibit the use of side and rear doors, trapdoors, elevators, and stairways leading to or out of that room for the purposes of selling or delivering liquors.

It is contended that the third ordinance is unlawful for the reason that it prohibits the selling or giving away liquors between the hours of 8 o'clock in the evening and 6 o'clock in the morning, and also for that it prohibits the saloon keeper or his employes to open the doors, or allow them to remain open between said hours. In State v. Thomas, 118 N. C. 1221, 24 S. E. 535, the hours prescribed by the ordinance were 10 o'clock p. m. and 4 o'clock a. m., and there was no question made in that case on the reasonableness of such hours. It seems to us that the hours of closing and opening in the case before us are not unreasonable. For a few months in the year there might be, in the mornings, a couple of hours of daylight in which the retailing of liquor might not be carried on, but it does seem that those hours—hours in which the greater number in each community is engaged in preparing for the day's duties and living—might be spent in some useful way without injury to saloon keeper. He would then have nearly 14 hours in which to supply the demand for his wares. That ought to be ample time for all legitimate needs and necessities.

So far as the requirement in the fourth ordinance that places for the retailing of liquor shall be kept reasonably lighted, it seems to us there can be no just objection, for on its face it seems a very fair and proper police regulation. But in respect to that requirement which makes it unlawful for the owners of saloons to enter their buildings between the hours of closing on Saturday night at 8 o'clock p. m. and the hour for opening next Monday morning at 6 o'clock we have some doubt. In the case of State v. Thomas, 118 N. C. 1221, 24 S. E. 535, the charge was that the defendant remained in his barroom after the hour prescribed for closing. In that case the ordinance made "it unlawful for any barkeeper, clerk or agent or any person whatsoever to keep open, or be or remain in, a bar room or other place where spirituous or intoxicating liquors are sold between 10 o'clock p. m. and 4 o'clock a. m." The court there held that the charter of Marion did not empower the town to pass the ordinance, and that under the general law (Code, § 3800) the power did not exist to pass the ordinance. Under the charter of the city of Washington the board of aldermen, as we have seen, had the power either to prohibit the sale of liquor or to regulate and control its sale, and the only question is whether this part of the fourth ordinance, preventing the owners of saloons from entering their saloons during Sundays, is reasonable. As we have said, we have our doubts about this matter, but as that part of the ordinance is not clearly unreasonable, and remembering that the board of aldermen have full opportunity to judge of such a necessity, we do not feel called upon to set aside their judgment by declaring the ordinance invalid on the ground that it is unreasonable. We cannot see that the objections to the fifth ordinance are reasonable objections. Billiard tables, pool tables, gambling tables, tenpin alleys, and other gaming devices, whether played for amusement and exercise or for anything of value, are such attractions as ought not to be used in saloons where liquor is sold. They entice and allure men into the temptation to drink, and encourage loafing and lounging. It is true that in the Revenue Laws of 1903 a tax is levied on billiard and pool tables and bowling alleys connected with any place where liquor is sold or allowed to be drunk, whether kept under the same roof or not; but it does not follow from this that it is not in the power of a municipal government that is authorized by its charter to prohibit the sale of liquor, or to license its sale, and then regulate it, and declare that billiard and pool tables shall not be used in connection with barrooms. It is only where they are not prohibited from being used by the lawful authority that they can be taxed. Under the fifth ordinance there is no prohibition against the use of restaurants or eating houses, rooms or tables for providing or furnishing food, being kept in the same building in which liquor is sold, but the prohibition is against having such restaurants or eating rooms connected with the barroom. We cannot say that that prohibition is unreasonable.

The sixth ordinance enacts that no place where spirituous, malt, or vinous liquors are sold or disposed of shall be in any building in which there is a restaurant, eating house, room, or any means or contrivance for providing or furnishing food, unless the two places shall be separated by one or more solid upright perpendicular walls, with no doors nor openings of any kind therein. That seems to us a very proper regulation. Such a condition of affairs, we can see, would be most conclusive to the bringing together of elements of society whose conduct in many instances would tend to produce disorder. We may take judicial notice of a fact so well known that these joint eating houses and drinking saloons afford opportunities for carousals and lawlessness, and are sore spots in many communities.

It is provided in the seventh ordinance that in case of a violation of any of the ordinances of the town regulating the sale of liquor by one licensed to sell liquor the board of aldermen may have the power to investigate the matter, and to revoke the license in case it should be found that the ordinance had been violated. We see no objection to the ordinance as applicable to this case, especially as the plaintiff in this case had agreed to that method of trial. But, if that ordinance was invalid, yet the others would not be affected, and the plaintiff or any licensee of the board of aldermen of Washington might be made to pay the fines mentioned in the ordinances by the proper tribunal, upon its being made to appear that the ordinance had been violated.

Chapter 233, p. 233, of the Acts of 1903, has no application to the city of Washington, for, as we have seen, the charter of that city confers on the aldermen the power to regulate or to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors, and section 19 of chapter 233, p. 233, of the Laws of 1903, particularly declares the purpose of the act to be not to interfere with such municipalities or territories as are given the power to regulate or to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors.

No error.

WALKER, J. (concurring). This action was brought to enjoin the defendant from enforcing certain ordinances regulating the liquor traffic within its corporate limits, and from revoking and canceling the plaintiff's license to sell liquor, and to declare the said ordinances null and void upon the ground that they impose unreasonable, vexatious, and oppressive restrictions upon the business of selling liquors by those who are licensed to do so by the town authorities. The motion for the injunction was denied, and the plaintiff appealed. It is sufficient, I think, for the purpose of deciding the case in the view I take of it, to state that it is provided by the several ordinances in question that the business of retailing liquors shall be conducted under certain rules and regulations specified in the ordinances, and that a failure to comply with the said rules and regulations or the violation of any of the ordinances subjects the offender, upon conviction, to a fine of $50 for each day on which a violation occurs. It is not necessary to set forth the terms of the several ordinances more particularly than I have done, as the court, in my opinion, is not at liberty to consider the general question of their validity, because of an objection of the defendant in limine, which is fatal to the plaintiff's action, namely, that if we concede, for the sake of the argument, the ordinances are invalid, the plaintiff is not, upon the facts stated in his affidavit, entitled to any relief by injunction. The plaintiff, upon affidavit, obtained a restraining order and an order to show cause why an injunction to the hearing should not be issued, and on the return day of the order the motion for a continuance of the injunction was heard upon the affidavits, as is stated in the order, no complaint having been filed, though it is recited in the original restraining order that it was granted upon the complaint and affidavits. Regularly, the motion to continue the injunction should not have been heard until the complaint was filed, and it may be that the law contemplates in a case like this one that the complaint shall be filed in the beginning, so that the court may see clearly and distinctly that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded, "where it consists in restraining the commission or continuance of an act" (Code, § 338); but, however this may be, it would seem to be good practice to require the complaint to be filed when the motion to continue is heard, for it is the allegations of the complaint, and not of affidavits merely, that ascertain and determine what is the cause of action out of which arises the right or equity that requires protection pending the litigation. But I will consider the case without reference to the question of pleading and practice, as I desire to state my views upon the legal merits involved.

There are two objections to the plaintiff's right to maintain this action: First, the courts cannot enjoin the enforcement of the criminal law or of municipal ordinances imposing fines or penalties; and, second, the defendant, under its charter, had the power "to prevent, control, tax, license, or regulate the sale of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors," and the plaintiff, having applied for and accepted his license with full knowledge of the terms of the ordinances, is not in a position to question their validity, but must exercise the right and privilege of selling conferred by that license in strict compliance with the conditions and restrictions imposed.

In regard to the first objection, we must bear in mind that, if the court should issue an injunction against the institution of a criminal prosecution, it would not only interfere with the due administration of the criminal law, which is of the first importance in any well-ordered system of government, but it would have to restrain action by the state, in whose sovereign name and capacity all criminal cases are commenced and prosecuted; and the state is not even a party to this action, and her rights cannot be prejudiced without notice and a hearing, even if we could entertain for a moment with any seriousness the proposition that a court of equity can interfere by injunction with the administration of the criminal law. The violation of a town ordinance is made by statute a misdemeanor. Code, § 3820. If it is contended that the ordinance imposes a penalty for each violation of it, and that a court of equity will interfere on behalf of the plaintiff to prevent vexatious litigation and a multiplicity of suits, one answer, and a conclusive one, is that a court of equity will never assume jurisdiction in such a case until the right of the complaining party, or, in this particular case, the validity of the ordinance, has been first determined in an action at law. The true principle governing such a case is well stated in Wallack v. Society, 67 N. Y. 28: "The general rule is that the court will not restrain a prosecution at law when the question is the same at law and in equity. An exception exists where an injunction is necessary to protect a defendant from oppressive and vexatious litigation. But the court acts in such cases by granting an injunction only after the controverted right has been determined in favor of the defendant in a previous action. On this ground the chancellor in West v. Mayor, 10 Paige, 539, dissolved a temporary injunction restraining the defendant from prosecuting suits against the complainant for violation of a corporation ordinance claimed to be invalid. The unconstitutionality of the act of 1872 would be a perfect defense to a prosecution for the penalties given by it, and the question as to the constitutionality of the act has not been determined. It would doubtless be convenient for the plaintiff to have the judgment of the court upon the constitutionality of the act before subjecting himself to liability for accumulated penalties. But this is not a ground for equitable interference, and to make it a ground of jurisdiction in such cases would, in the general result, encourage, rather than restrain, litigation." Further, the court thus states the law: "The question as to the validity of a corporation ordinance does not properly belong to this court for decision, where the complainants, as in this case, have a perfect defense at law if the ordinances are invalid, or if they do not render the complainants, or those in their employ, liable for the penalty. And it would be a usurpation of jurisdiction by this court if it should draw to itself the settlement of such questions when their decision was not necessary in the discharge of the legitimate duties of the court. * * * This court would not grant an injunction to protect him against the multiplicity of suits until his right to such protection had been established by a successful defense at law in some of the suits." In 16 Enc. of Law, p. 370, we find the following succinct statement of the principle: "It is a well-settled rule, both in England and America, that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to interfere by injunction to restrain a criminal prosecution, whether the prosecution be for violation of statutes or for an infraction of municipal ordinances. The rule applies whether the prosecution is by indictment or by summary process, and to the prosecutions which are merely threatened or anticipated as well as those which have already been commenced. So it is not within the power of the parties to waive the question relating to the jurisdiction of the court, and to compel it to try the cause. If the prosecution is under an ordinance, no ground for enjoining it is constituted by the fact that the ordinance is void, or that the party seeking the injunction has not committed a violation of the ordinance, or that the complaint in the prosecution under the ordinance states no cause of action." In Burnett v. Craig, 30 Ala. 138, 68 Am. Dec. 115, the plaintiff sought to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance against the sale of liquor, and the court said: "We have found no case, however, where chancery has restrained a simple trespass or succession of trespasses on either the person or personal goods. The utmost extension of the principle which has come under our observation embraces only trespasses to realty, where the remedial agency is shown to be necessary to prevent multiplicity of suits, or to avert irreparable mischief. * * * The judgments and sentences of the town council, of which the appellant complains, were quasi criminal proceedings. A bill in chancery to restrain a malicious or unfounded prosecution is certainly of novel impression. * * * We have not been able to find any principle or adjudged case which justifies an injunction to stay a prosecution, either criminal or quasi criminal, or to restrain a trespass to the person or personal property. We think such a precedent would be an alarming stretch of equity jurisdiction. In considering this case simply on the equity of the bill, we have necessarily regarded its averments as true. It is not intended by this to intimate an opinion on the validity or invalidity of the ordinance or of the fines imposed on the appellant. They will be considered when properly presented." In Moses v. Mayor, 52 Ala. 198, it is said: "Courts of equity will not interfere to stay proceedings in criminal matters, or in any cases not strictly of a civil nature. They will not grant an injunction to stay proceedings on a mandamus, or an indictment, or an information, or a writ of prohibition. The courts of law have complete jurisdiction to punish the commission of crimes, and can interpose to prevent their commission by imprisoning the offender or binding him to keep the peace. But courts of equity have no jurisdiction over such matters; at least a court of equity cannot entertain a bill on this ground alone. * * * A bill in chancery to restrain a malicious or unfounded prosecution is certainly of novel impression, and there is neither principle nor authority to support it. * * * Municipal authorities would be paralyzed in discharging the public duties intrusted to them if every offender against the ordinances they have proclaimed could by injunction arrest them, or could by multiplying his offenses invoke the interference of a court of equity. * * * The counsel for the appellant have sought to withdraw the case presented by the bill from the operation of this general principle and the authorities by which it is supported, upon the ground that the interference of a court of equity is necessary in this case for the prevention of vexatious litigation and of a multiplicity of suits. It could well be said in answer, the litigation and multiplicity of suits apprehended are criminal in their character, and without the jurisdiction of the court." And to the same effect are the following authorities: Devron v. First Municipality, 4 La. Ann. 11; Beach on Injunctions, § 520; Eldridge v. Hill, 2 Johns. Ch. 281; Field v. Western Springs, 181 Ill. 186, 54 N. E. 929; 1 Spelling, Inj. & Extr. Rem. § 694. In Burch v. Cavanaugh, 12 Abb. Prac. 410, it was held that an injunction will not lie to restrain an illegal arrest, and that several persons who were threatened with arrest could not unite in the same action to prevent it; and, further, that the insolvency of a person who threatens to make the arrest cannot be ground for an injunction to restrain him. The case of Hottinger v. New Orleans, 42 La. Ann. 629, 8 South. 575, in its essential facts, is very much like the case at bar. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant, by the attempted enforcement of an illegal and void municipal ordinance, was interfering with her dairy business, and by its unauthorized acts was injuring her property and impairing the value thereof. The court, after stating that as a court of equity it had no power by injunction to prevent a municipal corporation from enforcing penal ordinances in the interest of public order and health, said: "The ordinance was enacted in pursuance of the police power vested in the city—whether rightfully or wrongfully is not to be determined in this suit. It was a police regulation, in the interest of public health, with a penalty for its violation. The pecuniary loss in the enforcement of the ordinance cannot, therefore, be considered in determining the question of jurisdiction. The enforcement of the ordinance vested by the Constitution and law of the state upon the recorder's court of the city of New Orleans. If the ordinance is unconstitutional, as alleged, the plaintiff can suffer no injury, as she has her remedy, and can urge her defense in the recorder's court. Failing there, she has her remedy by appeal to this court." In Cohen v. Commissioners, 77 N. C. 3, this court said: "If the defendants have an unlawful ordinance, and have arrested and fined the plaintiffs, as they allege, the plaintiffs have complete redress in an action for damages. And as often as the arrest may be repeated they have the like redress. But we are aware of no principle or precedent for the interposition of a court of equity in such cases." The principle has been expressly affirmed in Wardens v. Washington, 109 N. C. 21, 13 S. E. 700, Scott v. Smith, 121 N. C. 94, 28 S. E. 64, and recognized and applied in Vickers v. Durham, 132 N. C. 880, 44 S. E. 685; Busbee v. Lewis, 85 N. C. 332; Busbee v. Macy, Id. 329; and Pearson v. Boyden, 86 N. C. 585. While, as we have said, the fact that the police officers of the town are insolvent does not take this case out of the general rule, it may be added that process can be issued by the mayor, who is made by statute a magistrate and custodian of the peace with the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, to any lawful officer, such as a sheriff, town constable, etc. (Code, §§ 2079, 3808, 3811, 3818; State v. Cainan, 94 N. C. 890); and the execution of such process is not confined to the policemen of the town. But, if an injunction is the proper remedy, the plaintiff must fail in this suit, as his case presents no equity to be protected by the restraining process of the court. The ordinances in question were adopted by the defendant before the plaintiff applied for and obtained his license to retail liquor, and he knew of their existence and accepted the license subject to the conditions and the regulations imposed by them. Under these circumstances, what moral or legal right has he to question their validity? The Legislature may prohibit or restrict the sale of liquor in any manner its wisdom and discretion may dictate, and no one has any natural or absolute right to sell liquor. If he sells at all, it must be on such terms as the law may impose. The law in this respect is thus stated in Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 91, 11 Sup. Ct. 13, 34 L. Ed. 620: "The police power of the state is fully competent to regulate the business, to mitigate its evils, or to suppress it entirely. There is no inherent right in a citizen to thus sell intoxicating liquor by retail. It is not a privilege of a citizen of the state or of a citizen of the United States. As it is a business attended with danger to the community, it may, as already said, be entirely prohibited, or be permitted under such conditions as will limit to the utmost its evils. The manner and extent of regulation rest in the discretion of the governing authorities." The same doctrine is stated by this court in Bailey v. Raleigh, 130 N. C. 214, 41 S. E. 281, 58 L. R. A. 178, as follows: "It [the Legislature] had the right to have absolutely prohibited the interstate or any one else from selling liquor within one mile of the corporate limits of the city. This it did unless the party selling obtained a license or permission to do so from the city authorities. Instead of this right to do so with the permission of the city authorities being a restriction, its effect was to relax the prohibitory rule, and to grant him a right he did not otherwise have. The law allowing him to get a license from the city took nothing from him, and imposed no duty upon him. It only gave him an option—a right to take the license and pay the tax, or not. How he was damaged by having this privilege, this option, which he chose to accept, we are unable to see." When, therefore, the law conferred upon the defendant the power to "prevent, regulate, control, tax, or license the sale of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors," as they had the power to prevent, or, what is the same thing, to prohibit, the sale, this necessarily implied that they could grant license upon any terms or conditions they saw fit, in the exercise of their judgment or discretion, to impose or to annex to the grant. "A grant of entire control, or of power to suppress and restrain, would enable the corporation to adopt any mode of regulation within the limit of those powers, license included." Horr and Bemis, Mun. Pol. Ord. p. 250. "Regulating a thing is the prohibition of it, except in accordance with certain rules. This act prohibits the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquor except under certain regulations therein provided." Cantini v. Tillman (C. C.) 54 Fed. 975. I confess my inability to understand how a person, who, upon his own application, has received a license in which is stated that it was issued "subject to all ordinances of the city of Washington now in force and hereafter enacted, and upon the condition that a violation of any ordinance of the city shall work a forfeiture of said license," can continue to enjoy the right and privilege conferred by the license and repudiate the conditions upon which it was granted. He must take the burden with the benefit or privilege he has sought and accepted. If the plaintiff is about to suffer any injury to his property, it is one which he has voluntarily and deliberately brought upon himself by accepting a license so worded, and he has no good reason to complain. He is the author of his own misfortunes, if any are about to overtake him; and I am not aware of any principle of law or morals upon which he can justly appeal to a court of equity for relief.

Having concluded that the court has no jurisdiction to grant the relief demanded, it is unnecessary to consider the question argued by counsel as to the reasonableness and validity of the ordinances. That matter is not before the court, and anything I might say would be the expression of my individual opinion upon an abstract and hypothetical question. I agree with the majority of the court that the ruling below, by which the injunction was dissolved, was right.

CLARK, C. J., and CONNOR, J., concur with WALKER, J., that an injunction does not lie against the enforcement of a municipal ordinance, the violation of which is a misdemeanor, for the reason that the state cannot be enjoined from the execution of its criminal laws, and concur with MONTGOMERY, J., that the ordinances are not void.

DOUGLAS, J. (dissenting in part). With the utmost respect I am constrained to express the difficulty I have had in arriving at the real opinion of the court. Having held that the action would not lie, it seems to me that there the opinion of the court ended, and that all that is said in the numerous opinions as to what might have been the law if there were any question of law before us is obiter dicta. Still, as it is in the opinion of the court, and as the judgment of the court is that there is "no error," I must take things as I find them, regardless of their legal relation. I am inclined to think that the weight of authority is against the right of the plaintiff to injunctive relief. This, in my opinion, ends the case, and my only excuse for proceeding further is that I am following the court. We are now in the last hours of the term, and it is impossible to write this opinion, which has been delayed for various reasons, with the fullness and care that I would desire. Many of the ordinances are reasonable, while others are utterly indefensible. No ordinances should go beyond a reasonable regulation of the traffic, remembering always its dangerous character. But we must also remember that it is not an unlawful business as long as the state sees fit to license it, and that when the people vote for license they are entitled to have their will carried out in good faith by their public servants. When a man accepts a public office, he should give to all classes of men the equal protection of the law, no matter what may be his personal convictions, or resign the office. Under the pretense of regulating a business he should not seek to destroy it. Time will permit me to cite but one of the several ordinances I deem unreasonable. It is made unlawful for the owner of a saloon to enter his own building between 8 o'clock on Saturday night and 6 o'clock on Monday morning, a period of two nights and a day, and yet he is required to have a bright light burning in his saloon during the entire night. Should the light go out during that 34 hours, he is liable to heavy penalties if he fails to relight it, and also liable to a heavy penalty if he goes into his building for the purpose of lighting it. Is this reasonable? It certainly is not law. State v. Thomas, 118 N. C. 1221, 24 S. E. 535.

Much is said in the opinion of the court as to the moral features of the case that may justify a personal allusion on my part. All my life I have voted consistently and persistently for temperance in whatever form it was presented, and in the sunset of life I see no reason to change my course; but others are entitled to the same freedom of suffrage and opinion. I am constrained to say that I have sometimes had occasion to doubt the wisdom of my vote, and I am sure that the cause has frequently been injured by the intemperate language of some of the most zealous and brilliant of temperance advocates. My experience convinces me that extremists on either side are the evangelists of opposition.

McCALL v. WEBB et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 11, 1904.)

OFFICERS—TITLE TO OFFICE—RIGHT TO FEES—
RES ADJUDICATA—STATUTES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Code, § 616, as amended by Acts 1895, p. 105, c. 105, § 1, as amended by Acts 1899, p. 144, c. 49, relating to the hearing of cases to try title to office, requires the defendant to give a bond conditioned on defendant paying to the plaintiff all costs and damages, including the loss of fees and emoluments which plaintiff may recover in the action, and provides that, if the bond be not given, the judge shall render judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendant for the office and costs, and judgment by default and inquiry, to be executed at term, for damages, including fees and salary, and that, in case the bond is given and judgment is rendered for plaintiff, the court shall render judgment against defendant and his sureties for costs and damages, including loss of fees and salary. Code, § 618, provides that in actions to recover the possession of an office, if judgment be rendered in favor of the person alleged to be entitled to the office, he may recover by action the damages which he shall have sustained. Held, that section 618 is inconsistent with, and therefore repealed by, section 616 as amended.

2. There is no constitutional objection to Acts 1895, p. 105, c. 105, § 1, as amended by Acts 1899, p. 144, c. 49, amending Code, § 616, relating to the hearing of cases to try title to office, on the ground that the action is prosecuted in the name of the state to assert the right of one of its citizens to a public office.

3. Under Code, § 616, as amended by Acts 1895, p. 105, c. 105, § 1, as amended by Acts 1899, p. 144, c. 49, relating to the hearing of cases to try title to office, the failure of plaintiff to recover fees and salary in the action adjudging his right to the office is a bar to a new and independent action for fees and salary.

Montgomery and Douglas, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Hoke, Judge.

Action by R. S. McCall against Ohas. A. Webb and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, Webb appeals. Reversed.

The General Assembly, by an act passed at its session of 1895, established the "criminal circuit court of the counties of Buncombe, Madison, Haywood, and Henderson," and the plaintiff was duly elected and qualified as solicitor of the circuit for the term of four years. In 1897 the act was amended by adding the county of McDowell to the circuit. The Legislature, at its session of 1899, repealed both of the said acts, and subsequently, at the same session, established the "Western District criminal court," with jurisdiction in the said counties and others named in the act, and provided for the appointment of a solicitor for each of the counties composing the district. The defendant was appointed and qualified as solicitor for the county of Buncombe, and was installed in office. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action in the nature of quo warranto against the defendant to test the validity of the act of 1899, which he alleged to be void, and in his complaint he states that the defendant has usurped and intruded into the office of solicitor of the Western District criminal court for Buncombe county, and is unlawfully receiving the fees and emoluments thereof. He demands judgment that the defendant is not entitled to the office, that the plaintiff is so entitled, and for costs, and for such other and further relief, etc. In his answer the defendant denies the plaintiff's right to the office, and, among other things not necessary to mention, avers that he is "in possession of said office lawfully, and is lawfully entitled to receive and retain to his own use the fees and emoluments thereof." The plaintiff, on filing his verified complaint, applied to the court, by motion in writing, for an order requiring the defendant to file a bond in the sum of $200, to be void upon condition that the defendant "shall pay to the plaintiff all such costs and damages, including the damages for loss of such fees and emoluments as may or ought to have come into his hands, as the plaintiff may recover in this action"; and he notified the defendant that "in default of the execution and filing of such undertaking the plaintiff will move for judgment for the recovery of said office and costs, and for judgment by default and inquiry for damages according to law." He afterwards moved that the defendant be required to increase the penalty of the bond to an amount not less than $400. Both motions were granted by the court, and the defendant was required to give undertakings conditioned as above set forth in the plaintiff's written motion—one of them, in the sum of $200, being executed by the defendant with his codefendants, Rankin and Featherstone, as sureties; and the other in the sum of $300 by the defendant with his codefendant Rankin as surety. These undertakings were given in strict accordance with the acts of 1895 and 1899 hereinafter mentioned. Upon the coming in of the answer each of the parties moved for judgment upon the pleadings. The court gave judgment for the plaintiff, and therein declared him "to be entitled to the office, and to perform the duties and to receive the emoluments thereof," and for costs of action. There is no reference in the judgment to the plaintiff's right to recover of the defendant any of the fees or emoluments of the office received by him, nor did the plaintiff ask for any reference or any inquiry to ascertain or assess his damages. The judgment was simply that he was entitled to the office, and that he recover the possession of the same, and his costs. To the judgment thus rendered the defendant excepted, and appealed to this court, which, on November 21, 1899, affirmed the said judgment. 125 N. C. 243, 34 S. E. 490. At November term, 1899, of the superior court, the plaintiff moved that the judgment of the last term in the quo warranto case be reformed so as to include an order for an inquiry as to his damages, and that a referee be appointed to take and state an account of the salaries, fees, and emoluments received by the defendant. These motions were continued. Afterwards, at February term, 1900; the plaintiff moved that the judgment entered at November term, 1899, be amended by inserting the words: "This cause retained for the purpose of an inquiry as to the damages which the relator may be entitled to recover of the defendant herein;" and, second, that the plaintiff's complaint in that action be amended by inserting in it an allegation as to the unlawful and wrongful receipt of the fees and emoluments of the office by the defendant to the amount of $700, and his refusal to account for and pay over the same to the plaintiff, together with a prayer for judgment for $700, the amount of said fees and emoluments and costs. The motions of the plaintiff were denied at February term, 1900, and final judgment then entered according to the certificate of this court. The plaintiff excepted, and appealed, and the judgment was affirmed by this court. 126 N. C. 760, 36 S. E. 174. The plaintiff thereafter, on November 29, 1899, brought this action against the defendant and his surety on the undertakings given in the former action to recover the fees alleged to have been collected by the defendant as solicitor, amounting to $657.50, and the defendant pleaded the judgment in the former suit as res judicata and a bar to this action. The matter was heard in the court below upon a case agreed, the facts of which we have already substantially set forth. The court adjudged upon the facts that the plaintiff recover of the defendants the sum of $657.50, the full amount of the fees collected by the defendant Webb during his incumbency of the office, with interest and cost, the said judgment to be discharged as to the defendant Featherstone by the payment of $200 and interest to the day of the payment, and as to the defendant Rankin so soon as the payments amounted to $500 and costs then accrued. The defendant excepted to this judgment and appealed.

Julius C. Martin, F. A. Sondley, and T. H. Cobb, for appellant. Frank Carter and V. S. Lusk, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the case). The question in this case is whether the plaintiff should have recovered his damages for the loss of the fees and emoluments of the office in the action in the nature of quo warranto in which his right to the office of solicitor was established, or whether he can maintain a separate action, such as this one is, and recover his damages therein. If he could only have his damages assessed by reference or inquiry in the first suit, it would seem perfectly clear that the judgment in that suit operates as res judicata, and is a complete bar to his right of recovery in this case, as he permitted a final judgment to be entered in that action without having his damages assessed. Whether the remedy to have the damages assessed in the first action was exclusive of all other remedies, and prevented the bringing of a separate action, as this is, for their recovery, depends upon the construction of our statutes upon the subject, because it cannot be contended with any hope of success that the Legislature did not have the power to provide that the plaintiff's damages should be assessed and recovered in the action brought to try the title to the office. The right to a particular remedy is not a vested one, and, while the Legislature cannot deprive a party of all remedy, the state has complete control over the remedies which it offers to suitors in its courts, and may limit the resort to remedies. It may abolish old remedies and substitute new, or even without substituting any, if a reasonable remedy still remains. Cooley, Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) p. 515 et seq. It was so held in Parker v. Shannonhouse, 61 N. C. 209, in regard to the repeal of the statute giving the remedy by scire facias (13 Edw. I, c. 15; Rev. Code, c. 81, § 100) to revive a dormant judgment, because the plaintiff still had the common-law remedy by action upon the judgment. It has been held that laws changing remedies for the enforcement of legal contracts or abolishing one remedy when two or more existed may be perfectly valid, even though the new or the remaining remedy be less convenient than that which was abolished, or less prompt and speedy. Cooley, supra, 406. So that the power resided in the Legislature to repeal the remedy by separate action for the recovery of damages from him who has been adjudged to have wrongfully intruded into an office and to have received the fees and emoluments thereof. The functions of a court in respect to statutes are, first, to decide upon their constitutionality or validity, and, second, to ascertain and declare their meaning.

Having decided as to the extent of the power and authority of the Legislature with respect to remedies, we will next consider what remedy it has given for the recovery of damages such as those claimed in this case. It was provided by the Code, § 613, that in actions to recover the possession of an office, "if judgment be rendered upon the right of the person so alleged to be entitled, in favor of such person, he may recover by action the damages which he shall have sustained by reason of the usurpation of the defendant of the office from which such defendant has been excluded." It was held under this section that compensation in damages for the loss of the fees and emoluments of the office could be recovered from the intruder, who had received the same, in an action brought after the rendition of the judgment for money had and received to the relator's use. Swain v. McRae, 80 N. C. 111; Jones v. Jones, Id. 127; Howerton v. Tate, 70 N. C. 161. Section 616 of the Code, providing for expediting the hearing of cases brought to try the title to offices, was amended by Acts 1895, p. 105, c. 106, § 1, by inserting the following: "The defendant before he is permitted to answer or demur to the complaint shall execute and file in the superior court clerk's office of the county wherein the suit is pending an undertaking with good and sufficient surety in the sum of $200 which may be increased from time to time in the discretion of the judge, to be void upon condition that the defendant shall pay to the plaintiff all such costs and damages, including damages for the loss of such fees and emoluments, as may or ought to come in the hands of the defendant, as the plaintiff may recover in the action." And section 1 of chapter 105, p. 105, of the Acts of 1895 was itself amended by Acts 1899, p. 144, c. 49, by adding thereto the following: "At any time after a duly verified complaint is filed alleging facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the office, whether such complaint is filed at the beginning of the action or later, the plaintiff may upon ten days notice to the defendant or his attorney of record move before the resident judge or the judge riding the district at chambers to require the defendant to give such undertaking; and it shall be the duty of the judge to require the defendant to give such undertaking within ten days; and if the undertaking shall not be so given the judge shall render judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the recovery of the office and the costs, and judgment by default and inquiry to be executed at term for damages including loss of fees and salary. Upon the filing of said judgment for the recovery of such office with the clerk, it shall be the duty of the clerk to issue and the sheriff to serve the necessary process to put the plaintiff into possession of the office. In case the defendant shall give the undertaking, the court, if judgment is rendered for the plaintiff, shall render judgment against the defendant and his sureties for costs and damages including loss of fees and salary." It will be observed that by the act of 1895 the defendant is required to give an undertaking to secure to the plaintiff all costs and damages, including such fees and emoluments as may or ought to come into his hands, and which the plaintiff may recover in the action. This language is perfectly clear and explicit, and leaves no room for doubt as to what is meant. If it is not expressed in so many words, it is plainly implied, that the plaintiff must recover his damages in the pending action for the recovery of his office, for the essential condition of the undertaking is "that the defendant shall pay all such costs and damages as the plaintiff may recover in the action," and these damages are secured by the undertaking, and, if they are not paid by the defendant, the sureties become liable for them. How can a plaintiff recover damages in an action unless they are assessed in that action. The expression, "such costs and damages as the plaintiff may recover in the action," means necessarily and ex vi termini that there must be a recovery of them in that action, or not at all. The damages are to be recovered just as the costs, for they are associated together, and put in the same category. But if there were any uncertainty as to the meaning of that statute, all doubt would be removed by the act of 1899, for it provides that: "If the undertaking shall not be so given the judge shall render judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the recovery of the office and the costs and judgment by default and inquiry, to be executed at term for damages including loss of fees and salary." And again: "In case the defendant shall give the undertaking, the court, if judgment is rendered for the plaintiff, shall render judgment against the defendant and his sureties for costs and damages including loss of fees and salary." (Italics ours.) A judgment by default and inquiry is taken always against the defendant, and not against his sureties. They cannot be said to have defaulted, nor are the damages assessed against them, but against the defendant, and they become liable for the amount so assessed to the extent of the penalty of their bond. But the second branch of the act of 1899 is still more to the point, and excludes any and all doubt as to what was meant. It is therein expressly provided that, if the undertaking is given, and the plaintiff recover, judgment shall be rendered against the defendant (and, of course, his sureties) for costs and damages. This is a positive and unequivocal direction that judgment for any damages sustained by the plaintiff shall be rendered, if at all, in the action brought to try the title to the office.

These amendments in regard to the method of recovering damages in such cases do not provide for a cumulative remedy, but it was intended by them to substitute the remedy by inquiry in the action brought to recover the office for the former remedy by separate action on the undertaking, which was given by section 613 of the Code; and, besides, the amendments are inconsistent with the provisions of section 613, and the latter is therefore repealed by them. The amendments provide not only a sufficient and adequate remedy for the assessment of the plaintiff's damages, but one that is more expeditious and less expensive than a civil action. We do not think there is anything in the peculiar nature of the suit, nor in the fact that it is brought in the name of the state, that renders the mode of procedure prescribed by the amendments incompatible with the object or purpose of the suit. It is now an ordinary civil action, prosecuted, it is true, in the name of the state, but in fact for the use and benefit of the relator, who is the real party in interest, or at least one of the real parties in interest; and he can assert all of his rights in the action. So far as the action affects his rights, it is private in its nature. There is no constitutional objection to the amendments of 1895 and 1899 upon the ground that the action is prosecuted in the name of the state to assert the right of one of its citizens to a public office.

Having sustained the validity of the acts of 1895 and 1899, and having shown from the wording of the acts that they require the damages to be assessed in the original action, we will now refer to some of the authorities upon the latter question. In Gold Co. v. Ore Co., 79 N. C. 48, the court, construing section 192 of the Code of Civil Procedure (now section 341 of the Code), which required the damages to be ascertained by reference or otherwise, as the judge shall direct, held that it was not contemplated that a separate action should be brought on the injunction bond, but that the damages should be assessed in the action in which the bond was given. To the same effect is Crawford v. Pearson, 116 N. C. 718, 21 S. E. 561, in which it is said the fact "that the defendant was sued alone in this action, and not his sureties on the injunction bond with him, makes no difference. The undertaking does not impose any new liability on the defendant, but simply provides an additional security. Therefore the damage which the plaintiff suffered, if any, should have been assessed in the same manner as if the sureties on the undertaking had been moved against; i. e., in the same action in which the injunction was issued." In Railroad v. Mining Co., 117 N. C. 191, 23 S. E. 181, it is held, approving the cases just cited, that when there is a final judgment against the plaintiff in the action the defendant must "then and there lodge a motion for the assessment of their damages, or else lose their remedy." But when there is an appeal the motion must be entered not at or before the time of the appeal, but, when, after the judgment of the appellate court is certified to the lower court, the latter is about to enter the final judgment, and before it is entered; otherwise the right to damages will be lost, as in the other case, where there was no appeal. It is contended that the cases of McCall v. Webb, 126 N. C. 760, 36 S. E. 174, and McCall v. Zachary, 131 N. C. 466, 42 S. E. 903, settle the principle that a separate action for the damages in cases like this may be brought, and that it is the only proper remedy. We have read and carefully considered those cases, and, so far as they do so decide, we do not think that they can be sustained. It is manifest that the court overlooked the acts of 1895 and 1899, which perhaps were not called to its attention. No reference to them is made by the court, and in the discussion of the cases the argument of the court proceeded altogether upon the idea that the action in the nature of quo warranto is of a public nature, which, we think, is erroneous. If such an action is instituted by the state alone, or by the state on the relation of a citizen to inquire into the right of another to hold a public office, the action might be said to be of a public nature; but not so where one citizen sues another for the recovery of an office, although he uses the name of the state for the purpose. The distinction is clearly drawn in High on Ext. Leg. Rem. §§ 629a, 631, and 682, and is also recognized in the Code, §§ 607-610 and 618. But the suggestion is sufficiently answered by the fact that the acts of 1895 and 1899 have distinctly provided that the damages shall be assessed in the original action, and it was clearly within the power of the Legislature so to provide.

In McCall v. Webb, 128 N. C. 760, 36 S. E. 174, it was held that the plaintiff's motions to amend the judgment and to amend the complaint were properly refused, because, as they were made after the certificate of this court had been sent to the court below, that court could not change or modify the judgment of this court; and Pearson v. Carr, 97 N. C. 194, 1 S. E. 916, and several other cases, were cited in support of the ruling. The principle stated is undoubtedly a correct one, but we do not think it had any application to that case. Those cases apply only when the action of the court below would introduce a new cause of action or new facts, and thereby unsettle the decision and final judgment of the court, and not to cases in which an order is made for the purpose only of carrying the judgment into effect. If Judge McNeill had granted the motions, he would not have changed or modified in the least the former decision of the superior court or the decision of this court. The judgment declaring McCall to be entitled to the office of solicitor would have remained unimpaired. Perhaps the proper course to pursue is to move for an inquiry at the time the judgment is first entered, and then, if there is an appeal, and the judgment is affirmed, the inquiry can be executed when the case goes back to the superior court; but, if it is reversed, the order for an inquiry, being a part of the judgment, will be set aside with it. We do not mean by this to say that the motion for an inquiry cannot be made after the judgment of this court is certified to the superior court. It may be that either course is open to the plaintiff. The ruling in McCall v. Webb, 128 N. C. 760, 36 S. E. 174, seems to be inconsistent with the decision in Railroad v. Mining Co., 117 N. C. 191, 23 S. E. 181, which we have already cited and commented upon. In view of the plain and explicit provision of the statute as contained in the acts of 1895 and 1899, we are unable to follow McCall v. Webb, 128 N. C. 760, 36 S. E. 174, and McCall v. Zachary, 181 N. C. 466, 42 S. E. 903, upon the question involved in this action. If the plaintiff was erroneously denied relief in McCall v. Webb, supra, he should have filed a petition to rehear, and, if the decision was right, he loses because he made his motions in the cause too late. In either case the judgment of the superior court in that action, which was affirmed by this court, is a final determination of all matters which the law required to be litigated in it. The judgment is conclusive, not as to all matters which might have been brought into it for litigation, but as to those which the law contemplates as actually involved in the case and presented for decision, and the cases must be thus understood. Glenn v. Wray, 128 N. C. 730, 36 S. E. 167; Williams v. Clouse, 91 N. C. 827; Wagon Co. v. Byrd, 119 N. C. 460, 26 S. E. 144. The plaintiff is concluded by the judgment in the original action of McCall v. Webb, as to all claim for damages, including the loss of fees and emoluments, upon the presumption of the law that they have either been waived by his not insisting on their recovery, or that his right thereto has been adjudicated against. In no view of the matter can this action be maintained, as a party cannot resort to a new and independent action when relief can be had by proceeding in the original cause. Clark's Code (3d Ed.) p. 855, where the numerous cases are collected. This is especially so when the law prescribes what the remedy shall be, and how it shall be enforced.

It must be certified to the superior court that there is error in its judgment, which must be set aside, and judgment entered upon the agreed statement of facts dismissing the action. Reversed.

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). The plaintiff in this action brought a civil action in the nature of quo warranto against this defendant to recover the possession of the office of solicitor in the criminal court of Buncombe county, and at August term, 1899, of the superior court of that county recovered a judgment upon the complaint and answer. The defendant appealed to this court, and the judgment was affirmed. At the term of the superior court when the certificate of the opinion and judgment of this court was received the plaintiff made two motions—the first for a reference to have ascertained the amount of fees and emoluments the defendant had received while he was wrongfully in possession of the office; and, second, for an amendment to his complaint to embrace a claim for such fees and emoluments. The motions were overruled, and upon appeal by the plaintiff to this court it was decided that there was no error in the ruling. In the meantime, on November 25, 1899, the plaintiff had commenced the present action in the superior court of Buncombe county against the same defendant Webb and the other defendants, J. E. Rankin and A. A. Featherstone, for the recovery of $857.57, which it is admitted was the amount of fees which the defendant had collected while in possession of the office of solicitor of the criminal court of Buncombe county. The defendants, in their answer, set up as a defense to the action of the plaintiff the plea of res judicata. They contend that by law the matters of complaint in the present action should have been heard and decided in the original quo warranto proceeding, and the plaintiff, not having claimed the fees and emoluments of the office in that complaint in that suit, nor made a motion to have the fees and emoluments ascertained in that action, is precluded from making such demand against the defendants in a separate action. This question, then, is presented: Is the plaintiff in a quo warranto action for the recovery of an office compelled to have the damages in the way of fees received by the intruder assessed and ascertained in the same action? Or may he recover the office in the quo warranto proceeding, and bring an action for the fees and emoluments in a separate action, if he sees fit to take that course? The answer to the question depends upon the construction of certain recent statutory law. By the terms of section 616 of the Code, actions to try the right or title to any public office are required to be tried at the return term of the summons if the complaint shall have been filed and a copy served with the summons 10 days before the return day thereof, and the judges are to expedite the trial of such actions, and give them precedence over all other actions, criminal or civil. The act of 1895, p. 105, c. 105, amended section 616 of the Code by adding these words: "The defendant, before he is permitted to answer or demur to the complaint, shall execute and file in the superior court clerk's office of the county wherein the suit is pending an undertaking with good and sufficient surety in the sum of $200, which may be increased from time to time, in the discretion of the judge, to be void upon condition that the defendant shall pay to the plaintiff all such costs and damages, including damages for the loss of such fees and emoluments as may or ought to have come into the hands of the defendant, as the plaintiff may recover in the action." (Italics ours.) The General Assembly, at its session of 1899, amended the above-mentioned act by adding to section 1 the following: "At any time after a duly certified complaint is filed alleging facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the office, whether such complaint is filed at the beginning of the action or later, the plaintiff may, upon ten days notice to the defendant or his attorney of record, move before the resident judge or the judge riding the district at chambers to require the defendant to give said undertaking; and it shall be the duty of the judge to require the defendant to give such undertaking within ten days, and if the undertaking shall not be so given the judge shall render judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the recovery of the office and the costs and judgment by default and inquiry to be executed at term for damages, including loss of fees and salary. Upon the filing of said judgment for the recovery of such office with the clerk, it shall be the duty of the clerk to issue and the sheriff to serve the necessary process to put the plaintiff into possession of the office. In case the defendant shall give the undertaking, the court, if judgment is rendered for the plaintiff, shall render judgment against the defendant and his sureties for costs and damages, including loss of fees and salary." The plaintiff in this action, after he had duly verified his complaint, twice moved before the judge of the district to have bonds according to the statutes executed by the defendant to secure the fees and emoluments of the office. The bonds were ordered, and one of them was executed by J. E. Rankin and A. A. Featherstone, defendants in this action, as sureties in the penalty of $200, and the other by Rankin as surety for $300. The condition in each of these bonds is that the bond shall be void if the makers shall pay to the plaintiff all such costs and damages, etc., as the plaintiff may recover of the defendant in this action. (Italics ours.) These bonds were drawn in exact conformity to the statutes to which we have referred; and according to the language, its clear intent and meaning, and the meaning of the statutes themselves, no damages can be recovered on the bonds in the present action. The undertaking was that the makers should be liable on the bond only for such damages as might be recovered by the plaintiff in the action in which the bonds were given. The plaintiff did not see fit in that action to claim his damages and have them assessed, but of his own motion recovered a judgment upon the pleadings for the office simply. He must have known that, so far as the bonds were concerned, if he wanted damages, he was required to recover them in that action. I, however, think that the judgment below against the defendant Webb ought to be affirmed. I am satisfied that the extraordinary benefits and remedies furnished by the statutes referred to to the plaintiff to secure to him the benefits of a recovery were intended also to afford the sureties on the bond the advantage of having that part of the action which referred to the damages which the plaintiff was entitled to recover settled speedily, and in the same action. It was for the benefit of the sureties, and not for that of the intruder, that the statute required that damages should be assessed in the quo warranto proceeding. In quo warranto proceedings, so far as the question of damages is concerned against the intruding defendant, section 613 of the Code still applies. Its language is as follows: "If judgment be rendered upon the right of the person so alleged to be entitled, in favor of such person, he may recover by action the damages which he shall sustain by reason of the usurpation by the defendant of the office from which such defendant has been excluded." That section of the Code does not require that a plaintiff in quo warranto, in his claim for damages, shall be compelled to recover them in that action. Howerton v. Tate, 70 N. C. 161. In that case it was decided also that an intruder who may perform the duties of the office and receive the fees arising therefrom cannot retain any part of the fees as a compensation for his labor. This case of course overrules that of McCall v. Zachary (a unanimous opinion of the court) 131 N. C. 466, 42 S. E. 903, so far as they are in conflict. The statutes I have referred to in this case were not so critically examined by me in that case, as they have been examined in this; and the argument for the defendant, too, before this court in the present case was more elaborate and thorough than it was in that case.

Modified and affirmed.

STATE v. PATTERSON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 1, 1904.)

INTOXICATING LIQUOR—STATUTES—TITLE OF ACT—CONSTRUCTION—SALES—PLACE OF DELIVERY—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—PLACE OF TRIAL OF AN OFFENSE.

1. Laws 1903, p. 572, c. 349, is entitled "An act to prohibit the manufacture, sale and importation of liquors in C., M. and G. counties." And section 2 declares that the place where delivery of any intoxicating liquor is made in the state shall be held to be the place of sale thereof. Held that, notwithstanding the title, section 2 of the statute applies to a sale and delivery of liquor at any place within the state.

2. Whether an enactment in a statute is general, local, public, or private is a question of law for the court.

3. Whether an enactment in a statute is general or local, public or private, is not determined by the nature of the act in which the enactment is found, nor by its publication in the public or private statutes.

4. Laws 1903, p. 572, c. 349, § 2, providing that the place where delivery of liquor is made in the state shall be construed to be the place of sale thereof, and that any place to which any person shall ship any liquor for the purpose of delivering the same to a purchaser shall be construed and held to be the place of sale, is not unconstitutional as to shipments within the state.

5. The sixth amendment to the federal Constitution, providing that in a criminal prosecution the accused shall be tried by a jury of the state and district where the crime shall have been committed, is a restriction on the federal government and courts, and not upon the states, and hence Laws 1903, p. 572, c. 349, § 2, providing that any station or place to which any person shall ship or convey any liquor for the purpose of delivery to a purchaser shall be construed to be the place of sale, is not affected by such amendment.

Douglas, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; Cooke, Judge.

J. G. Patterson was indicted for selling liquor in prohibited territory. Verdict of not guilty entered on a special verdict, and the state appeals. Reversed.

Manning & Foushee, R. B. Boone, and the Attorney General, for the State. Winston & Bryant, for defendant.

CLARK, C. J. The defendant is indicted for selling spirituous liquor to one Guess in the town of Durham, where such sale is prohibited by virtue of an election had under the provisions of chapter 233, p. 288, Laws 1903. The special verdict finds that the defendant was not a druggist, and had no license to sell spirituous liquor within the city of Durham; that he resided in Roxboro, where he had license to sell spirituous liquor; that Guess sent the defendant $2 by mail, with an order to ship said Guess at Durham one gallon of corn whisky, by express, charges prepaid, which the defendant did, and the whisky was delivered to Guess in Durham; that said Guess was not a druggist, nor was said liquor sold to him upon the prescription of a regularly practicing physician. The point presented, therefore, is whether this was a sale at Roxboro, where the liquor was delivered to the carrier by the defendant for transportation to Guess, or was it a sale at Durham, where it was received by Guess, and where such sale was prohibited by law?

Laws 1903, p. 572, c. 349, § 2, provides: "That the place where delivery of any spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented or other intoxicating liquors is made in the state of North Carolina shall be construed and held to be the place of sale thereof, and any station or other place within said state to which any person, firm, company or corporation shall ship or convey any spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented or other intoxicating liquors for the purpose of delivery or carrying the same to a purchaser, shall be construed to be the place of sale: provided this section shall not be construed to prevent the delivery of any spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented or other intoxicating liquors to druggists in sufficient quantities for medical purposes only." This section is explicit that the place of actual delivery to the buyer, or to which it shall be shipped for delivery to him, "shall be construed to be the place of sale." It is contended that this provision does not have the effect of the plain purport of the words used by the lawmaking power, because:

1. This section 2 is found in a statute entitled "An act to prohibit the manufacture, sale and importation of liquors in Cleveland, Cabarrus, Mitchell and Gaston counties." Formerly, the caption of an act was not at all considered to any extent whatever in construing it, for reasons given in State v. Woolard, 119 N. C. 779, 25 S. E. 719, but the modern doctrine is that, when the language of the statute is ambiguous, the courts can resort to the title as aid in giving such act its true meaning, but that this cannot be done when the language used is clear and unambiguous. Randall v. Railroad, 107 N. C. 748, 12 S. E. 605, 11 L. R. A. 460; Id., 104 N. C. 410, 10 S. E. 691; State v. Woolard, 119 N. C. 779, 25 S. E. 719; Freight Discrimination Cases, 95 N. C. 434, 59 Am. Rep. 250; Blue v. McDuffie, 44 N. C. 131. To like purport, in Hadden v. Collector, 5 Wall. 107, 18 L. Ed. 518, Mr. Justice Field uses the following language: "At the present date the title constitutes a part of the act, but it is still construed as only a formal part. It cannot be used to extend or to restrain any positive provisions in the body of the act." The language of section 2 is "that the place where delivery of any spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented or other intoxicating liquors is made in the state of North Carolina shall be construed and held to be the place of sale thereof. * * *" This provision is positive in its character, and its operation cannot be restrained by any reference to the title of the chapter. In the sections of chapter 349 other than sections 1 and 2 there is no reference to the place in which the act is to be operative, and hence, by reference to the title, they are to be applied only to the four counties therein named. Section 1 is specifically made operative in the counties therein named, and is to take effect at a different date, and section 2 is made operative as to the sale of any spirituous or intoxicating liquors anywhere in the state, and, as to them the title cannot be used to restrict or extend the meaning of the explicit, clear, and unambiguous language used. "It is well settled," says Ruffin, O. J., in Humphries v. Baxter, 28 N. C. 439, "that one part of a statute may be public in its nature, while another is local and private." Part of a statute may be local, and another of general application; part may be a public statute, of which the court will take judicial notice, and another part a private statute, which must be set up in the pleadings; and whether an enactment in a statute is general or local, public or private, is a question of law for the court, and is not determined by the nature of the act in which the enactment is found, nor by its publication in the public or private statutes. The decisions are uniform as to this. State v. Wallace, 94 N. C. 827; Durham v. Railroad, 108 N. C. 401, 12 S. E. 1040, 13 S. E. 1; State v. Barringer, 110 N. C. 529, 14 S. E. 781; Hancock v. Railroad, 124 N. C., at page 225, 32 S. E. 679; Potter's Dwarrit, 53.

2. It is further objected that, if the statute has this meaning, it is unconstitutional, but we are not pointed to any section of the Constitution which forbids the lawmaking power to designate the place of sale when the goods are shipped by the vendor to the vendee by a common carrier or other agency. It is true the courts have held that the place of sale is where the goods are delivered to the carrier, the latter being the agent of the vendee; thus making the constructive delivery, instead of the place of actual receipt of the goods by the purchaser, the place of sale. This rule is of comparatively modern origin, and at first was held to apply only when the vendee designated the carrier by whom the goods were to be shipped. Davies v. Peck, 8 D. & E. 330. It has not been uniformly held, and is subject to many exceptions (1 Beach, Cont. § 568; 2 Kent, Com. 499), as the right of stoppage in transitu, and other exceptions. It is merely a rule of judicial construction, which was made in the absence of legislation, and is not protected by any constitutional provision from legislative power to change it. Especially can the Legislature change such rule in the exercise of its police power over the sale of intoxicating liquors, when, as here, it can be readily seen that, with the multiplication of common carriers and the speed and ease with which intoxicating liquors can be shipped, it would be a vain thing to prohibit the sale of liquor in any designated territory, if vendors a short distance off can at will fill orders coming from within the prohibited territory upon the judicial fiction that the sale is complete upon delivery to the carrier, who is construed as the agent of the vendee. Whether it may or may not require an act of Congress to make a similar change as to liquor shipped into prohibited territory from points outside the state in no wise affects the power of the state to so provide when the shipment is from another point in the state. Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S. 412, 18 Sup. Ct. 664, 42 L. Ed. 1088. In O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U. S. 323, 12 Sup. Ct. 693, 36 L. Ed. 450, as construed by same court in Railroad v. Sims (Dec., 1903) 24 Sup. Ct. 151, 48 L. Ed. —, it seems to be held that by virtue of the police power shippers of intoxicating liquors into a state from without its borders are subject to the same restrictions as shippers from points within the state, it not being a matter of taxation upon interstate commerce. But that point is not now before us. Where one upon one side of the line of a political division, as a state or county, shoots across the line and kills a person on the other side, the courts have held that the act is committed where the shot is delivered by striking the body of the victim (State v. Hall, 114 N. C. 909, 19 S. E. 602, 28 L. R. A. 59, 41 Am. St. Rep. 822); or if he commit false pretense by a letter delivered in another state, the offense is committed in the state in which the letter is delivered (In re Sultan, 115 N. C., at page 60, 20 S. E. 375, 28 L. R. A. 294, 44 Am. St. Rep. 433). A statute modifying the latter rule was sustained in State v. Caldwell, 115 N. C., at page 800, 20 S. E. 523; and in Com. v. Macloon, 101 Mass. 1, 100 Am. Dec. 89, in which Gray, J., said that the statute rested upon the general power of the Legislature to declare any willful or negligent act which causes an injury to persons or property in its territory to be a crime. The General Assembly has authorized the people of Durham to hold an election by virtue of which it is deemed injurious to sell intoxicating liquors in the limits of Durham, and by virtue of such exercise of the police power, and to make it effective, it is further enacted that the sale shall be deemed made in Durham (or elsewhere in this state) upon the delivery there of the injurious article to the buyer, just as in the case of a shot fired across the line, or a letter or poison so sent by the mail or other agency.

It was suggested on the argument, though the point is not made in the record, that the statute contravenes the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution, which provides that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall be tried by a jury of the state and district where the crime shall have been committed. But aside from the fact that the law has construed the crime to be committed in Durham, where the forbidden article was actually delivered, instead of at Roxboro, where it was only constructively delivered, it is well known that the first 10 amendments were all passed as restrictions upon the federal government and courts, and as a concession to states which reluctantly and hesitatingly had entered into the Union upon a pledge that such amendments should be submitted. That these amendments are restrictions upon the federal government, and not upon the states, has been uniformly held in the United States Supreme Court. State v. Caldwell, 115 N. C., at page 803, 20 S. E. 523, and cases there cited; Fox v. Ohio, 5 How. 410, 12 L. Ed. 213; Cook v. U. S., 138 U. S. 157, 11 Sup. Ct. 268, 34 L. Ed. 906; Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243, 8 L. Ed. 672; Spies v. Ill., 123 U. S. 131, 8 Sup. Ct. 21, 22, 31 L. Ed. 80; and there are numerous others. Twitchell v. Com., 7 Wall. 321, 19 L. Ed. 223; 2 Tucker, Cons. § 325, and cases collected in 8 Rose's Notes, 368-372. In Barron v. Baltimore, supra, Marshall, C. J., referring to the first 11 amendments, said: "These amendments contain no expression indicating an intention to apply them to the state governments. This court cannot so apply them." Upon the special verdict the defendant should be adjudged guilty.

Reversed.

DOUGLAS, J. (dissenting). Regardless of any personal predilections, I am forced to dissent from the decision of the court as a pure matter of law. It is impossible for me by any process of reasoning to bring my mind to the conclusion that the Legislature had a legal intention of doing something that I am morally certain never entered their minds. It is a matter of common knowledge, borne out by the legislative journals and published laws, that the Legislature, after most careful consideration, enacted a general act intended to reduce the regulation of the whisky traffic throughout the state to a uniform system, as far as possible. In framing this act two bills were earnestly pressed by their respective supporters—the Watts bill, which was substantially adopted, and the London bill, which was ably drawn, and expressed in clear and exact language the purposes of its distinguished author. These bills represented distinct schools of thought, and the adoption of one over the other was an unmistakable expression of legislative preference. At the same term at which the Legislature passed the general act and the act now held by the court to be amendatory to the general act, it also passed 25 or 30 other acts relating to the same general subject. These acts profess to be local, like the act now construed by the court as general in its operation, and, with four exceptions, are likewise printed in the public laws. Can we suppose that the Legislature intended every section in every one of these numerous acts to operate as an amendment to the general act unless specifically restricted in each section? If one of them can have such an effect, why should not the others? If that were so, what would become of the general act, and what hope would there be of extricating the law from the hopeless confusion that would result? Oliver Cromwell denounced the laws of England in his time as "a tortuous and ungodly jumble." If the great protector were brought face to face with our liquor laws, including the general act, with all the amendments constructively adhering thereto, and the infinite variety of municipal ordinances passed thereunder, I fear that words would fail him. But it may be asked, what other construction is open to us? The answer seems simple enough to me: construe those statutes to be general which on their face profess to be general, and those to be special which are avowedly special. Of course, I am now alluding to conflicting statutes passed at the same session of the Legislature, and in pari materia. Where there is neither conflict nor ambiguity in the statute, there is no room for interpretation. The act containing the section which the court now says is general in its application is specifically entitled "An act to prohibit the manufacture, sale and importation of liquors in Cleveland, Cabarrus, Mitchell, and Gaston counties." I know that it has been said that the caption or title is no part of the act. This was so originally because in England all acts of Parliament passed at the same session were considered as one act. The separate acts had no captions when passed, and hence the captions were not the words of Parliament, but of the speaker or some parliamentary clerk, who subsequently added them thereto. But now, since the title has become a part of the act as passed by the Legislature itself, the rule is necessarily different. Indeed, the title has become so essential a part of the act that it is sometimes taken as the act itself. Section 23 of article 2 of the Constitution provides that: "All bills and resolutions of a legislative character shall be read three times in each House, before they pass into laws." It is a well-known fact that bills are rarely ever read in full except on the second reading, if then; and that they are habitually "read by title" on both the other readings. If the Legislature did not consider the title as an essential part of the bill, giving substantial notice of its contents, would not such habitual action be a flagrant violation of the Constitution?

I have said that these acts are in pari materia, being passed by the same Legislature, at the same session, and upon the same general subject-matter. They should therefore be construed together, so as to preserve them both as complete and effective acts, each operating within its own sphere of action. 26 A. & E. Enc. (2d Ed.) 620 et seq., and cases cited therein; Black, Int. Laws, § 86; Sedgwick, Stat. & Const. Law, 247; Endlich on Int. of Stats. §§ 43, 44, 45, 56; State v. Bell, 25 N. C. 506; Simonton v. Lanier, 71 N. C. 498; Rhodes v. Lewis, 80 N. C. 136; Bowles v. Cochran, 93 N. C. 398; Wortham v. Basket, 99 N. C. 70, 5 S. E. 401; Willson v. Jordan, 124 N. C. 683, 33 N. E. 139. I do not feel that any legal principle forces me to impose such a constructive intent upon the Legislature, and I feel sure that no such intent existed in fact. Custom permits the writer of a dissenting opinion to allude to known facts outside the record. In the light of such facts it will hardly be contended that the Legislature actually intended the act in question to apply to any counties other than those mentioned in its title. I understand that the author of the bill disclaims any such general application, and I am informed on the highest authority that when the bill was read in the Senate it was distinctly asked and positively answered that it did not apply to any counties other than those named therein. Upon that assurance it was passed.

It is not for me to discuss the merits of the act, but, in answer to a suggestion in the opinion of the court, I may say that the practical effect of the section is not so much to restrict the traffic as to force it into the hands of nonresidents who can carry it on with impunity. All that the present defendant has to do is to "move a little further from the road," over into the state of Virginia, and continue his business. But this does not influence me in my view of the law. As to the moral effect of a statute not resting upon the will of the people, I may be permitted to express my doubts. After years of faithful devotion to the cause of temperance, I am satisfied that it can never rest upon a legal fiction, and that no great moral question ever made any permanent advancement along the pathway of indirection.

OSBORN v. LEACH et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 27, 1904.)

LIBEL—MATTERS LIBELOUS PER SE—BURDEN OF PROOF — STATUTES—RETRACTION—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—ACTION—FAILURE TO ALLEGE NOTICE—DEMURRER—DISMISSAL.

1. A publication to the effect that plaintiff bought for the State's Prison, of which he was a director, a number of mules, paying an excessive price for them, and that he received for his services a specified sum for each mule bought, as a commission, when by statute he was only entitled to $4 a day as compensation for director, was libelous per se.

2. In an action for the publication of matter libelous per se, the burden is on defendant to prove the truth in mitigation.

3. Const. art. 1, § 35, declares that all courts shall be open, and that every person shall have, for an injury in his lands, goods, person, or reputation, a remedy by due course of law; and section 20 declares that the freedom of the press ought not to be restricted, but that every individual shall be held responsible for the abuse of the same. The London libel law (Laws 1901, p. 784, c. 557, § 1) provides that, before any proceedings shall be brought for the publication in a periodical or newspaper of a libel, the plaintiff shall serve a written notice on defendant, specifying the article and the statements which he alleges to be false, and that if it appears on trial that the article was published in good faith, that its falsity was due to an honest mistake in fact, and that there were reasonable grounds for believing that the article was true, and that within 10 days after the serving of notice a fair and full retraction was published, the plaintiff shall recover only actual damages. Held, that the statute is not unconstitutional, since "actual damages" include all save punitive damages, which are not property. ||←

4. The question, under the statute, whether defendant in an action for libel exercised good faith, made an honest mistake, and had reasonable ground for believing the publication true, is an affirmative defense.

5. The question, under the statute, whether defendant in an action for libel exercised good faith, made an honest mistake, and had reasonable ground for believing the publication true, is a question for the jury.

6. Inasmuch as the statute applies in its terms equally to all newspapers and periodicals, it does not amount to an unconstitutional discrimination.

7. In an action against a periodical for libel, it is ground for demurrer that it does not appear that the statutory notice was given defendant.

8. Where, in an action against a periodical for libel, defendant demurs on the ground that it does not appear that the statutory notice was given it, and the demurrer is sustained, the court may, in its discretion, permit the complaint to be amended by alleging such notice, if in fact it was given.

9. An action against a periodical for libel will not be dismissed because the statutory notice was not given defendant, since, even if it were not given, the action is still valid for the recovery of actual damages.

10. In an action against a periodical for libel, the fact that plaintiff failed to give the statutory notice could not affect the defendant prejudicially, where it appeared that defendant actually made a retraction.

Douglas, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Action by W. H. Osborn against M. T. Leach and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

King & Kimball, J. T. Morehead, and T. M. Argo, for appellant. J. A. Barringer, Armistead, Jones & Son, and Brooks & Thompson, for respondent Leach. Busbee & Busbee, for respondent News & Observer Pub. Co.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action for libel against M. T. Leach and the News & Observer Publishing Company. Judgment by default for want of an answer and inquiry had been taken against the defendant Leach. 132 N. C. 1149, 45 S. E. 1037; 133 N. C. 427, 45 S. E. 783. In the trial upon the merits, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the defendant Leach moved to dismiss "upon the ground that the newspaper article alleged to be libelous was not libelous, and that the plaintiff had not alleged a cause of action." The court, being of that opinion, instructed the jury, on account of the judgment by default and inquiry, to return a verdict of one penny as to Leach, and thereupon rendered a judgment against him for one penny damages and one penny costs. Code, § 525 (4). In this there was error. The publication inspired by the defendant Leach charges that the plaintiff bought for the State's Prison, of which he was a director, certain mules, giving $27 per head more than they were worth, and paying for horses double what they were worth, thus defrauding the State's Prison of that sum; and charging further that the plaintiff received for his services $5 for each mule bought, as commissions, his expenses, and several hundred dollars for his time, when, as director, by law he was entitled to $4 per day only (Laws 1899, p. 119, c. 24, §§ 4, 9, 10), and that he committed a fraud upon Leach; thus charging a breach of official duty by the plaintiff as director of a state institution, and incompetence, if not worse, in the purchase of the mules and horses, and the receipt of pay in excess of that allowed by law. This language was libelous per se (Ramsey v. Cheek, 109 N. C. 270, 13 S. E. 775), and the burden was upon the defendant to prove its truth or matter in mitigation.

As to the other defendant, the News & Observer Publishing Company, the court allowed the motion made to dismiss upon the grounds (1) that the plaintiff had not given it the notice required by chapter 557, p. 784, Laws 1901; (2) that the plaintiff had not made out a case against it; and (3) upon the further ground that the plaintiff's counsel admitted in open court that the plaintiff had not sustained, and did not claim, any special damage. The second ground is disposed of by what is said above. The article was not copied from any paper which had then been filed in any legal proceeding, but was an oral statement by the defendant Leach to the reporter of the News & Observer of what he intended to file. The burden was upon the defendant publishing company to prove the truth of the publication, or to prove the absence of malice.

The other two points raise the question of the constitutionality of chapter 557, p. 784, Laws 1901, commonly known as the "London Libel Law." That statute has been adopted in several states in almost the identical words of our statute. It has been already presented in the Supreme Court of two of our sister states, and has been held to be unconstitutional in both, but because of the addition of words restricting "actual damages" to mean special damages, which words are omitted in our statute.

The Constitution of North Carolina provides: "All courts shall be open, and every person for an injury in his lands, goods, person, or reputation, shall have remedy by due course of law." Article 1, § 85. "The freedom of the press ought not to be restrained, but every individual shall be held responsible for the abuse of the same." Article 1, § 20. If, therefore, this chapter impairs the right of any one to recover for an injury to his reputation, or abridges the responsibility of the press for an abuse of the freedom of the press, the Legislature is clearly forbidden by the above sections of the Constitution from the enactment of such statute.

Section 1, c. 557, p. 784, Laws 1901, is as follows: "Before any proceedings, either civil or criminal, shall be brought for the publication in a newspaper or periodical in this state of a libel, the plaintiff or prosecutor shall at least five days before instituting such proceedings serve notice in writing on defendant or defendants, specifying the article and the statements which he alleges to be false and defamatory. If it shall appear upon the trial that said article was published in good faith, that its falsity was due to an honest mistake of the facts, and that there were reasonable grounds for believing that the statements in said article were true, and that within ten days after the service of said notice a full and fair correction, apology and retraction were published in the same editions of corresponding issues of the newspaper or periodical in which said article appeared, and in as conspicuous place and type as was said original article, then the plaintiff in such case, if a civil action, shall recover only actual damages, and if in a criminal proceeding, a verdict of guilty shall be rendered on such a state of facts, the defendant or defendants shall be fined a penny and costs and no more: provided this act shall not apply to existing suits." It must be noted that there is no penalty on the plaintiff, nor any exemption to the defendant, if the plaintiff does not choose to give the five-days notice, but there is merely a provision that five days' notice must be given by the plaintiff, in the manner stated, before issuing his summons, and that, when such notice is given, then, if within 10 days the specified retraction is made, and it appears that the article was printed in good faith by honest mistake, and with reasonable ground to believe the statements to be true, the plaintiff can only recover actual damages. It was therefore error in the court to nonsuit the plaintiff, because good faith, honest mistake, and reasonable ground of belief were affirmative defenses, which the court could not adjudge. But independently of that, as the argument raises the constitutionality of the act, it is well to dispose of it.

The plaintiff is entitled to recover actual damages under the act of 1901, and actual are compensatory damages, and include (1) pecuniary loss, direct or indirect, or special damages; (2) damages for physical pain and inconvenience; (3) damages for mental suffering; and (4) damages for injury to reputation. Punitive damages are not included in what are termed actual or compensatory damages, and the act, upon the conditions therein specified, relieves and can relieve a defendant only against a claim for that particular kind of damages. They are awarded on grounds of public policy, and not because the plaintiff has a right to the money, but it goes to him merely because it is assessed in his suit. 18 Am. & Eng. Law (2d Ed.) 1091; Wallace v. Railway, 104 N. C. 452, 10 S. E. 552. The right to have punitive damages assessed is therefore not property. The right to recover actual or compensatory damages is property. In our case the law presumes injury to the feelings, mental anguish, and injury to the reputation, the publication being libelous per se. The evidence of the plaintiff, besides, proves both these elements, and also physical suffering. There is no evidence of special damages, and it is not inferred. The plaintiff is entitled to recover compensation for mental and physical pain and injury to reputation. These are actual damages, and these are property. "The right to recover damages for an injury is a species of property, and vests in the injured party immediately on the commission of the wrong. It is not the subsequent verdict and judgment, but the commission of the wrong, that gives the right. The verdict and judgment simply define its extent. Being property, it is protected by the ordinary constitutional guarantees." Hale on Damages, p. 2, note 5; Cooley, Const. Lim. (5th Ed.) 445. It cannot be extinguished except by act of the parties or by operation of the statute of limitation. Ib. This being an action upon a libel per se, the plaintiff has a right to recover compensatory damages. Newell on S. & L. 43; Hale on Damages, p. 90, note. Compensatory damages include all other damages than punitive, thus embracing not only special damages, as direct pecuniary loss, but injury to feelings, mental anguish, and damages to character or reputation. 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 1082 et seq.; Hale on Damages, pp. 90, 108. "Actual damages" are synonymous with "compensatory damages" and with "general damages." Newell on S. & L. 839; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 1081 et seq. Damages for mental suffering are actual or compensatory, not special nor punitive, and are given to indemnify the plaintiff for the injury suffered. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 802. The law infers actual or compensatory damages for injury to the feelings and reputation of the plaintiff from a libel calculated to humiliate him or injure his reputation or character. In similar statutes adopted in other states the following words were added, which are wisely omitted in our statute, i. e., that actual damages shall mean only "such damages as the plaintiff has suffered in respect to his property, business, trade, profession or occupation." And on account of the inclusion of those words, which restrict actual damages to mean special damages, the act has been held unconstitutional in most conclusive opinions by very able courts, both in Kansas and Michigan. In a recent opinion (Hanson v. Krehbiel, 75 Pac. 1041), filed March 12, 1904, the Supreme Court of Kansas, passing upon the constitutionality of chapter 249, p. 439, Laws 1901, of that state, which is verbatim our libel law (chapter 557, p. 784, Laws 1901), save the addition in that statute of the definition of actual damages, as above stated, holds that the statute is unconstitutional because in violation of section 18 of the Kansas Bill of Rights, which gives to all persons injured in person, reputation, or property remedy by due course of law; such constitutional guaranty being almost identical with the above-cited section 85, art. 1, of the Constitution of North Carolina. The Supreme Court of Kansas says: "It will be noted that the questioned statute limits the right of recovery in cases of libel to actual damages, where, after service of notice provided in the first section, the publisher of the newspaper in which the libelous matter has appeared shall make a full and fair retraction of the libelous matter, coupled with a showing upon the trial that the same was published in good faith, under a misapprehension of the facts, and defines that class of damages to be such as the plaintiff has suffered in respect to his property, business, trade, profession, or occupation. So that in such cases the libeled party may not recover all his damage, but he is confined to the narrow class designated and defined in the act as actual damages. The common law recognizes two classes of damages in libel cases—general and special. General damages are those which the law presumes must naturally, proximately, and necessarily result from the publication of the libelous matter. They arise by inference of law, and are not required to be proved by evidence. They are allowable whenever the immediate tendency of the words is to impair the plaintiff's reputation, although no actual pecuniary loss had in fact resulted, and are designed to compensate for that large and substantial class of injuries arising from injured feelings, mental suffering and anguish, and personal and public humiliation, consequent upon the malicious publication of the false and libelous matter. The injury for which this class of damages is allowed is something more than merely speculative. While not susceptible of being accurately measured in dollars and cents, it is a real one, and more often than otherwise more substantial and real than those designated as actual, and measured accurately by the dollar standard. In short, it is such an injury to the reputation as was contemplated in the Bill of Rights. The law presumes that this class of injuries resulted necessarily from the publication of the libelous matter, and the damages therefore were recoverable without special assignment. Special damages were also recoverable, when properly pleaded and shown, and were such damages as were computable in money, and may be said to be fairly embraced in the list of actual damages as given in the statute referred to. This was the condition of the law at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, and is now, and all these are the injuries to reputation for which it provided that there should be 'remedy by due course of law.' It requires no argument to demonstrate that the act in question does deny remedy for a portion of these injuries. Unless the one libeled has suffered in the particular manner pointed out in the statute, he is remediless. For that other large class of persons, and still larger class of injuries, no remedy is found. From the writings of the world's wisest man we have the assurance 'that a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches.' Yet the possessor of this thing of greatest value, being despoiled of it, is left entirely without remedy for its loss, by the statute in question, except in such rare cases as he shall be able to show some exact financial injury in the particulars named. We could not excuse ourselves for holding that reputation is less valuable than property, or that it is less protected from spoliation by the quoted provision of the Bill of Rights. It is suggested, however, that the retraction required by the act to be published is a fair compensation for the injury done, and a re-investment of the libeled one with his good name. This being done, all has been accomplished that would be by a verdict of a jury, and hence that the retraction required by the legislative enactment is, if not 'due course of law,' an ample substitute for it. It is not an easy task to deduce either from reason or the authorities a satisfactory definition of 'law of the land' or 'due course of law.' We feel safe, however, from either standpoint, in saying these terms do not mean any act that the Legislature may have passed, if such act does not give to one opportunity to be heard before being deprived of property, liberty, or reputation, or, having been deprived of either, does not afford a like opportunity of showing the extent of his injury, and give an adequate remedy to recover therefor. Whatever these terms may mean more than this, they do mean due and orderly procedure of courts in the ascertainment of damages for injury, to the end that the injured one 'shall have remedy'; that is, proper and adequate remedy, thus to be ascertained. To refuse hearing and remedy for an injury after its infliction is a small remove from infliction of penalty before and without hearing." It further says: "The retraction required by the act in question may or may not be full reparation for the injury suffered. It might the rather aggravate the injury already inflicted, than mollify it. It is sufficient to say, however, that all these are questions for the courts, upon proper notice to all parties, and may not be determined arbitrarily by an act of the Legislature. * * * It is claimed that, admitting the constitutional invalidity of this act, because it denies remedy by due course of law, still the Legislature would have a right to require the service of this notice as a step in the procedure in prosecuting an action for the recovery of damages occasioned by libel; this in order to give the publisher opportunity of retraction for the purpose of mitigating general damages and relieving himself from punitive damages. We do not deny that the Legislature might do this. It seems to us, however, that such was not its purpose and object, but, rather, that the service of this notice was but a step in the procedure to relieve publishers from all general damages. That object being found unconstitutional, these ancillary matters must go with it." We have thus copied at some length the discussion of an almost identical statute by the very able Supreme Court of our sister state because of the clearness and vigor with which it presents our own views upon the subject.

The Supreme Court of Michigan also holds a similar statute unconstitutional (Park v. Detroit Free Press, 72 Mich. 560, 40 N. W. 731, 1 L. R. A. 599, 16 Am. St. Rep. 540), saying: "We do not think the statute controls the action or is within the power of constitutional legislation. This will, in our judgment, appear from a statement of its effect if carried out. It purports to confine recovery in such cases against newspapers to what it calls 'actual damages,' and then defines actual damages to cover only direct pecuniary loss in certain specified ways, and none other. In some of these defined cases the proof of any damages in this sense would be impracticable, and in all it would be very difficult. They are confined to damages in respect to property, business, trade, profession, or occupation. It is safe to say that such losses cannot be the true damage in a very large share of the worst cases of libel.

A woman who is slandered in her chastity is, under this law, usually without any redress whatever. A man whose income is from fixed investment or salary or official emolument, or business not depending upon his repute, could lose no money directly unless removed from the title to receive his income by reason of the libel, which could seldom happen. If contradicted soon, there could be practically no risk of this. And the same is true concerning most business losses. The cases must be very rare in which a libel will destroy business profits in such a way that the loss can be directly traced to the mischief. There could never be any loss when employers or customers know or believe the charge is unfounded. The statute does not reach cases where a libel has operated to cut off chances of office or employment in the future, or broken up or prevented relationships not capable of an exact money standard, or produced that intangible but fatal influence which suspicion, helped by ill will, spreads beyond recall or reach by apology or retraction. Exploded lies are continually reproduced without the antidote, and no one can measure with any accurate standard the precise amount of evil done or probable. There is no room for holding, in a constitutional system, that private reputation is any more subject to be removed by statute from full legal protection than life, liberty, or property. It is one of those rights necessary to human society that underlie the whole social scheme of civilization. It is a thing which is more easily injured than restored, and where injury is capable of infinite mischief." This case has subsequently been approved by the same court in McGee v. Baumgartner, 121 Mich. 287, 80 N. W. 21, where the court holds that "the right to recover in an action of libel for damages to reputation cannot be abridged by statute."

These decisions were by unanimous courts. A contrary view was expressed, but by a divided court, in Allen v. Pioneer Press, 40 Minn. 117, 41 N. W. 936, 3 L. R. A. 532, 12 Am. St. Rep. 707, based mainly upon the reasoning that the retraction, being required, as it is, to be published as widely and to substantially the same readers, is usually a more complete redress than would be a judgment for damages. But as the Kansas Supreme Court, ut supra, well observes, this may or may not be true, and, even if true, it is not "remedy by due course of law," which section 35, art. 1, guarantees that every person shall have, through the courts, "for an injury to his lands, goods, person or reputation." He is entitled, of constitutional right, to have such injury determined, and the amount of just compensation for his wrong settled by a jury of his peers. He cannot be deprived of this by a legislative adjudication beforehand that a retraction by the newspaper is full compensation for the injury he has suffered. And even in that case (Allen v. Pioneer Press) a new trial was granted because the question of good faith should have been submitted to the jury.

It was therefore error in the court below to sustain the third ground of the motion, which construed the statute as restricting the recovery to special damages. Those words are not in our statute, and, if they were, the statute would be unconstitutional, as we have seen. Besides, as above stated, whether the publication was made in good faith, honest mistake, and with reasonable ground of belief—the conditions which, taken with the retraction, would relieve from punitive damages—is an affirmative defense, to be found by the jury upon the evidence. It was error for the court to find it.

The provision for retraction, construed according to its palpable meaning, as affording opportunity to escape punitive damages only, and when there was good faith, honest mistake, and reasonable ground of belief before publication, is an appropriate remedy, in its terms, for newspapers and periodicals, and could not well apply to others. It applies equally to all newspapers and periodicals, and we do not think it a discrimination forbidden by the Constitution.

The only remaining question is whether the court was justified in dismissing the action upon the first ground in the motion of the defendant The News & Observer Publishing Company for failure to give the five-days notice required before bringing an action of this nature. Such failure was held to be ground for demurrer in Williams v. Smith (at this term) 46 S. E. 502. The giving of such notice is required only for the purpose of furnishing the defendant opportunity to publish a retraction, the effect of which, as we have seen, could extend no further than to relieve from punitive damages, even when good faith, honest mistake, and reasonable ground of relief are shown by the defendant. When such demurrer is sustained, the action should not be dismissed, but the court can still permit, in its discretion, the plaintiff to amend the complaint by averring such notice, if it was in fact given; and, if it was not, the action is still valid for the recovery of actual damages—i. e., of all except punitive damages—and it would be error to dismiss it. In this case, failure to give the five-days notice in no wise could affect the defendant, for the additional reason that it actually did make the retraction, to afford the opportunity of doing which is the only reason for requiring the notice.

For the reasons given there must be, as to both defendants, a new trial.

DOUGLAS, J. (concurring in the result). While concurring in the result, I feel constrained to say that, in my opinion, the so-called libel act is unconstitutional, inasmuch as it discriminates between the editor of a newspaper and the ordinary citizen. If I write a letter libeling an editor, that perhaps, at most, 10 people may see, and he libels me by printing identical charges against me that 10,000 people may see, I am subject to pains and penalties from which he is exempted by operation of the statute. Whatever other merits the act may have, I do not think that such discrimination can be sustained under the explicit provision of our Constitution. It is, however, due to the court to say that its opinion eliminates from the act its most dangerous features.

CONNOR, J., did not sit on hearing of this case.

WESTFELDT et al. v. ADAMS et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 27, 1904.)

EJECTMENT — EVIDENCE — HEARSAY — DECLARATIONS — INSTRUCTIONS — ERROR — SUPREME COURT RULE — CONSTRUCTION — DEED — ACKNOWLEDGMENT — SEAL — STATUTE.

1. Battle's Revisal, c. 35, § 14, providing that conveyances of land by a married woman must be jointly executed with her husband, and that proof or acknowledgment shall be before the probate judge, and requiring the judge, when the land is in another county than that of his residence, to affix his seal of office to the certificate, has no application to the deed of an unmarried man.

2. In an action to recover possession of land located on a certain ridge defendants introduced one H., who testified that the entries for the defendants' lands had been made by M. in his (H.'s) name, and that he (H.) had no interest in them. Another witness testified that his father, who was dead at the time of the trial, told him, when witness was a boy, the names of ridges in their view, while they were standing in the vicinity of the land in question, and showed the witness what was declared to be the ridge on which the land was located, and on that occasion spoke of the tract of land in dispute as lying on the ridge which was about 2½ miles long. Held, that it was proper to reject as hearsay further testimony of the witness to the effect that his father then pointed in the direction of the lands in controversy, and said the reason he did not enter them was that they were covered by older grants, the H. or M. lands, or the H. and M. lands, which, the witness said, he did not remember, and, further, that he did not know which H. his father referred to, nor where the lands were.

3. The compensation received by a surveyor for making a survey of land involved in an action to recover possession thereof is not such a disqualifying interest as to render proof of a declaration by the surveyor as to the boundary incompetent.

4. Where the testimony of a witness in ejectment was admitted to contradict another witness, it was error to refer to the testimony of the impeaching witness in reciting to the jury the evidence for the party introducing the witness without calling their attention to the fact that the testimony was only to impeach the testimony of the other witness, though, when the testimony of the impeaching witness was received, the court told the jury they could only consider it for the purpose of contradicting the witness impeached.

5. Amended Sup. Ct. Rule 27 (46 S. E. 111), providing that when testimony is admitted, not as substantive evidence, but in corroboration or contradiction, and that fact is stated by the court when it is admitted, it will not be ground for exception that the judge fails in his charge to again instruct the jury specially on the nature of such evidence, unless his attention is called to the matter by a prayer for instruction, has no application to a case where the judge afterwards in his charge marshals evidence along with substantive evidence in the case without again calling the attention of the jury to its nature.

Appeal from Superior Court, Haywood County; Hoke, Judge.

Action by G. R. Westfeldt and others against W. S. Adams and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Shepherd & Shepherd, Jos. J. Hooker, Moore & Rollins, and Merrimon & Merrimon, for appellants. F. A. Sondley and Julius C. Martin, for appellees.

MONTGOMERY, J. This case was before this court at its August term, 1902, and is reported in 131 N. C. 379, 42 S. E. 823. It is an action in the nature of ejectment. Several of the most important questions raised by the defendants' appeal on the former hearing and decided against them are before us again on the present appeal of the defendants. The plaintiffs, to make good their allegation of title to the land described in the complaint, introduced in evidence a grant from the state to E. H. Cunningham, dated April 28, 1860, and numbered 2,325; a duly certified copy of a proceeding in voluntary bankruptcy of Cunningham, and a deed from F. S. H. Reynolds, assignee of the estate of Cunningham, bankrupt, to George Westfeldt, dated April 24, 1869, registered in Swain county September 16, 1881, for the land covered by the grant numbered 2,325. That deed was without a seal. In their answer the defendants denied that the plaintiffs were owners of the land, and in further defense they averred that, if the grant from the state to Cunningham embraced the land described therein, yet that the defendants were the owners of two tracts of land of 100 acres each, situated within the boundaries of the land described in the grant of the state to Cunningham. That claim of the defendants rested, as they averred, upon two state grants, No. 1,545 and No. 1,546, of prior date to that of the grant to Cunningham, to William R. and John McDowell, respectively. The defendants in their first appeal struck at the deed from Reynolds, the assignee in bankruptcy, to Westfeldt, contending that it was void because neither the official nor private seal of Reynolds was attached to his signature, and the same question is raised on the present appeal.

The court, in its former decision, recognized the rule of law that a plaintiff might recover in an action of ejectment upon an equitable title, and also recognized the rule of practice that, where it was necessary to establish equitable ownership by extrinsic testimony, the facts and circumstances should be particularly set out in the complaint. But the court there held that in cases where the naked legal title was outstanding in another, or where, upon the face of the record evidence introduced on the trial, a court of competent jurisdiction would, in an ex parte proceeding, and as a matter of course, order the correction of a mere formal defect in a deed, for instance, it is not necessary to set forth the particular facts constituting the equity in the proceedings; and the court cited Geer v. Geer, 100 N. C. 679, 14 S. E. 297, on that point. The defendants did not except to that proposition of law or to that rule of practice, but contended then, and contend now, that the deed from Reynolds, the assignee in bankruptcy, to Westfeldt, does not fall within the principle decided in Geer v. Geer. In the case as first reported we decided that it did, and we refer to the reasons for our decision to those given in the case as formerly reported. In addition, we will say that the proceedings in bankruptcy under the act of 1867 were conducted through the several United States District Courts. The assignee, by virtue of his election or appointment, was vested with the title and right of possession of the property, real or personal, of a bankrupt. The assignee was also authorized by the law to make sale of the property of a bankrupt, the proceeds to be distributed among his creditors. Reynolds, the assignee, sold the land to Westfeldt, received the purchase money, and the same was distributed as by law required. In executing the deed to the purchaser the assignee omitted to affix his seal. Can there be a doubt that a judge presiding over the court under whose jurisdiction proceedings in bankruptcy were conducted would hesitate for a moment to order a commissioner to execute a deed to the purchaser in cases where the assignee was dead or had discharged his duties and closed his trust? We think not. In the former appeal, the defendant contended that the probate of the deed from Reynolds, assignee, to Westfeldt, was fatally defective, in that it was had before the judge of probate of Buncombe county, the land being situated in the county of Macon, afterwards in the new county of Swain (formed in 1871—Pub. Laws 1870-71, p. 155, c. 94), and the signature of the probate judge not being attested by the seal of his office or by his private seal. The court there held neither at the time of the probate of the deed—May, 1860—nor when it was registered in Swain county on September 16, 1881, did the law require the certificate of the probate judge to be attested by the seal of the probate officer, and the Acts of 1868-69, p. 134, c. 64, and Battle's Revisal, c. 35, § 5, were referred to. But the defendants now insist that the court made a mistake in the former opinion in its citation of chapter 64, p. 134, of the Acts of 1868-69, and refer us to chapter 277, p. 653, of the same session, ratified a month later than chapter 64. The defendants contend that the last-mentioned act, in full effect when the probate of the deed was had before the judge of probate of Buncombe county, required the official seal of that officer to be affixed to the probate. We knew at the time of the former decision in this case, as we know now, that chapter 277, p. 653, of the Acts of 1868-69, brought forward in Battle's Revisal, c. 35, § 14, referred to the probate of deeds only where the right, title, and interests of married women were concerned and attempted to be conveyed. Those acts did not affect the deeds of unmarried men.

The defendants, in undertaking to locate the grants 1,545 and 1,546, under which they claimed, introduced many witnesses whose evidence tended to prove that the lands embraced in those grants were situated on Little Fork ridge, and there was a contention between the plaintiffs and the defendants as to where Little Fork ridge was; the defendants contending and introducing much evidence to show that it lay in the Smoky Mountains, between Sugar Fork creek and Haw Gap creek, and that it occupied all the space between those two streams, running down to the water's edge on both sides, and extending back in a northerly direction to and connecting with what is known as "Jenkins' Trail Ridge." The defendants introduced evidence to show that a mountain oak, the beginning corner of one of their grants, stood upon this Little Fork ridge, as claimed by them. The plaintiffs introduced evidence tending to show that Little Fork ridge was located two or three miles northwest of the ridge as it is located and claimed by the defendants, and that it divided Eagle creek from Paw Paw creek, and undertook to show that there was a mountain oak marked as a beginning corner on the ridge claimed by them to be Little Fork ridge. To show that Little Fork ridge was located where the defendants claimed it to be, his honor allowed a witness for the defendants—Joel Crisp—to testify that when he was a boy 14 or 15 years old his father, who was dead at the time of the trial, had told him, while they were standing on the east side of Haw Gap creek, the names of the ridges, creeks, and streams, and showed him the edge between Sugar Fork and Haw Gap creeks, and that his father said that ridge was Little Fork ridge. The witness was then asked by the defendants if on that occasion his father had spoken to him of a tract of land called by the name of "Hill" or "Munday" land lying on Little Fork ridge. The witness answered "Yes," and then in that connection the counsel for the defendants submitted to the court in writing that they proposed to show by this witness that the father then pointed right in the direction of the land in controversy, and said, "The reason I did not enter those lands was that they were covered by older grants, the Hill or Munday lands, or the Hill and Munday lands"—which one, the witness said, he did not remember. The witness further said that the ridge to which his father pointed was about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles long and the witness did not know which Hill his father referred to, nor where the lands were. Johnathan Hill, introduced by the defendants, had testified that the entries for the two tracts of land described in the defendants' grants had been made by Munday in his (Hill's) name, and that he (Hill) had no interest in them. His honor refused to allow the witness Crisp to testify to what his father had said, when he was pointing toward Little Fork ridge. It was proper in his honor to admit the testimony of Crisp as to the location of Little Fork ridge. It was most natural evidence for the defendants, because it bore directly on the question of the location of their grants, and because the plaintiffs had introduced evidence the tendency of which was to show that the land claimed by the defendants was away and out of the neighborhood of Little Fork ridge as claimed by the defendants. But the attempt of the defendants to show the boundaries and the location of a tract of land by the hearsay evidence of a disinterested and deceased person, who had pointed in the direction of lands in the distance, and said that he did not survey or enter those lands because they had been entered by some one else, is altogether another matter. We are of the opinion that his honor ruled correctly in holding that the evidence was incompetent, and in refusing to receive it. The defendants, in their brief, insist that the evidence was as competent as that of Francks, who on the former trial was allowed to testify that his deceased father had told him about the beginning corner of a tract of land while they were 25 miles from the land, and although Francks, the witness, never identified the land afterwards. We do not see the similarity between the evidence of Francks (the subject of consideration in the former appeal) and that of the testimony offered on the part of the witness Crisp in the present appeal. Crisp's evidence was not offered to show where a boundary line was, or the beginning point of a tract of land, but to prove boundary or location by a pointing by one deceased in the direction of the land, the boundaries of which were in dispute. In the matter of Francks' testimony the evidence went to fixing the corner of the plaintiffs' land. If, in Francks' testimony, he had said his father, who was dead, and had no interest in the land, had told him on the spot that a certain point was the beginning point of a certain tract of land, there could have been no doubt, under all our decisions, of the competency of the evidence. But the conversation between Francks and his father about the beginning point of the tract of land in dispute occurred 25 miles away from the land, and Francks never identified it himself. The court said there: "The particular witness Francks had never afterwards actually identified the boundary as fitting the description given by the deceased declarant. Other witnesses, however, testified that they found a tree at the alleged beginning corner answering the description given by the deceased to the first witness. If the beginning corner had not afterwards been identified, then the testimony of Caber and Francks would have been inadmissible; because it was afterwards found, we think it was competent." That ruling was going just as far as we thought the court ought to go in reference to the competency of hearsay evidence on the question of boundary, and we are not disposed to carry it further.

There was an exception made, but not urged on the argument, that the declaration of McDowell, the surveyor, as to boundary, was incompetent, because he had received $50 as compensation for pointing out the beginning corner of the tract by the plaintiffs. The judge held that the disqualifying interest must be an interest in the subject-matter of the controversy, and that the compensation the witness got as a surveyor in fixing the beginning point in the survey did not make the declaration incompetent. This ruling was correct.

There is one error, however, committed in the trial below, and which is pointed out in the appeal of the defendants, on account of which a new trial must be ordered. It was an error, however, more of inadvertence than a misapprehension of the law. The trial of the case consumed more than two weeks. One hundred and twenty-five witnesses were introduced, and 11 days were taken up in hearing the evidence. Many perplexing questions of law were raised on the trial. The verdict was for the plaintiffs, and it was for them on the first trial, and we dislike to send this case back for a new trial. But under the law and our precedents it must be done. The plaintiffs, to locate the land covered by their grants, introduced evidence tending to show that the beginning corner was at a single chestnut tree on the left-hand side of the Jenkins trail, just above the Flint spring. The defendants, to show that the single chestnut tree near the Flint spring was not the true beginning point of the plaintiffs' grant, introduced J. B. Crisp, who testified that he was a chain bearer upon the survey made when the plaintiffs' grants were issued, and that the surveyors did not begin at the single chestnut tree ("H" on the map), as claimed by the plaintiffs, but at a chestnut marked on the map "Double Chestnut," about one mile northeast of the single chestnut, the point claimed by the plaintiffs as the beginning point. The plaintiffs then put in evidence an affidavit made by Crisp before the trial in the following words: "Personally appeared before me, the undersigned justice of the peace, John Bennett Crisp, and maketh oath that the chestnut tree on the left hand side of the trail leading from Flint spring to Haw Gap in the Smoky Mountains, is the beginning of four 640 acre tracts of land which he was chain bearer for, which was surveyed for Daniel Lester; also to the place where a white oak stood in the south boundary line of said two tracts." Crisp on cross-examination denied that he had made the affidavit, and denied that he had ever told anybody that the single chestnut tree, the beginning point as claimed by the plaintiffs, was the beginning point or the corner of said tracts, or that the white oak was in the line of any of the tracts. A witness named Buchanan testified that he had heard John B. Crisp say the same thing as to the beginning corner of the land that was contained in the affidavit alleged to have been made by him. When Buchanan's evidence was received, his honor told the jury that it was received by him, and that they could only consider it, as evidence for the purpose of contradicting Crisp; but when his honor came on to instruct the jury as to the plaintiffs' contention that their beginning corner was at the single chestnut just above the Flint spring on the Jenkins trail, in reciting the evidence for the plaintiffs in that contention, he called the attention of the jury to the substantive evidence of many witnesses, and amongst the number he mentioned the evidence of the witness Buchanan, without directing their attention to the evidence of this witness as being purely contradictory of that of Crisp, and going to impeach his evidence in chief. After reciting what the other witnesses for the plaintiffs had said as to the beginning point of the plaintiffs' land, his honor went on to say: "A witness named Buchanan testified that he had heard John B. Crisp, a chain bearer, say that the Westfeldt corner was just above Flint spring, and that he also spoke of a white oak to the south as one of the Westfeldt corners." In not calling the attention of the jury, at that juncture of the trial, and in connection with the recital of the substantive evidence of the various witnesses of the plaintiffs as to the beginning corner, to the fact that the evidence of Buchanan was not substantive evidence on the subject of boundary, but only to impeach Crisp and to contradict his evidence, there was error. Sprague v. Bond, 113 N. C. 551, 18 S. E. 701; Bullinger v. Marshall, 70 N. C. 520; State v. Parker (at this term) 46 S. E. 511.

The court, at this term, has amended rule 27 (46 S. E. 111) by adding at the end thereof: "When testimony is admitted, not as substantive evidence, but in corroboration or contradiction, and that fact is stated by the court when it is admitted, it will not be ground for exception that the judge fails in his charge to again instruct the jury specially upon the nature of such evidence, unless his attention is called to the matter by a prayer for instruction; nor will it be ground for exception that evidence competent for some purposes, but not for all, is admitted generally, unless the appellant asks, at the time of admission, that its purpose shall be restricted." The amendment was made on the 16th March, 1904, and went into effect on that day. This case was tried at September term, 1903, of the superior court of Haywood county; but, if the case had been tried after the amendment to rule 27, the error we have pointed out would not be cured thereby. The amendment would not apply to a case where the judge below should instruct the jury, at the time of the admission of the evidence, that they should consider it only as corroborative, or for purposes of contradiction, if he afterwards in his charge should marshal that evidence along with the substantive evidence in the case. If he afterwards makes allusion to such evidence in his charge to the jury, he must again call attention to its nature.

For the error pointed out there must be a new trial.

GREEN'S ADM'R v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

RAILROADS—TRESPASSER ON TRACK.

1. Where an engineer, after becoming informed of the peril to which a trespasser on defendant's track was exposed, fails to take steps to stop the train, as he could have done, thereby avoiding the accident, the railroad company is liable for the resulting injuries.

Keith, P., and Cardwell, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Halifax County.

Action by Green's administrator against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Lee & Howard, Hy. Edmunds, and Jas. H. Guthrie, for plaintiff in error. Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought by Green's administrator against the Southern Railway Company to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, caused, as alleged, by the negligence of the defendant company.

After the evidence for the plaintiff and defendant had been delivered to the jury, the defendant demurred to the evidence. Thereupon the jury ascertained the damages to be $2,750. Upon consideration of the demurrer, it was sustained, and judgment given for the defendant. This action of the court is excepted to, and is the sole question presented for our consideration.

At the time of the accident the deceased was a trespasser; having fallen asleep upon the track of the defendant company, where he lay until run over by one of its trains. The law governing this class of cases is well settled. Indeed, it is not disputed. It is the application of the law to the facts that constitutes the subject of this controversy.

This court, in Joyner's Case, quoting from Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, has laid down the law in these words: "The plaintiff should recover, notwithstanding his own negligence exposed him to the risk of injury, if the injury of which he complains was proximately caused by the omission of the defendant, after having such notice of the plaintiff's danger as would put a prudent man upon his guard, to use ordinary care for the purpose of avoiding such injury. It is not necessary that the defendant should actually know of the danger to which the plaintiff is exposed. It is enough if he has sufficient notice or belief to put a prudent man on the alert, and he does not take such precautions as a prudent man would take under similar notice or belief." Seaboard R. Co. v. Joyner, 92 Va. 354, 23 S. E. 773; Tucker v. Norfolk R. Co., 92 Va. 549, 24 S. E. 229; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Dunnaway's Adm'r, 93 Va. 29, 24 S. E. 698.

It appears that on the morning of the accident the deceased, a boy about 17 years of age, in company with Patterson Hankins, a boy 16 years of age—the latter with a gun—went upon the right of way of the defendant company to shoot rabbits. Shortly after reaching the railway track, the deceased lay down either at the end or upon the end of a cross-tie, and fell asleep. In this position Hankins left him, and went northwardly on the track with his gun. On his way back, Hankins saw a freight train coming, and immediately commenced running up the track towards the train, waving his hat for it to stop, and continued to run and wave his hat at the persons upon the approaching engine, whom he could plainly see looking toward him, until the sleeping boy was struck and killed, when he jumped off the track. Upon the demurrer to the evidence, these facts are established by the evidence of Patterson Hankins. The fact is established by the evidence of the fireman, introduced on behalf of the defendant, that, before the train reached the whistle post, a distance of more than 300 yards from the sleeping boy, as shown by actual measurement, he saw a boy running towards the train, with his hat in his hand, and saw the deceased lying on the track, and that he immediately notified the engineer. The fact is established by the evidence of the engineer, introduced on behalf of the defendant, that the appliances were in good condition for making a quick stop, and that he did actually stop his train in 200 yards. So that we have the engineer in charge of the train informed of the danger of the deceased when about 300 yards off, and his own admission that he could have stopped the train in 200 yards. If, therefore, he had, as was his duty, taken steps to stop the train as soon as he was informed of the peril to which the deceased was exposed, he could have brought the train to a full stop about 100 yards before he reached the boy sleeping upon the track.

The case is stronger in favor of a recovery than Joyner's Case, supra, and is controlled by the principles therein enunciated. In the case cited, the engineer mistook the object lying near the track for an abandoned tie, and the only notice he had of danger ahead was two men running up the track, one of whom was waving his hat. In that case the defendant company was held liable.

In the case at bar there was not only the boy running up the track, waving his hat, but the fireman saw that there was a human being lying on the track, and notified the engineer in time for him to avoid killing the deceased.

For these reasons, the judgment complained of must be reversed, and judgment entered by this court in favor of the plaintiff in accordance with the verdict of the jury.

KEITH, P. (dissenting). In this case I am unable to concur in the opinion of the majority of the court.

To my mind, the evidence is clear and uncontradicted that the engineer in charge of the train which inflicted the injury upon plaintiff's intestate did everything within his power to prevent the accident after he became aware of his peril.

APPEAL AND ERROR—NECESSARY PARTIES—PROCEDURE.

1. Although no objection was made in the trial court, nor before this court, upon the ground that necessary parties are not before the court, the court on appeal will, where there is such a defect, send the case back, in order that the proper parties may be brought before it by proper amendment.

2. In a suit to set aside a sale under a deed of trust to secure a note, a bank that took the note as collateral security from one who had no title to it, long after it had been fully paid, was a necessary party.

Appeal from Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Bill by Sophia Metzger against Samuel Wasserman and wife. Decree for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Alfred P. Thom, for appellants. Burroughs & Bro. and Thomas H. Willcox, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. This suit was instituted by Sophia Metzger to set aside a sale made by L. B. Allen, trustee in a deed of trust executed by Samuel Wasserman and wife, to secure to Mrs. Metzger the payment of $2,500. The ground upon which it was sought to set aside the sale made by the trustee was that it was made without authority, and was therefore void.

The facts of the case, briefly stated, are as follows: By a deed dated December 10, 1892, Samuel Wasserman and wife conveyed to L. B. Allen, trustee, a house and lot in the city of Norfolk to secure to Sophia Metzger the payment of two negotiable notes, for $1,250 each, payable one and two years after date, respectively, and dated December 10, 1892. In January, 1902, one P. J. Morris, representing himself to be the owner of one of the notes secured by the deed of trust, and the National Bank of Commerce of Norfolk, claiming to be the holder of that note as collateral security for a debt due it from Morris, informed Allen, trustee, that default had been made in the payment of the note, and directed him to sell the trust subject to satisfy the debts secured. The trustee thereupon advertised and sold the property at public auction, and Morris became the purchaser, at the price of $2,200, on the 21st day of January, 1902. The trustee conveyed the property to Morris by deed dated as of the day of the sale, which was acknowledged for recordation two days afterwards. On the 25th of that month Morris and wife conveyed the property to trustees to secure to the Mutual Building & Loan Association of the City of Norfolk the payment of $2,000, which Morris had borrowed from it. On the 30th day of the next month Morris and wife conveyed the property to David Kalberman, as trustee for Mrs. Rikchen Wasserman, the wife of Samuel Wasserman (but who was divorced from him soon afterwards), at the price of $2,400; the grantee in the deed assuming the payment of the debt due the building and loan association, secured upon the property. After deducting the costs and expenses of the sale made by Allen, trustee, to Morris, the trustee paid one-half of the proceeds of the sale upon the note which Morris and the Commercial Bank claimed to be the owner and holder of, as before described, and notified Mrs. Metzger, the payee and holder of the other note, that he had a sum of money in his hands to be paid upon that note. A few days afterward the agent of Mrs. Metzger, who seems to be quite an old woman, called upon the trustee, pursuant to the notice. The agent denied any knowledge of the sale made by the trustee; stated that the note held by the parties who had directed the trustee to make sale of the house and lot had been paid, and that his mother held the other note which was still due and unpaid; and declined to receive the money in the hands of the trustee. Subsequently he did receive and credit it upon the note held by his mother, but at the time he received the money he did not have knowledge of all the facts, nor had he or his mother taken the advice of counsel at that time. The note claimed by Morris and the bank had been paid five years or more before the sale by the trustee, and had been delivered by the payee or her agent to Samuel Wasserman, the maker. Mrs. Metzger, who lived in the city of Norfolk, had no notice of the sale made by the trustee, and gave him no direction to sell. Mrs. Wasserman, the vendee of Morris, and the present holder of the house and lot, had no actual notice of the fraud of Morris (who was in collusion with Samuel Wasserman) in claiming the note and causing the property to be sold by the trustee, nor that the sale made by Allen, trustee, was not made in accordance with the terms of the trust.

Upon the case made by the evidence as it now stands, it appears that the Bank of Commerce took the note from Morris, who had no title to it, without assignment by Mrs. Metzger, long after it had matured and been fully paid. All persons connected with the transactions set forth, and interested in the questions involved, were made parties to the suit, except the said National Bank of Commerce of the City of Norfolk, at whose instance and for whose benefit, in part, the sale by the trustee was made.

We are of opinion that, upon the state of facts presented by the record, no final decree could be entered in the case in the absence of said bank which might not do injustice, and that the trial court erred in not directing the complainant to amend his bill so as to make the said bank a party.

Although no objection was made in the trial court, nor here, upon that ground, this court will, where there is such a defect of parties, send the case back, in order that the proper parties may be brought before it. Jameson's Adm'r v. De Shields, 8 Grat. 4, 13; Taylor's Adm'r v. Spindle, 2 Grat. 44, 72; Richardson v. Davis, etc., 21 Grat. 708, 711; Lynchburg Iron Co. v. Tayloe, 79 Va. 671.

The decree appealed from will be reversed without passing upon the merits of the case, and the cause remanded to the court of law and chancery, in order that the said bank may be brought before the court by the proper amendment of the bill.

NEWPORT NEWS PUB. CO. v. BEAUMEISTER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

NEGLIGENCE — PRESUMPTION OF LAW — EVIDENCE — MASTER AND SERVANT — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. The presumption of law that the instinct of self-preservation forbids the imputation of recklessness to any one can be considered only in the absence of evidence tending to show negligence.

2. Where a servant has a choice of two ways in performing his duty, one of which is perfectly safe and the other dangerous, and he voluntarily chooses the latter and is injured, he is gully of contributory negligence, and the master is not liable—as where, with knowledge, to stop machinery he attempts acts which are dangerous to perform while it is running.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Newport News.

Action by W. H. Beaumelster against the Newport News Publishing Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. M. Lett and O. D. Batchelor, for plaintiff in error. Bickford & Stewart and C. A. Ashby, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. The question involved in this case is the liability of the Newport News Publishing Company for the alleged negligent injury of the plaintiff, W. H. Beaumelster, while in the service of the defendant company as pressman in charge of its printing press.

The plaintiff alleges that, in operating the printing press of the defendant company, it became necessary for him to occasionally enter the pit under the press, in order to adjust certain parts of the machine; that it was the duty of the defendant, in the exercise of reasonable care, to properly light the pit, so that the plaintiff might, with due caution on his part, perform his duties therein; that the defendant failed to provide sufficient light in the pit for his safety, though it had promised to do so, and that, in reliance on such promise, plaintiff had continued in defendant's employment; and that on the day of the accident he had, in the performance of his duties, entered the pit, and, by reason of the insufficient light, was so injured that he suffered the loss of his hand.

Upon the plea of not guilty, issue was joined, and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff for $2,000, which the circuit court refused to set aside.

Among the errors assigned is the action of the court in giving the following instruction for the plaintiff:

"The court instructs the jury that contributory negligence is as distinctly a wrong in the plaintiff as negligence is in the defendant, and that it is as much against the principles of the law to presume it upon the one side as on the other. And that the instinct of self-preservation forbids the imputation of recklessness to any one."

The last paragraph of this instruction would only be pertinent in a case where there was no evidence to sustain the theory of negligence on the part of the plaintiff. It has, however, no application where, as in the case at bar, the evidence is abundant to show the circumstances of the accident. In support of this instruction, Southern R. R. Co. v. Bryant's Adm'r, 95 Va. 212, 28 S. E. 183, is relied on. In that case Bryant was killed at a crossing, and the evidence was silent as to whether he had listened before attempting to cross. Under these circumstances, the court said it could not be inferred, as a matter of law, that Bryant did not listen, because he drove upon the track without stopping, the instinct of self-preservation forbidding the imputation of recklessness to any one; that, where a traveler approaches a railroad crossing, and the negligence of the railroad company is established, in the absence of evidence to the contrary the presumption is, though perhaps slight, that the traveler did his duty in approaching the crossing. The court was dealing with the presumption of law attendant upon the absence of evidence. No such condition is presented by the case at bar. On the contrary, the evidence tends to show negligence on the part of both the plaintiff and the defendant. In such a case the verdict of the jury must rest upon the facts proven, and the inferences to be reasonably drawn therefrom, and not upon the presumptions of law in favor of either party. The instruction under consideration was therefore misleading, and calculated to create upon the mind of the jury the belief that the court was of opinion that there was no evidence tending to establish the negligence of the plaintiff.

The refusal of the court to give instruction No. 6 on behalf of the defendant is assigned as error. This instruction told the jury that an employé was not entitled to recover for an injury received while doing his work in an obviously dangerous way, when it could have been performed without danger in a way well known to the employé, and that, if they believed from the evidence that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to go into the pit while the machine was running, and that it was obviously dangerous to do so, and that the duty to be performed in the pit could have been performed in safety after first stopping the machine, and the plaintiff ignored the safe way and adopted the dangerous method of doing the work, he could not recover.

The gravamen of the declaration is that it was dangerous to go under the machine without a light while it was running. The plaintiff was a man of experience, and had the entire control and management of the printing press in question. His own evidence, as well as that of the defendant, shows that it was very dangerous to go into the pit under the machine while the machine was running, and that the absence of the electric light greatly enhanced the danger. The evidence further shows that there were two levers on the outside, and one in the pit, by the use of which the machine could have been stopped in an instant. The plaintiff says that he could have stopped the machine before going into the pit, and that, if he had done so, it would have been absolutely safe.

It was proper to instruct the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to repair the electric light for use in the pit, and that the plaintiff had the right to rely upon its promise to repair, and that such promise relieved the plaintiff from the implication of assumption of risk in attempting to proceed with his work without the light, unless his doing so involved a degree of recklessness that no reasonably prudent man would encounter. But while the plaintiff may have been justified in proceeding with the work while the light was absent, that did not preclude an inquiry into the question of his contributory negligence in doing the work. The absence of the light increased the danger, and imposed upon the plaintiff enlarged obligations to exercise due care and caution in the performance of his duty. Notwithstanding the darkness and the promise of the master to repair the light, there was the absolutely safe way of repairing the defect in the machine; and the question arises whether the plaintiff did not owe to his master, as well as to himself, the duty of adopting the method of doing the work with respect to which there was no danger. It is a well-settled principle that where a person has a choice of two ways in performing his duty, one of which is perfectly safe, and the other dangerous, and he voluntarily chooses the latter and is injured, he is guilty of contributory negligence, and the master is not liable. Street's Ex'x v. N. & W. R. Co., 101 Va. —, 45 S. E. 284; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Mann, 99 Va. 180, 37 S. E. 849.

In Labatt's recent work on Master & Servant, § 338, on page 870, it is said: "The doctrine that negligence may be inferred, as a matter of law, when it is apparent that the act which caused the injury was done in an unnecessarily dangerous manner, has been applied in the predicaments exemplified in the following paragraphs." Among the predicaments mentioned is the following, at page 876: "Failing to Stop Machinery When Work is to be Done Which is Dangerous while the Machinery is in Motion. A servant who, with knowledge of the risk he is incurring, does acts about machinery while it is in motion, is guilty of contributory negligence, if he could have accomplished his purpose safely after stopping the machinery."

Enough has been said of the facts of the case under consideration, and the law applicable, to make manifest the error in refusing the instruction in question. The defendant relied on the contributory negligence of the plaintiff as the ground of its release from liability, and especially his contributory negligence in not stopping the machine before going into the pit. No other instruction had sufficiently submitted that question to the jury, and, in view of the evidence to which we have adverted, the defendant was entitled to an instruction limited and directed to the submission of that material and important question.

As the judgment must be reversed for the errors already pointed out, it is unnecessary to comment upon the numerous other instructions given and refused, except to suggest that, in point of number, they are wholly out of proportion to the necessities of the case.

The controlling facts and circumstances are few, and two or three instructions, limited and directed to the material questions presented, would have been ample to properly submit the case to the jury. The numerous irrelevant and unnecessary instructions given are well calculated to mislead and confuse the jury, and operate as a hindrance, rather than an aid, to the administration of justice.

For these reasons, the judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

NOTTINGHAM COAL & ICE CO. v. PREAS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

SALES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. Where a vendor fails to furnish the articles he has contracted to sell, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract and the market price at the place of delivery, and, if there be no market at that place, the value in the most available market, with the cost of transportation added, and the expense of making the repurchase.

2. On failure of seller to deliver the goods sold in order to recover resulting damages, it is not necessary that the vendee should have actually gone into the market and bought other goods to supply the place of those not delivered.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Roanoke.

Action by R. A. Preas against the Nottingham Coal & Ice Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Watts, Robertson & Robertson and Cocke & Glasgow, for plaintiff in error. Scott & Staples and S. V. Kemp, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. On the 2d day of March, 1900, the Nottingham Coal & Ice Company, an ice manufacturer in the city of Roanoke, and R. A. Preas, an ice dealer in Bedford City, entered into a contract by which the former agreed to sell and the latter to purchase all the ice which she might need for her purposes in Bedford City during the season of 1900 at the price of $3.50 per ton of 2,000 pounds on board the cars at Roanoke City. Both parties complied with the terms of their agreement until about the middle of July, when the ice company failed to furnish all the ice ordered, and finally, after some correspondence, ceased to furnish it at all; and Mrs. Preas, not being able to get ice from the ice company, quit the business, and instituted this action in December, 1900, after the ice season had closed, to recover damages for her losses by reason of the ice company's failure to keep and perform its contract.

The question involved here is the measure of the plaintiff's damages. That question was attempted to be raised by demurrer to the declaration, and was raised by objections to evidence introduced, by instructions given and refused, and upon a motion to set aside the verdict of the jury.

The court sustained the demurrer to the fourth count on the declaration, and overruled it as to the other three counts. No question is made as to the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the fourth count; and, as the first, second, and third counts each averred sufficient facts to entitle the plaintiff to some damages, nominal at least, the demurrer was properly overruled.

The plaintiff's counsel contends that this case does not come within the general rule that the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price of the goods at the time and place of delivery, because at the time the contract was entered into the ice company knew that the plaintiff was purchasing the ice for sale in Bedford City, where she had been engaged in the retail ice business for some years, and had regular customers, and because there was no ice market at Bedford City upon which she could purchase ice upon the failure of the ice company to furnish her ice according to the contract.

The evidence shows that the plaintiff had been in the retail ice business at Bedford City for some years, and that she had customers who were in the habit of purchasing ice from her, and that there was no market at Bedford City at which she could purchase the ice required for her business. The evidence further shows that she had no actual contract with any one for the resale of the ice, and it also appears that, while ice was in great demand, it could be purchased at other points, especially at the city of Alexandria, but at a higher price, at a greater freight rate, and with more loss from melting, as the distance for shipping was much greater.

The case made seems to be the ordinary case of a wholesale dealer or manufacturer failing to furnish to a retail dealer for the purpose of resale goods which he had agreed to furnish, which can be purchased in the market. There does not seem to be any real difference between this case and that of the miller who buys wheat to grind and furnish to his trade, or the butcher who purchases cattle to furnish beef to his customers, or the merchant who buys goods to sell to those who are in the habit of trading with him. In all such cases, if the wheat, or cattle, or goods can be purchased in the market, and there had been no resale of them by the vendee, the measure of damages, where the vendor fails to furnish the articles he has contracted to sell, is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery. If for any reason there be no market at the place of delivery, then the value in the nearest and most available market to which the buyer must resort in order to supply himself, with the cost of transportation added, together with compensation for the time, trouble, and expense of making the repurchase, is the measure of damages. 2 Mechem on Sales, § 1742.

In order for the buyer to recover as damages the difference between the market price and contract price at the time and place of delivery, it is not necessary that he should have actually gone into the market and bought other goods to supply the place of those not delivered. "It would not advantage the defaulting party," as was said by the Court of Appeals of New York in Saxe v. Penokee Lumber Co., 159 N. Y. 371, 54 N. E. 14, "if he should do so, for, if he buys at the market value, the result to the other party is the same as if he simply proved the market value." 2 Mechem on Sales, § 1758.

We are of opinion that the measure of damages upon this case made was the difference between the market price and the contract price of ice at the time and place of delivery, and that the trial court in not so holding erred, and for that error its judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

BALTIMORE & O. R. CO. v. BURKE & HERBERT.

ASSUMPSIT—IMPLIED PROMISE—MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED—COLLECTION OF CHECKS.

1. As between a promisor and a promisee there is privity, and if the facts raise an implied promise on the part of the defendant, or if the defendant has money in his possession which he ought to pay to the plaintiff, the law will imply a promise on the part of defendant to do his duty and pay the money.

2. Where a bank received certain checks, the property of plaintiff, from the hands of his agent for collection, and the checks were not properly indorsed, they did not receive the money of the plaintiff, as that money could only be taken from the banks on which the checks were drawn on a proper indorsement of those payable to plaintiff, and the bank was not liable to plaintiff for such sums, though the bank was the depository of plaintiff, there being no privity to support the action between them.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Alexandria.

Action by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company against Burke & Herbert. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Hamilton & Colbert and Jas. R. & H. B. Caton, for plaintiff in error. Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson, for defendants in error.

KEITH, P. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company brought its action of trespass on the case in assumpsit against Burke & Herbert in the circuit court of the city of Alexandria. The declaration contains 18 counts, 17 of which are founded upon checks drawn by customers of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, payable to its order, upon various banks, and indorsed by D. P. Hurley, its agent. The averment in each of these counts is that the defendants had been designated as the depository of the funds of the plaintiff in the city of Alexandria, and that as such depository they received the several sums of money represented by the checks to the use of the plaintiff, the amount so received on each check being set out in a separate count. The eighteenth count comprises the ordinary money counts in assumption. Along with the declaration a bill of particulars was filed. The defendants pleaded non assumpsit, and upon the trial it was shown in evidence that Burke & Herbert had accepted the appointment as depository of the funds of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company in the city of Alexandria; that D. P. Hurley was the agent of the railroad company; that as agent he received from its customers, in payment of freight and other charges, checks payable to its order upon various banks, which he indorsed, and upon which Burke & Herbert paid him the money, received the checks, and thereafter collected the amount of said checks from the banks upon which they were drawn.

The claim of plaintiff is that Hurley had no authority, as its agent, to indorse its checks, and that, Burke & Herbert being its depository, the money collected by them upon the checks so indorsed should have been credited to the plaintiff upon the books of the defendants, as its duly designated and authorized depository.

Much evidence was taken pro and con, and a number of instructions were given, but, in the view we take of the case, it will be necessary to consider only one of them.

The court told the jury that "they must believe from the evidence that the defendants had and received for the plaintiff the money claimed in the bill of particulars before they can find a verdict for the plaintiff; and, although they may believe from the evidence that the checks in evidence were not properly indorsed, but were cashed by the defendants, and the defendants received the credit for them at the banks upon which they were drawn, yet the court instructs the jury that these facts created no privity between the plaintiff and the defendants, and there can be no recovery by the plaintiff against the defendants under the count for money had and received."

As the 17 special counts are for money had and received, and the only averment in the eighteenth count upon which the plaintiff could recover is that for money had and received to its use, upon the evidence in this case there could be no recovery by the plaintiff except upon the terms stated in this instruction. This instruction, in other words, if it properly states the law, is conclusive of the case, and renders it unnecessary for us to consider it in any other aspect.

In considering this instruction it must be assumed that Hurley had no authority to indorse the checks set out in the declaration. It thus appears that, as agent of the railroad company, in payment of charges due to it, he received from its customers the checks set out in the bill of particulars, drawn upon various banks, payable to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company; that he indorsed them without authority; that they were cashed for him by Burke & Herbert; and that the checks were subsequently collected by Burke & Herbert, and the money placed to their own credit, they being at the time the depository of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company in the city of Alexandria. There was no express promise upon the part of Burke & Herbert to pay to the plaintiff the money in controversy. Did the facts, as stated, create an implied promise? for a promise, express or implied, must be shown by the plaintiff to entitle it to a recovery.

As between a promisor and promisee there is privity, and if the facts be such as to raise an implied promise upon the part of the defendant, if the defendant has money in his possession which in good conscience he ought to pay to the plaintiff, the law will imply a promise upon the part of the defendant to do his duty and to pay the money; and this implied promise is as effectual to create privity between the parties as an express promise would be.

These propositions, we think, are fundamental, and we shall cite but little authority in support of them.

In Attorney General v. Perry, 2 Comyn's Rep. 481, it was held that: "Whenever a man receives money belonging to another without any reason, authority, or consideration, an action lies against the receiver as for money received to the other's use; and this as well where the money is received through mistake under color, and upon apprehension, though a mistaken apprehension, of having a good authority to receive it, as where it is received by imposition, fraud, or deceit in the receiver."

Lord Mansfield, in Moses v. Macferlan, 2 Burr. 1005, said: "If the defendant be under an obligation, from the ties of natural justice, to refund, the law implies a debt, and gives this action, founded in the equity of the plaintiff's case, as it were upon a contract." And in the course of the same opinion uses the following language: "In one word, the gist of this kind of action is that the defendant, upon the circumstances of the case, is obliged, by the ties of natural justice and equity, to refund the money." See, also, Cary v. Curtis, 3 How. 236, 11 L. Ed. 576.

In State v. St. Johnsbury, 59 Vt., at page 337, 10 Atl. 533, the court said: "In order to maintain this action there need be no privity between the parties, nor any promise to pay, other than what arises and is implied from the fact that the defendant has money in his hands belonging to the plaintiff that he has no right conscientiously to retain. In such case the equitable principle on which the action is founded implies the promise. When the fact is found that the defendant has the plaintiff's money, if he can show neither legal nor equitable ground for keeping it, the law creates the privity and the promise."

Barton's Law Practice, vol. 1, p. 125, says: "The action of assumpsit is a liberal and equitable one, and is applicable to almost every case where money has been received which in equity and good conscience ought to be refunded. An express promise is not necessary to sustain it, but it may be maintained wherever anything is received or done from the circumstances of which the law implies a promise of compensation."

We deduce from these authorities that wherever there is a promise there exists privity between the promisor and the promisee, whether that promise be express or implied.

We are not concerned with the right of the plaintiff against the banks upon which these checks were drawn, nor with that of the drawers of those checks upon those banks. The sole question for us to determine is the liability of Burke & Herbert to the plaintiff in this action, and not otherwise. When they paid over to Hurley the money for the checks which they received from him, they paid what was their own, and upon that transaction there was surely no money in their hands belonging to the plaintiff. When they presented the checks to the banks upon which they were drawn, and received the money upon them, they received it as and for their own money. If the checks were not properly indorsed, they did not receive the money of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, for that money could only be taken from the banks upon a proper indorsement of the checks payable to and held by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. But, as we have said, with the law applicable to the facts as between Burke & Herbert and the banks for the money received by them we have here no concern. The theory of the plaintiff is that being the depository of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company rendered them liable for the money thus received, and if they had received it as depository, or if they had received it in any character as money belonging to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, or if the facts, whatever their intention at the time may have been, were such as to constitute the money thus received the property of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, the law would have implied the promise upon their part to pay it, and they would be liable as for money had and received to the use of the plaintiff. But, as we view the case, there was no promise, express or implied, and therefore no privity which could support the action.

There was no error in the instruction given, and that instruction concludes the case. The judgment must be affirmed.

WILLIS v. GORRELL et al.

ATTORNEYS — CLAIMS — COLLECTION — AUTHORITY—TERMINATION—PAYMENT.

1. Plaintiff's husband held a debt against defendant, and delivered the same to an attorney for collection, taking the latter's receipt therefor. Thereafter the attorney reported to his client that he had secured the debt by taking a deed of trust on a quantity of real estate, at which the client expressed satisfaction, but left the claim in the attorney's possession, thereafter, however, receiving interest direct from the debtor until he assigned the claim to plaintiff, of which assignment the debtor was notified. Held that, the attorney having taken security for the debt, it was no longer in his hands for collection, and his authority to receive payment was terminated.

2. An attorney empowered to collect a claim accepted security therefor to the satisfaction of his client, and thereafter accepted a note of the debtor for the amount of the claim, which he discounted, converting the proceeds to his own use. He thereafter satisfied the security without the knowledge of an assignee of the claim. The debtor, notwithstanding the giving of such note, continued to make semiannual payments of interest on the debt to such assignee for several years. Held, that the payment of such note did not constitute a payment of the debt.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Culpeper County.

Action by Bettie K. Willis against J. B. Gorrell and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Barbour & Rixey, for appellant. Grimsley & Miller, for appellees.

CARDWELL, J. In 1885 James A. Willis held the bond of J. B. Gorrell for $500, which he delivered to G. D. Gray, a practicing attorney of Culpeper county, for collection, taking the attorney's receipt therefor. A few days thereafter Mr. Gray reported to Willis, by letter, that he had his debt against Gorrell secured, and it appears that on January 30, 1885, Gorrell made a deed of trust on a large quantity of real estate, securing the Willis debt with a number of others. Willis, satisfied with having his debt thus secured, left the bond in the possession of Mr. Gray, but received directly from Gorrell interest thereon in advance, paid to him every six months until a subsequent date, when he assigned the bond to Bettie K. Willis, his wife, of which assignment Gorrell was notified, and the interest was thereafter paid regularly every six months in advance by Gorrell to Mrs. Willis directly, or by giving her credit on her account in his drug store. On the 2d day of April, 1898, Mr. Gray, without the knowledge or consent of either Mr. Willis or Mrs. Willis, and without receiving or pretending to receive payment thereof from Gorrell marked on the margin of the deedbook in which said deed of trust was recorded, the following words: "The bond of $500 to James

A. Willis is paid. [Signed] G. D. Gray, Attorney," and Gray's signature is duly attested by the clerk, as required by statute; and on the same day all of the other debts secured by the deed of trust were also released, and Gorrell then conveyed the same property, with other property, to G. D. Gray, trustee, to secure to one Bickers a bond for a loan of $6,450. The evident purpose of this release was to clear Gorrell's title to the land from all incumbrances, so that he could give a first lien to Bickers, and thus secure the loan then made. It is not pretended that a dollar was paid to Mr. Gray for the release of the Willis bond, nor was the bond delivered to Gorrell at that time, though it was at some time thereafter marked, "Paid in full. G. D. Gray, Atty.," and delivered to Gorrell, and was produced by him in response to a demand in the bill filed in this cause, and when produced it was indorsed, in the handwriting of G. D. Gray, "Int. paid to August 1898," although, as before remarked, the interest had been regularly paid directly to Willis or Mrs. Willis every six months in advance and never to G. D. Gray. Notwithstanding the release of the deed of trust as to this bond, before stated, Gorrell continued from that time down to February, 1902, to pay interest in advance on the bond to Mrs. Willis directly, without an intimation of any claim to having paid the principal of the bond, until August, 1902, when Mr. Gray was in his last illness, and an installment of interest became due, which Gorrell failed to pay, whereupon Mrs. Willis, through her nephew, wrote to Gorrell, requesting a remittance of the interest. To this request Gorrell made the response: "To my surprise a note for amount due her was placed in bank by Mr. G. D. Gray, and was paid by me at maturity, 5th of August. So Mrs. Willis will write him although he is too ill to attend to business, and it is doubtful if he lives. Yours truly, [Signed] J. B. Gorrell."

This was the first intimation which Mrs. Willis had of any claim on the part of any one that the debt was paid, or its status in any way changed, except by the payment of interest, and Mr. Gray was then, as stated by Gorrell in his note, too ill to attend to business, and he died in August, 1902, being too ill all the time to have his attention called to the matter, or to make any explanation as to the transactions between him and Gorrell touching the bond in question. Upon the receipt of the above note from Gorrell, Mrs. Willis employed counsel to investigate the facts concerning the bond she had held against Gorrell, and filed her bill in this cause setting out the attempted release of 1898; that Gorrell had on August 3, 1902, paid, at the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, his note for $500, payable to G. D. Gray, dated in February, 1902, at six months, which had been discounted at the bank by Gray, and which was a renewal of a note of similar description discounted originally in February, 1899, and renewed at regular intervals of six months thereafter, which Gorrell claimed to be a settlement of complainant's secured bond; that Gray had died totally insolvent; that the bond which Gray attempted to release had never been paid; denying Gray's authority to release the deed of trust securing the bond, and calling upon Gorrell to produce the bond and any notes claimed by him to have been given in renewal or payment of the bond; the prayer of the bill being that Gray's release of the deed of trust securing her bond and his receipt of its payment be canceled and annulled, and that the land conveyed by the deed of trust be subjected to the payment of the bond. To this bill Gorrell and others were made parties defendant, and the bill was taken for confessed as to all parties except Gorrell, who filed his demurrer and answer thereto, his answer setting out that "on the 3d day of February, 1900 [two years after the pretended release of 1898], the whole principal of said bond was paid to the plaintiff's attorney in cash, as may be seen from an indorsement on the face of said bond made by said G. D. Gray, attorney for plaintiff." The answer then proceeds to relate that on that day (February 3, 1900) Mr. Gray had come to respondent, stating that Mrs. Willis wanted her money at once; that he (Gorrell) then stated his inability to raise the money on such short notice, and that thereupon Gray departed from him, returned in a short time, and suggested to him to make a note to him (Gray) for $500, which he would indorse and have discounted, and thus pay off the bond; that he did this, and Gray took the note away, returning in a short time with the bond, and informed him (respondent) of the amount of the discount, which he paid to Gray in cash, and thereupon Gray marked the bond "Paid" and delivered it to him; that from that time until Mrs. Willis' demand for interest he heard nothing more of the matter, and supposed, of course, that Gray had accounted to Mrs. Willis for the note. The answer further claims that respondent since that time had carried the said note in bank with Gray's indorsement, he (respondent) paying the discount at each renewal thereof until its final payment.

Upon the hearing of the cause upon the bill, the demurrer and answer of Gorrell, and the testimony adduced by the parties, the circuit court overruled the demurrer, and held that the debt asserted by Mrs. Willis against Gorrell for the amount of the bond in question had been fully paid by Gorrell to G. D. Gray, as the duly authorized attorney of Mrs. Willis to collect the same; that Gorrell was discharged from further liability on account of said debt; and dismissed the plaintiff's bill, with costs to the respondent, Gorrell. This decree is before us for review upon an appeal taken by Mrs. Willis.

We have in the outset stated fully the facts as disclosed by the record, and from them it appears that the claim made by Gorrill, the appellee, in his answer, that the bond in question was marked "Paid" and delivered to him at the time that he claims to have given Gray his note for the amount of the bond, upon which he received the money at bank, is wholly incorrect, the fact being that at that time the bond was not marked "Paid" and delivered to appellee by Gray. When appellee obtained possession thereof is not made to appear, except that it was at a date subsequent to the release of the deed of trust securing the bond made by Gray in 1898, and subsequent to the execution of the note by appellee to Gray. But, be this as it may, and whatever may have been the transactions between appellee and Mr. Gray, or their motives concerning the debt of appellant, the question remains whether or not appellant can be bound by these transactions, and her debt rightly adjudged to have been satisfied thereby. Appellee, as the record clearly discloses, knew that the dealings of Mr. Gray with him concerning this debt were unauthorized; otherwise it would be inexplicable that he should not only have paid the discount on the several notes given to Gray in settlement of the debt, but continued till February, 1902, to pay promptly in advance, every six months, as it accrued, the interest due to appellant, as though she still held the bond unpaid, and thereby concealing from her any claim whatever that he had paid the bond to her attorney. The contention of appellee that the proceeds of the original note given by him to Mr. Gray in settlement of appellant's bond were paid over by Mr. Gray to appellant, or should have been, is therefore absolutely inconsistent with the admitted facts in the case.

As has been remarked, when Gray notified Mr. Willis that he had taken a deed of trust in 1885 to secure the debt due to him from appellee, the debt thereafter was no longer in the hands of Mr. Gray for collection, but was treated both by the debtor and creditor as an investment, and stood thus for about 17 years. There is not the slightest proof in the record that the relation of attorney and client was ever created between appellant and Mr. Gray, except that the bond of appellant, assigned to her by her husband, remained in Mr. Gray's possession—whether for safe-keeping or for what purpose we are unadvised, and are not concerned. But, even if the relation of attorney and client had been established as between appellant and Mr. Gray concerning the bond in question, it is well settled that an attorney having in his hands a claim for collection has no authority whatever to receive anything but money in payment thereof, without previous authority obtained from his client, the owner of such claim.

In Smith's Ex'r v. Powell, 98 Va. 431, 86 S. E. 522, it is held that an attorney simply to collect a debt has no authority to receive anything but money for it, and, if he accepts a note for it, no subsequent dealings of his with reference to the note, without previous authority or subsequent ratification of the client, can be deemed a ratification by the client.

It is not pretended in this case that appellant had ever authorized Mr. Gray, as her attorney, to collect the debt due from appellee, and there is not a syllable of evidence in the record that she, by word or deed, consented to or ratified the acceptance by Mr. Gray from appellee of the note which he claims to have given to Mr. Gray in settlement of her debt. The transaction set up by appellee, which he claims to have been in satisfaction of appellant's debt, had been concealed from her in the manner we have hereinbefore stated, until not only the insolvency of the attorney to whom he claims to have thus paid the debt years before, but until his fatal illness. Under these circumstances it would be unjust and inequitable, as it appears to us, to throw the loss of the debt upon appellant, instead of upon appellee.

It follows that we are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court is erroneous, and it will therefore be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to be further proceeded with in accordance with the views herein expressed.

GORDON BROS. v. CITY OF NEWPORT NEWS.

TAXATION—POWER OF CITIES—LICENSE TAX—TAILORS.

1. The authority of a municipality to impose a license tax on trades, professions, and callings depends upon its charter, and, if it contains a grant of such a power, an ordinance in pursuance of it occupies the same place as an act of the Legislature.

2. Under Const. art. 13, § 170, providing that the General Assembly may levy a license tax on any business which cannot be reached by the ad valorem system, whether a business can be so reached is a question for the Legislature or the municipality, and the courts will not interfere except in the case of a plain departure from the constitutional requirement.

3. The charter of the city of Newport News conferring on that city all the power possessed by the state in respect to the imposition of taxes, it can in its discretion impose taxes on all subjects within its jurisdiction amenable to tax by the state, so that a license tax on the business of a tailor is valid.

Error to Corporation Court of Newport News.

Gordon Bros. were convicted of violation of a city ordinance, and bring error. Affirmed.

Raymond M. Hudson, for plaintiffs in error.
J. A. Massie, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. Plaintiffs in error were fined by a police justice of the city of Newport News for carrying on the business of tailors and of merchant tailors without license, in violation of section 83 of the license ordinance of that city. Upon appeal the judgment of the police justice was affirmed by the corporation court, and the case is here upon writ of error to the judgment of affirmance.

There is no denial of the fact that plaintiffs in error are, as partners, conducting the businesses referred to without license; but it is insisted that the ordinance requiring such license is invalid, and that the judgment complained of is therefore erroneous.

A license upon trade or business can only be justified upon one of two grounds: either it is a tax upon the occupation, or else it is a police regulation.

In the former case the legality of the exaction depends upon its compliance with constitutional limitations upon the power of taxation; while in the latter its warrant rests upon the prevention of threatened evil. This controversy involves merely the consideration of the first branch of the subject.

In this commonwealth the power of taxation is vested in the legislative department of the government, and, subject only to constitutional restrictions, may be exercised to the utmost extent with respect both to the subjects of taxation and the amount of tax. It extends "to every trade or occupation; to every object of industry, use or enjoyment; to every species of possession." Cooley on Constitutional Limitation, p. 678; Ould & Carrington v. City of Richmond, 23 Grat. 464, 14 Am. Rep. 139.

The authority of a municipal corporation to impose a license tax on trades, professions, and callings depends upon its charter, and the crucial test in such case is whether that instrument contains a grant of the power sought to be exercised. If it does contain such grant, an ordinance passed in pursuance of it occupies the same plane with an act of the Legislature.

In Woodall v. City of Lynchburg, 100 Va. 318, 40 S. E. 913, this court held: "The grant to a municipal corporation of a general power of taxation is a grant by the Legislature of all the power possessed by itself in relation to the imposition of taxes, in its discretion, upon all subjects within its jurisdiction not withheld from taxation by the Legislature, whether they be taxed by the state or not."

The ruling in the case of Newport News & Old Point Ry. & Elec. Co. v. City of Newport News, 100 Va. 157, 40 S. E. 645, is to the same effect. In that case the court was construing the charter now under consideration, and holds that it confers upon the city all the powers possessed by the state in respect to the imposition of taxes, and that it can, in its discretion, impose taxes upon all subjects within its jurisdiction, amenable to tax by the state, whether actually taxed by it or not. The court also holds that: "A city charter which authorizes a license tax upon certain pursuits therein named, and 'upon all other business and pursuits upon which a license tax is levied by the state, and such other business as is lawful,' confers the power to impose a license tax on a street railway company, though not specifically named."

So, also, in the yet more recent case of City of Norfolk v. Griffith-Powell Co., 101 Va. —, 45 S. E. 839, the court observes: "We think it follows from what has been said that an ordinance which imposes a tax in a city clothed with full power of taxation stands on the same footing with an act of the Legislature, and the courts, looking alone at the power to tax, will consider the ordinance without reference to the tax imposed by the Legislature. If the Legislature could have imposed the tax, but for reasons satisfactory to itself refrained from doing so, that will not invalidate the ordinance in the absence of the expressed or necessarily implied intention to withdraw the subject from taxation, or to require that it shall be taxed only in a particular mode."

Article 4, § 10, of the Constitution of 1869 (article 13, § 170, of the present Constitution), provides that the General Assembly may levy a license tax upon any business which cannot be reached by the ad valorem system.

The Legislature, or a municipality possessing full powers of taxation under its charter, must decide primarily whether a particular business can or cannot be reached by the ad valorem system; and with the exercise of their discretion the courts may not interfere, except in case of a plain departure from the constitutional requirement. The question is one of power, and not of policy, so far as the courts are concerned; and they are without authority to control legislative discretion, even if, in their opinion, it is violative of sound principles of political economy, unless, in its exercise, it contravenes some provision of the Constitution of the state or of the United States. Subject only to that limitation, the discretion of the legislative department of the government in the administration of the fiscal affairs of the commonwealth is exclusive and supreme.

The Legislature has for years exacted a license tax from merchant tailors, as in case of other merchants, for the privilege of carrying on their business (Acts 1899-1900, p. 858, c. 796), and its power to impose a similar tax on the business of tailors cannot be doubted in light of the repeated decisions of this court in cognate cases. The contention that a tailor carries no stock and does not do a business, but simply labors for a living, exercising an inherent right, and not a privilege, is not sustained by the conceded facts of this case. It is admitted that plaintiffs in error have a place of business, that they employ journeymen tailors to assist them, and conduct a regular tailoring business in the city. But, were the facts otherwise, the objection would apply with more or less force in case of lawyers, physicians, dentists, auctioneers, surveyors, butchers, bakers, barbers, and the like. Yet it is matter of common knowledge that the tax bills of cities and towns throughout the commonwealth embrace these avocations, and many others of like kind.

Neither is the contention that the tax constitutes a poll tax sound. On the contrary, the amount of the exaction is unaffected by the number of individuals who may compose the firm or company by which the business is conducted.

It follows from these views that the judgment complained of is without error, and must be affirmed.

STANDARD OIL CO. v. WAKEFIELD'S ADM'R.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

DEATH — DAMAGES — TORTS — USE OF DANGEROUS ARTICLE — CONTRACT RELATIONS — GAS NAPHTHA — EXPLOSION — PROXIMATE CAUSE — INTERVENING ACT — HARMLESS ERROR — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY — CORPORATIONS — AGENTS — NOTICE.

1. Gas naphtha being a dangerous article, a company shipping a tank of it to a city was liable for the death of a city employé, caused, while attempting to unload the tank, by the negligent manner said company had closed the discharge pipe of the tank.

2. Defendant's negligence in failing to close a valve in the discharge pipe of a tank of gas naphtha which it shipped to a city, was the proximate cause of the death of a city employé occurring from an explosion on the intervening act of the city in removing the cap from the pipe in an attempt to unload the tank in the ordinary manner.

3. Where a city employé was killed while attempting to unload gas naphtha shipped to the city, any error, in certain counts of a petition therefor against the shipper, in failing to allege that plaintiff's decedent was an employé of the city, was harmless in view of evidence proving that fact.

4. In an action for the death of plaintiff's decedent from an explosion occurring while he was attempting to unload a tank of gas naphtha shipped by defendant, evidence examined, and held that the question of contributory negligence was for the jury.

5. Evidence that the agent of a corporation engaged in selling oil supervised the filling of the tank cars for delivery to purchasers, and had been at the gasworks of one of its purchasers one or more times under an understanding with such purchaser to notify the corporation's employés when assistance was needed in unloading leaking tanks, and knew or had opportunity of knowing the conditions under which the tanks were there unloaded, tended to sustain the hypothesis of an instruction treating his knowledge as notice to the corporation.

Error to Law and Equity Court of Richmond.

Action by Wakefield's administrator against the Standard Oil Company for damages for the death of plaintiff's decedent. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson, for plaintiff in error. Meredith & Cocke and H. B. Pollard, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. On or about the 23d day of December, 1901, the Standard Oil Company shipped in a tank car about 8,000 gallons of gas naphtha from Manchester, and delivered the same on the gasworks siding of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company in the city of Richmond, under a contract with that city, for use in its gas plant. The tank cars used for delivering the naphtha were provided by the Standard Oil Company. Each had a discharge pipe in the bottom of the tank some 4 inches in diameter, and projecting 10 or 12 inches below the bottom. The pipe was threaded to receive and upon it was a cap screw. Upon the upper part of the pipe is a valve to prevent the escape of naphtha. In the lower part of the valve there are concaves which permit the naphtha to flow when the valve is raised. An inflexible iron rod is attached to the valve, and extends to or near the top of the tank. Near the upper end of the rod is a coil wire spring, arranged to hold the rod down and to keep the valve in position when closing the discharge pipe. The iron rod near the top has an arm attached to it, by using which the pressure of the spring can be relieved and the valve raised so that the naphtha can enter the discharge pipe. The arm for raising the valve is fastened to the rod by an iron key passing through both. The rod and its attachments are covered by the dome of the car, on the top of which is a slide or manhole large enough for a man to get inside the car. The oil is unloaded through the discharge pipe by unscrewing the cap on its lower end and connecting the discharge pipe by a union with a pipe leading to the tanks of the city gasworks. When this union or connection has been made, the valve is raised by means of the arm keyed to the rod, and the naphtha permitted to flow into the city tank. The place for unloading tank cars was on a trestle 20 or 25 feet above the ground in the yard of the gasworks of the city, where for a number of years they had been delivered for that purpose. Under the trestle there was a large opening, the beginning of a sewer, which ran into and across the yard of the gasworks. After entering the yard, the sewer, being partly open and partly closed, ran alongside the engine room and the building in which the furnaces and retorts for making gas were situated.

On the day the car in question was delivered, the foreman of the lower gasworks of the city directed McCauley, one of its employés, who alone, or with another of its employés, generally did this work, to unload the car. When McCauley commenced to unscrew the cap on the end of the discharge pipe he saw a little naphtha. He turned the cap a little more, and, seeing the naphtha coming a little freer, he shut it up, and reported to the foreman that there was a leak, and that he could not make the connection by himself. The foreman thereupon directed him to get Mr. Wakefield, the plaintiff's intestate, to go with him and make the connection. When they reached the car, they undertook to make the connection in the usual way, Wakefield unscrewing the cap and McCauley connecting the pipes; but when the cap came off the naphtha came out with such force that both of them were unable to make the connection. McCauley jumped from under the car and went on top of it, removed the seal placed upon the plate covering the manhole, and swung it to one side for the purpose of forcing the valve down so as to stop the flow of naphtha. He then saw that the valve was out of order—that it was keyed improperly—and that he could do nothing with it. He at once jumped off the car and rushed to the office of the foreman, some 75 yards distant, and informed him that the valve was not in place, and was out of order, and that all the naphtha was escaping. They rushed back together, but just as they reached the trestle and car there was an explosion, which killed Wakefield, who was still under the car, attempting to save the naphtha. The explosion was caused by the gas from the naphtha coming into contact with the fire of the gashouse retorts as the naphtha flowed near by in the sewer, partly open and partly closed, leading from the trestle by the gashouse to the creek.

Upon examination the day after the accident it was ascertained that the key used for fastening the handle to the rod by which the valve was raised was under the bottom of the valve, holding it about three-fourths of an inch above the top of the discharge pipe, and that the handle was fastened to the rod by a piece of bent wire.

Wakefield's personal representative instituted her action on the case against the Standard Oil Company and the city of Richmond to recover damages for negligently causing the death of her intestate. Both defendants appeared and made defense. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the Standard Oil Company. To that judgment the oil company obtained this writ of error.

The oil company denies its liability upon three grounds:

(1) That it did not owe to Wakefield the duty of keeping the valve in the car in a reasonably safe condition, and was not, therefore, guilty of negligence as to him.

(2) That the condition of the valve, even if the oil company were negligent, was not the proximate cause of his death.

(3) That, if it was, he was guilty of contributory negligence.

As to the first ground of defense: The contention of the oil company is that, in order for negligence to be actionable, it must occur in a breach of legal duty arising out of contract or otherwise, owing to the person unloading the cars; that there was no contractual relation existing between the plaintiff's intestate and the oil company; and that, this being so, the only duty upon which the plaintiff could rely was the duty owing to the public by the oil company, and that the character of the shipment was not so dangerous as to make a failure to properly adjust the valve to prevent the escape of the naphtha a breach of duty to a third person who might suffer injury resulting from such failure.

It seems to be a well-settled rule of the common law that a person who negligently uses a dangerous instrument or article, or causes or authorizes its use by another in such a manner or under such circumstances that he has reason to know that it is likely to produce injury, is responsible for the natural and probable consequences of his act to any person injured who is not himself at fault. The liability does not depend upon privity of contract between the parties to the action, but on the duty of every man to so use his own property as not to injure the persons or property of others. Carter v. Towne, 98 Mass. 567, 96 Am. Dec. 682.

Whether this rule of the common law is applicable only, as the counsel of the oil company insists, to such agencies as are essentially and in their elements instruments of danger to life and property, may be doubted. Pollock, in his work on Torts (6th Ed.) p. —, says that "gas (the ordinary illuminating gas) is not of itself perhaps a dangerous thing, but, with atmospheric air, forms a highly dangerous explosive mixture, and also makes the mixed air incapable of supporting life. Persons undertaking to deal with it are therefore bound at all events to use all reasonable diligence to prevent an escape which may have such results. A gas fitter left an imperfectly connected pipe in the place where he was working under a contract with the occupier. A third person, a servant of that occupier, entering the room with a light, in the fulfillment of his ordinary duties, was hurt by an explosion due to the escape of gas from the pipe so left. The gas fitter was held liable as for a misfeasance independent of a contract." In the case referred to (Parry v. Smith, 4 C. P. Div. L. R. 325, 327) the judge delivering the opinion said: "I think the plaintiff's right of action is founded upon a duty which I believe attaches in every case where a person is using or dealing with a highly dangerous thing, which, unless managed with the greatest care, is calculated to cause injury to bystanders. To support such a right of action, there need be no privity between the party injured and him by whose breach of duty the injury is caused, nor any fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment; nor need what is done amount to a public nuisance. It is a misfeasance independent of contract." See 2 Shear. & Red. on Neg. (5th Ed.) §§ 116, 690; Wharton on Neg. § 851; Smith (Horace) on Neg. pp. 231 to 236; Thompson on Neg. (1901 Ed.) §§ 821 to 829; Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. Div. 513, 517.

It is a matter of common knowledge that naphtha is a dangerous substance (and it is generally so treated by the courts), and the gas which it gives off when exposed to the atmosphere is liable to explosion by contact with fire; and when it does it is impossible to guard against its consequences.

since it is instantaneous, and extends to persons and property within its reach. See Wellington v. Oil Co., 104 Mass. 64, 67; Standard Oil Co. v. Tierney (Ky.) 17 S. W. 1025, 14 L. R. A. 677, 36 Am. St. Rep. 595; Weir's Appeal, 74 Pa. 234; Lee v. Vacuum Oil Co., 54 Hun, 156, 7 N. Y. Supp. 426.

In the case of the Goodlander Mill Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 63 Fed. 400, 11 C. C. A. 253, 27 L. R. A. 583, so much relied on by the counsel of the plaintiff in error, it was held that crude petroleum was not essentially and in its elements dangerous, and that under the facts of that case—which are in some respects similar to the case under consideration—the Standard Oil Company was not liable for the destruction of the property of a third person. It was not denied, however, in that case, that it was the duty of the shipper, under its contract with the purchaser or consignee of the crude petroleum, to so equip its car that its contents might be safely discharged in the ordinary way by the exercise of due care. Under that decision it was the duty of the Standard Oil Company, in shipping the naphtha to the city of Richmond, even if gas naphtha be no more dangerous than crude petroleum, to so equip its car that the naphtha could be safely discharged in the ordinary way by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the city. If it owed this duty to the city, why did it not owe it to Wakefield and the other employes of the city, whose duty it was to unload the naphtha? for the oil company must have known that when the car arrived at the city gasworks it would have to be unloaded by the servants of the city. It knew that the purchaser or consignee of the naphtha, a municipal corporation, could only act through its employes. Having this knowledge, even if the naphtha was not so highly dangerous that the oil company owed to the public generally the duty of exercising ordinary care in shipping it, it at least owed that duty to the employes of the city whose duty it was to unload the oil, so that they might do so in the ordinary way with safety.

Shearman & Red. on Neg. § 116, state the doctrine which should govern in cases like this as follows: "Negligence which consists merely in a breach of contract will not afford ground for an action by any one except a party to the contract, or a person for whose benefit the contract was avowedly made. * * * But where, in omitting to perform a contract in whole or in part, one also omits to use ordinary care to avoid injury to third persons, who, as he could with a slight degree of care foresee, would be exposed to risk by his negligence, he should be held liable to such persons for injuries which are the proximate result of such omission."

Thompson, in his late work on Negligence, vol. 1, § 821, after citing cases illustrating the liability of vendors of dangerous goods, says that: "The doctrine of these cases, stated in a general way, is that, if a person sells goods, chattels, or machinery which possess some concealed defect, or tendency to do harm, such as will, according to the probabilities of ordinary experience, do harm to innocent persons, he must respond in damages if such harm ensue without the intervention of the negligence or fault of others; and upon principle it would be immaterial whether the knowledge of the concealed vice or defect was withheld from the purchaser through the vendor's unskillfulness, ignorance or fraud."

Watson (the author of the work on Damages for Personal Injuries), in his article on "Negligence" in the Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, vol. 21, pp. 461, 462, states the rule as follows: "Where there has been negligence in the construction or preparation of the article sold or supplied—that is, where, under the circumstances, injuries to the other contracting party or third persons might reasonably have been anticipated as a result of defects or errors therein—the question of privity of contract seems wholly immaterial. The liability depends upon the rule of natural and proximate cause and contemplation of consequences."

The reason upon which the rule, as stated by those text-writers, is based, is clearly and strongly stated by Brett, M. R. (afterwards Lord Esher) in his dissenting opinion in Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 503. "Every one," he says, "ought, by the universally recognized rules of right and wrong, to think so much with regard to the safety of others who might be jeopardized by his conduct; and if, being in such circumstances, he does not think, and in consequence neglects, or if he neglects to use ordinary care and skill and injury ensues, the law, which takes cognizance of and enforces the rules of right and wrong, will force him to give indemnity for the injury. * * * The proposition which these recognized cases suggest, and which is therefore to be deduced from them, is that whenever one person is, by circumstances, placed in such a position with regard to another that every one of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognize that, if he did not use ordinary care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances, he would cause danger of injury to the person or the property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such injury."

The next question is, was the oil company's negligence, if established, the proximate cause of Wakefield's death?

It is insisted that, while the condition of the valve was in a sense the cause of the injury, the intervening and independent act of the city in its effort to unload the car was the efficient cause by which the negligent act of the oil company was rendered effective in producing the injury, which was not the probable and natural cause of its act. Whilst the act of the city in taking the cap off the discharge pipe was an act intervening between the negligence of the oil company and the injury, was it such an intervening cause as excused that company?

It is said by Shearman & Red. on Neg. § 32—and their statement seems to be fully sustained by decided cases—that: "In order to excuse the defendant, however, this intervening cause must be either a superseding or a responsible cause. It is a superseding cause, whether intelligent or not, if it so entirely supersedes the operation of the defendant's negligence that it alone, without his negligence contributing thereto in the slightest degree, produces the injury. It is a responsible one if it is the culpable act of a human being who is legally responsible for such act."

It is conceded and is clear that the city's act in attempting to unload the car was not a superseding cause. The city's act was one for which it was legally responsible, but was it a culpable act? It was not under the averments of the declaration, and there was evidence tending to sustain these averments, if the act of the city was one which might, in the natural or ordinary course, be anticipated as not entirely impossible, and the oil company's negligence was an essential link in the chain of causation. 1 Shear. & Red. on Neg. § 32; 1 Thompson on Neg. § 55; Watson on Damages for Personal Injuries, §§ 45, 75.

The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, in Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136, 139, states the rule on this subject as follows: "The act of a third person intervening and contributing a condition necessary to the injurious effect of the original negligence, will not excuse the first wrongdoer if such act ought to have been foreseen. The original negligence still remains a culpable direct cause of the injury. The test is to be found in the probable injurious consequences which were to be anticipated, not in the number of subsequent events and agencies which might arise." See Watts v. So Bell Telephone Co., 100 Va. 45, 40 S. E. 107.

"In view of the rule," says Thompson on Neg. § 49, "that the question whether a given injury was the proximate or remote result of an antecedent wrong, is generally a question of fact for the jury, it is perceived that the rule last announced [that of the Massachusetts court quoted] is the rule of common sense and practical justice."

The intervening act of the city in attempting to unload the car was not only one which might, in the natural and ordinary course of things, be anticipated, but was one which the oil company knew would occur, for it was a necessary act in order to unload the car in the usual and ordinary way. We are of opinion, therefore, that the averments of the declaration in the second and fourth counts stated a case which showed that the oil company owed Wakefield the duty of exercising ordinary care to see that the valve was in a reasonably safe and proper condition, and that its alleged negligence in that respect was the proximate cause of his death.

It is unnecessary to decide whether or not the first and third counts, which did not charge that Wakefield was an employé of the city of Richmond, stated a good cause of action, as the case made by the evidence showed that he was an employé of the city, and was applicable to those counts alone. To reverse the case, even if we were of opinion that the first and third counts did not state a good cause of action, and to remand the case for a new trial upon the second and third counts, would be reversing for a mere technical error, which in no way prejudiced the oil company, if there be no other error in the proceedings.

The third and remaining ground of defense relied on by the oil company is that, even if it had been guilty of negligence, Wakefield was guilty of contributory negligence.

Under the facts of the case, as already briefly stated, this was clearly a question for the jury.

This brings us to a consideration of the assignment of error to the action of the court in instructing the jury.

The giving of instruction No. 1 offered by the plaintiff, and the refusal of the court to give instruction No. 30 offered by the defendant oil company, are assigned as errors. These instructions involved the question of the duty which the oil company owed to the plaintiff's intestate. As the court's action in giving the one and refusing the other was in accord with the view hereinbefore expressed in discussing that question, no further notice need be taken of those assignments of error.

The refusal of the court to give instruction No. 31 offered by the oil company is also assigned as error. By this instruction the court was asked to tell the jury that they must disregard all the evidence tending to show that the escape of the naphtha was due to the condition of the valve. What has heretofore been said in discussing the question of proximate cause shows that the court properly refused that instruction.

The giving of instructions Nos. 4 and 5 offered by the plaintiff is assigned as error; the former because there was no evidence upon which to base it, and the latter because the evidence upon which it was based was the knowledge of Bowen, the foreman of the oil company's warehouse at Manchester, and whose duty it was to load the tank cars, and his knowledge of the conditions under which the tank cars were to be unloaded at the city gasworks was not notice to the oil company of those conditions. It was Bowen's duty to supervise the filling of the tank cars for delivery to purchasers. He had been at the gasworks one or more times to aid in unloading a car in which a valve was frozen, under an understanding with the city or the superintendent of the gasworks to notify the oil company's people at the warehouse when assistance was needed in unloading leaking tanks. He knew, or had the opportunity of knowing, the conditions under which the cars were unloaded at the gasworks. The general rule is that knowledge acquired by the agents of corporations when acting within the scope of their agency becomes notice to or knowledge of the corporation for all judicial purposes. Thompson's article on "Corporations" in 10 Cyc. L. & P. p. 1064.

The knowledge of Bowen, which the instruction in question treated as notice to the oil company, was acquired whilst performing duties for that company, and, it would seem, within the scope of his agency. The evidence tended to sustain the hypothesis upon which each of the instructions (4 and 5) was based, and the court did not err in giving them.

A number of other errors are assigned to the action of the court in giving and refusing to give instructions asked for, but it is simply impossible in an opinion of reasonable length to discuss in detail all of the numerous objections made to the action of the court in dealing with more than 30 instructions, and covering over 13 pages of the printed record. We have considered at length what seems to us to be the more important errors assigned. As to the others it is sufficient to say that we have fully considered them, and are of the opinion that the instructions given fairly submitted the case to the jury, that the court did not err in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury, that we see no error in the case to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error, and that the judgment complained of should be affirmed.

RICHMOND & P. ELECTRIC RY. CO. v. RUBIN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

STREET RAILROADS—ELECTRICITY—TROLLEY WIRES—INTERSECTING LINES—FIRE—LIABILITY—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—WITNESSES—LEADING QUESTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR—EXPERT TESTIMONY—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. Where plaintiff's goods were burned by fire caused by an electric current introduced by telephone wires coming in contact with the live wires of an intersecting railway line, the question whether the defendant railway company used due care in the construction of its line, intersecting the telephone line, was for the jury.

2. It was immaterial to plaintiff's right of recovery whether the defendant company or the telephone company had the prior or superior right in erecting their respective wires, as it was the duty of both to exercise due care to see that their wires did not come in contact.

3. Where, in an action against a street railway company for fire caused by the alleged negligent manner in which it constructed its wires at a point where they intersected telephone wires connecting with plaintiff's building, the manner in which the telephone line had been constructed was before the jury, it was not error to refuse to instruct that the law presumed that the telephone company in erecting its line used all ordinary precautions for making its wires safe.

4. Plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to use a device to be attached to telephone wires entering houses to guard against the admission of an unusual and dangerous flow of electricity.

5. When and under what circumstances a leading question may be put is in the discretion of the trial court, and, as a general rule, is a matter which cannot be assigned as error.

6. Any error in permitting a leading question was harmless where the witness had already testified to the matter called for by the question.

7. Evidence showing by which party a witness was summoned is admissible to show that that party thought him worthy of credence.

8. In an action for damages from fire on electric wires, an expert witness was asked whether or not a certain kind of fuse was in common use, and answered that he did not know. On the next day he was called, and asked if he had made inquiries about its use, and whether or not he could make any statement in addition to that made the day before. Held, that his knowledge on the subject was not of such a character as to fit him to answer the question.

9. The answer expected to a question which is not permitted to be answered must be shown in the bill of exceptions.

Error to Circuit Court, Chesterfield County.

Action by Harry J. Rubin against the Richmond & Petersburg Electric Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

William L. Royall, for plaintiff in error.
P. V. Cogbill and D. L. Pulliam, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. Harry J. Rubin instituted his action of trespass on the case to recover damages for the burning of his stock of goods, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the Richmond & Petersburg Electric Railway Company. Upon the trial of the cause there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and to that judgment the railway company obtained this writ of error.

The first error assigned is the action of the trial court in refusing to give the defendant company's instruction numbered 4, which is as follows:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the fire which consumed plaintiff's store was not caused by defendant's agents moving the poles of the Long Distance Telephone Company of Virginia, or otherwise weakening the wires of the said Long Distance Telephone Company so that one or more of them broke and fell upon the wires of the defendant, and took up and carried from them electricity to plaintiff's store, thereby setting fire to it; and if they further believe from the evidence that when defendant, in constructing its railway line, reached the turnpike where its wires had to intersect with the wires of the Long Distance Telephone Company of Virginia it found the line of the said telephone company properly constructed, and with wires as good and as strong as are usually used in the construction of long distance telephone lines in the country; and if they further believe from the evidence that defendant, in running its wires under the wires of said Long Distance Telephone Company, placed them far enough from those wires to avoid risk of contact between them by reason of said telephone wires sagging from natural causes—then they are instructed that defendant was under no obligation to erect guard wires or other safeguards between its wires and the wires of said telephone company. And if they further believe from the evidence that the wires of said Long Distance Telephone Company of Virginia were broken by a sleet caused by a storm so violent and extraordinary that the history of climatic variations and other conditions in this region afforded no reasonable warning of it, and that, being thus broken, they fell on the defendant's wires, and took up from them electricity, which they carried to plaintiff's store, and thereby set it on fire, then they are instructed that defendant is not liable for its electricity being so carried to plaintiff's store, and their verdict should be for defendant, unless the wire broke at a place where defendant's agents cut and mended the same."

By this instruction the court was asked to tell the jury, among other things, that, as a matter of law, the defendant company, in running its wires under the telephone wires, was under no obligations to erect guard wires, or other safeguards, between its wires and the telephone wires, provided the distance between them was sufficient to avoid contact between them by reason of the sagging of the telephone wires, if they believed the telephone line was properly constructed, and its wires as good and as strong as are generally used in the construction of long distance telephone lines in the country. It is true, as insisted by counsel for the defendant company, that in the construction and maintenance of its wires under the telephone wires it was only required to exercise reasonable or ordinary care. But what is reasonable or ordinary care is to be graduated and determined by the danger under all the circumstances of the case. The danger to persons and property from permitting a telephone wire to come into contact with a trolley wire heavily charged with electricity is very great, and the care required to avoid such contact must be commensurate with the danger. 1 Thompson on Neg. (2d Ed.) §§ 797, 804; Joyce on Electricity, § 445.

The fact that the defendant company had legislative authority to operate an electric railway did not lessen its duty to exercise a degree of care proportionate to the danger to be avoided. A steam railway company has legislative authority to employ the powerful and dangerous agency of steam, but that does not make it any the less incumbent upon such company to avail itself of the best mechanical contrivances and inventions in known practical use, which are effectual in preventing the burning of private property by the escape of sparks and coals from its engines, and it is liable for injuries caused by its omissions to use them. Brighthope Ry. Co. v. Rogers, 76 Va. 443, 450. The agency by which an electric railway operates its cars is certainly as dangerous as steam, and at least as high a degree of care should be required of such a company as is imposed upon a steam railroad company.

Many accidents occur which are caused by the current of high tension wires being transmitted through low tension wires when such wires come into contact by sagging or breaking. "The number of such accidents," says Thompson on Negligence, vol. 1, § 804, "raises the obvious conclusion that the exercise of reasonable care, which is graduated to the danger, demands in this relation a very high and exact measure of foresight, skill, diligence, and inspection." Joyce on Electricity, § 445. To guard against such danger, guard wires, insulation, and other devices are frequently employed; and where a company negligently fails to maintain such devices between its trolley wires and telephone wires, and injuries result from telephone wires coming in contact with its trolley wires, it becomes responsible for such injuries, its negligence being the proximate cause of the accident. 1 Thompson on Neg. §§ 805-807; Joyce on Electricity, §§ 517a, 445; 1 Shear. & Red. on Neg. § 698.

The defendant introduced witnesses more or less experienced in the construction and maintenance of electric lines, who testified that they had never known guard wires to be permanently used to prevent telephone wires from coming into contact with trolley wires. Their evidence did not establish the fact that such was the general usage or custom of ordinarily prudent persons engaged in the business of operating electric lines. If it had, it would not have brought the case within the doctrine laid down in Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin's Adm'r, 93 Va. 791; 22 S. E. 869, as the counsel for plaintiff in error contends.

In this case the defendant was using a highly dangerous motive power, and, as we have seen, as in the use of steam power, it was its duty to avail itself of the best mechanical contrivances and inventions in practical use which are effectual in preventing injury to private property from its wires coming into contact with the telephone wires. Such a high degree of care is not incumbent upon the master towards his servant. "The master," say Shearman & Redfield (1 Shear. & Red. on Neg. § 195)—and this is well settled law—"is not required to use more than ordinary care and diligence (as already defined) for the protection of his servants, under circumstances which would entitle a passenger or stranger to the use of great or extreme care. * * * The master is not bound to provide the very best materials, implements, or accommodations which can be procured; nor those which are absolutely the most convenient and most safe. His duty is discharged by providing those which are reasonably safe and fit." Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, supra; Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Cromer's Adm'r, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. 54. See, also, Thompson on Neg. §§ 30-32.

Whether or not the defendant had exercised the proper degree of care in guarding its wires from coming into contact with the telephone wires was a question for the jury, to be determined by all the facts and circumstances of the case, under the instructions of the court. The question of negligence or due care is one peculiarly within the province of the jury, and cannot be established as a matter of law by a state of facts about which reasonably fair-minded men may differ. Carrington v. Ficklin's Ex'rs, 32 Gr. 670; Kimball & Fink v. Friend's Adm'r, 95 Va. 140, etc., 27 S. E. 901.

The question of whether or not the breaking of the telephone wire and its contact with the trolley wire were caused by a storm so extraordinary in its character as to amount to an "act of God," upon which the court was asked to instruct in the latter part of instruction No. 4, was properly submitted to the jury by other instructions given by the court.

The second assignment of error is the giving of instruction "AA" by the court on its own motion. The objection made to it is that it left to the jury to say whether or not, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, the defendant had exercised due care in guarding its wires from contact with the wires of the telephone company. That was a question for the jury, as we have seen in considering the defendant's instruction No. 4, and, as instruction "AA" properly submitted that question to them, there was no error in giving it.

The third error assigned is the refusal of the court to give the defendant's instruction No. 10. By that instruction the court was asked to tell the jury that, if the right of the defendant to erect its wires at the point where they intersected with the telephone line was prior to that of the telephone company, it was under no obligation to put up a guard wire between its wires and the telephone wires, and that, if they further believed that the telephone wires fell upon the wires of the defendant, and took from them electricity which was carried to and destroyed the plaintiff's store, the defendant was not responsible for the fire and loss thus caused, unless the telephone wires broke where the defendant's agents cut and mended the same.

This instruction was properly rejected. It was wholly immaterial to the plaintiff's right of recovery whether the defendant company or the telephone company had the prior or superior right in erecting their respective wires. It was the duty of both to exercise due care to see that their wires did not come in contact, and, if the defendant failed to do this, it was liable for the consequences of its negligence. 1 Thompson on Neg. § 805; Joyce on Electricity, § 517.

The refusal of the court to give the defendant's instructions numbered 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 is assigned as error. Instructions 5, 6, and 7 define the measure of the defendant's duty in guarding against its wires and those of the telephone company coming into contact, and are in conflict with what we have seen, in discussing the defendant's instruction No. 4, is the correct rule on the subject, and were therefore properly refused.

By instruction No. 8 the court was asked to tell the jury that the law presumed that the telephone company, in erecting its line, used all the ordinary precautions for making its wires safe, so that they would not cause injury to its clients and customers. The manner in which the telephone line had been constructed was before the jury, and artificial presumptions do not generally come into play where the evidence shows the conditions under which an accident occurs. 1 Thompson on Neg. § 482. The instruction was properly refused.

By instruction No. 9 the court was asked to instruct the jury that if they believed, from the evidence, that at the time of the accident there was in common use a device to be attached to telephone wires entering houses, which was an effectual guard against the admission of an unusual and dangerous flow of electricity, and that the plaintiff had failed to use such device, then the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and could not recover.

"As there is a natural presumption that every one will act with due care (in the absence of evidence to the contrary)," say Shearman & Redfield in their work on Negligence, § 92, "it cannot be imputed to the plaintiff as negligence that he did not anticipate culpable negligence on the part of the defendant or a stranger. He has the right to assume that every one else will obey the law (including not only the common law, but also statutes or city ordinances), and to act upon that belief." Ordinarily prudent men would scarcely think it necessary, when they have telephones placed in their houses, to use devices to prevent their property from being destroyed by an unusual and dangerous flow of electricity, transmitted to the telephone wire by the negligence of an electric railway company in allowing its heavily charged wires to come into contact with the telephone wire. Clearly, the failure of the plaintiff to guard against such a contingency was not contributory negligence as a matter of law, as the defendant's instruction made it.

The next assignment of error is to the action of the court in giving its own instruction "BB" and the instructions "A," "B," "C," "D," and "E," asked for by the plaintiff. The objection made to each and all of these instructions is that they made the jury the judges of whether or not the defendant exercised reasonable care in guarding against contact between its wires and those of the telephone company. This was manifestly a question for the jury, for the reasons given in discussing the defendant's instruction No. 4.

In stating his case to the jury, plaintiff's counsel made certain statements as to what he expected to prove, which were objected to by the defendant on the ground that there were no averments in the declaration which authorized such proof. The action of the court in permitting such statement to be made is assigned as error.

There is no merit in this objection, as the averments in the declaration clearly entitled the plaintiff to put in evidence the facts which his counsel stated he expected to prove.

Another assignment of error is to the action of the court in allowing the following question to be asked, upon the ground that it was leading, viz.: "As an expert, state whether or not, if a telephone wire, which was a copper one, had been spliced with an iron wire, would it not have been a defective way to have done it?" When, and under what circumstances, a leading question may be put, is in the discretion of the trial court, and, as a general rule, is a matter which cannot be assigned as error. 1 Greenleaf on Ev. (Redfield's Ed.) § 435. But, if it could be, no injury resulted to the defendant in allowing the question to be asked, since the witness had already testified that an iron wire and a copper one would not splice well.

During the examination of a witness, who was put upon the stand by the plaintiff, he was asked if he was not summoned by the defendant. He answered that he did not know. The clerk of the court was then called upon to see if the witness was not so summoned, whereupon the counsel for the defendant admitted that he was, but afterwards moved the court to strike out the admission. The court overruled the motion, and this is assigned as error.

The plaintiff was entitled to have the fact admitted in evidence as tending to show that the defendant thought the witness was worthy of credence by having him summoned, and the court properly refused to strike out the admission.

Another error assigned is the refusal of the court to allow the witness Tucker to answer a question propounded to him as an expert. The witness was asked on one day of the trial whether or not a certain kind of fuse was in common use, and answered that he did not know. On the next day he was put upon the stand, and asked if he had made inquiries about its use, and whether or not he could make any statement in addition to that made on the day before as to the fuse being in general use in February, 1902. This question was objected to, and the court refused to allow it to be answered, upon the ground that the witness' expert knowledge on the subject was not of such a character as to fit him to answer the question.

The court's ruling was plainly right; but, if it were not, the exception could not be considered, since the bill of exceptions does not show what the answer of the witness would have been if he had been permitted to answer. He may have known no more on the subject on that day than he did the day before. A judgment will not be reversed because evidence has been excluded or rejected by the trial court, unless its materiality be made to appear. Union Central Life Ins. Co. v. Pollard, 94 Va. 146, 157, 26 S. E. 421, 36 L. R. A. 271, 64 Am. St. Rep. 715; Kimball & Fink v. Carter, 95 Va. 77, 80, 27 S. E. 823, 38 L. R. A. 570.

The refusal of the court to strike out certain answers of Nunnally and Martin, witnesses for the plaintiff, because the answers were immaterial, is assigned as error. It is unnecessary to decide whether or not the court erred in not excluding the evidence in question, as it is clear that it could not have affected the verdict of the jury.

The remaining assignment of error is the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict because not warranted by the evidence. There were two theories as to the cause of the fire which destroyed the plaintiff's goods. One—that of the defendant—was that the storehouse caught on fire from the stove which was in it, and there was some evidence tending to sustain that contention, but the great weight of evidence tended to show that there had been no fire in the store for some hours prior to the accident, and that the building did not catch on fire from that source. The other theory was that the storehouse was set on fire by the telephone wire when it fell upon or came in contact with the defendant's wires. The evidence, which covers more than 200 pages in the printed record, sustained that theory, and fully justified the jury in reaching the conclusion they did.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that there is no error in the record to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error, and that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

BALTIMORE & O. R. CO. v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF ALEXANDRIA.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

CHECKS — ASSIGNMENT—NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW.

1. Under the direct provisions of section 189 of the negotiable instruments act, approved March 3, 1893 (Acts 1897-98, p. 917, c. 866), a check does not operate as an assignment of the fund on deposit, and the bank is not liable to the holder unless and until it accepts or certifies the check.

¶ 1. See Assignments, vol. 4, Cent. Dig. §§ 89, 91.

2. Under sections 182 and 185 (Acts 1897-98, pp. 911, 917, c. 866) the acceptance of a check must be in writing, and signed by the bank, in order to afford a cause of action against it.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Alexandria.

Action by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company against the First National Bank of Alexandria. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Hamilton & Colbert and Jas. R. & H. B. Caton, for plaintiff in error. Gardner L. Boothe and John M. Johnson, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. The plaintiff in error brought its action of trespass on the case in assumpsit in the circuit court of the city of Alexandria against the First National Bank of Alexandria. The declaration contains numerous counts, the last of which embraces the ordinary money counts in assumpsit, and the others are special counts, identical in form with that given below, except as to names, dates and amounts:

"The plaintiff complains of the First National Bank of Alexandria, Va., defendant, which has been duly summoned to answer the plaintiff in this action, of a plea of trespass on the case, in assumpsit, for this, to wit: That heretofore, to wit, on the 1st day of October, 1900, in the city aforesaid, the firm of John P. Agnew & Co., depositors with the defendant, made their certain draft or order in writing for the payment of money, commonly called a check, bearing date a certain day and year therein mentioned, to wit, the day and year aforesaid, and then and there directed the said draft or order to the said defendant, and thereby required the said defendant to pay to the plaintiff, or order, the sum of two hundred and seventy-one and thirty one-hundredths dollars ($271.30), and then and there delivered the said draft or order to the said plaintiff; and the said plaintiff avers that after the making of the said draft or order, and before the payment of the said sum of money therein specified, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, at the city aforesaid, the said draft or order was presented and shown to the said defendant for payment thereof, and that the said defendant then and there, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, accepted the said draft or order, and promised the plaintiff to pay the same according to the tenor and effect thereof, and of its said acceptance thereof, but did not pay the same when due, although demanded by the plaintiff of the said defendant."

The defendant demurred to the declaration, but we prefer to deal with the questions of law arising upon the demurrer when we come to consider the instructions. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and the case was submitted to the jury, who found a verdict for the defendant, upon which the court entered judgment, and the case is before us upon exceptions to rulings made during the trial.

Although there is much conflict in the testimony, we shall consider the case as though the following facts were established: That the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company had a freight office at Alexandria; that D. P. Hurley was its agent, with authority to make collections of charges for the transmission of freights; that when freight bills were paid by check the checks were required to be made payable to the order of the company; that the checks sued on were presented to the bank, and paid upon the indorsement of D. P. Hurley, and the amounts thereof charged to the accounts of the drawers of the checks in the bank, and the checks returned to them on settlement of their accounts with the bank; that shortly after the date of the last check sued upon—that is to say, in the month of April, 1901—Hurley left the city of Alexandria while his accounts were under examination by the traveling auditor of the railroad company, which examination disclosed that he was short in his accounts a large sum for moneys received and unaccounted for by him; that Hurley was not authorized by the railroad company to indorse checks, and that it never received the money nor the benefit thereof from the checks sued upon; that it does not appear that the bank made any inquiry as to Hurley's authority to indorse checks or receive money thereon, nor as to the necessity therefor, or that the company had any knowledge that Hurley was in the habit of indorsing checks and collecting the proceeds thereof, until he absconded. Such being the facts, the court gave the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that they must believe from the evidence that the defendant had and received for the plaintiff the money claimed in the bill of particulars before they can find a verdict for the plaintiff; and although they may believe from the evidence that the checks in evidence were drawn on the First National Bank by depositors of said bank, who had sufficient funds to their credit in said bank to pay the same, and that in settlements between said bank and the said depositors the said bank charged said depositors with the amount of such checks, and it was allowed a credit for the payment of them, yet the court instructs the jury that such facts created no privity between the said bank and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, and there can be no recovery by the plaintiff against the defendant under the count for money had and received, even though they may believe from the evidence that the defendant paid the money on said checks to an unauthorized person; that is, to a person not entitled to receive the money on said checks."

That instruction traverses the plaintiff's en-

the cause of action. If it be a correct statement of the law, no other conclusion was possible than that arrived at by the judgment under review. The instruction presents questions upon which there has been much diversity of opinion among courts and text-writers, but which have, in our judgment, been set at rest by the act of assembly entitled "An act to revise, arrange and consolidate as one act the laws relating to negotiable instruments (being an act to establish a law uniform with the laws of other states on that subject)," approved March 3, 1898 (Acts 1897-98, p. 896, c. 886).

Section 127 (page 911) of that act declares that: "A bill of itself does not operate as an assignment of the funds in the hands of the drawee available for the payment thereof, and the drawee is not liable on the bill unless and until he accepts the same." Section 132 provides that: "The acceptance of a bill is the signification by the drawee of his assent to the order of the drawer. The acceptance must be in writing and signed by the drawee. It must not express that the drawee will perform his promise by any other means than the payment of money." Section 135 (page 917) declares that: "A check is a bill of exchange drawn on a bank payable on demand. Except as herein otherwise provided, the provisions of this act applicable to a bill of exchange payable on demand apply to a check." And section 139 is as follows: "A check of itself does not operate as an assignment of any part of the funds to the credit of the drawer with the bank, and the bank is not liable to the holder, unless and until it accepts or certifies the check."

Now, if there be any virtue in that law, the checks in question did not assign to the holder the funds, or any part thereof, of their respective drawers on deposit with the defendant; nor could it have that effect unless and until the checks were certified; and section 135 expressly declares that the provisions of that act with respect to bills of exchange payable on demand shall apply with equal force to checks; and, turning to section 132, already quoted, we find that the acceptance must be in writing, and signed by the drawee, in order to constitute a cause of action by the holder against the bank.

This opinion might be greatly prolonged by citation of conflicting cases and a discussion of the discordant views entertained by courts and text-writers of the greatest ability upon these questions; but the object, as we understand it, of the codification of the law with respect to negotiable instruments, was to relieve the courts of this duty, and to render certain and unambiguous that which had theretofore been doubtful and obscure, so that the business of the commercial world, largely transacted through the agency of negotiable paper, might be conducted in obedience to a written law emanating from a source whose authority admits of no question.

We are of opinion that the instruction com-forms to the provisions of the statute, and that it concludes the case in favor of the defendant in error.

NEWPORT NEWS & O. P. RY. & ELECTRIC CO. v. HAMPTON ROADS RY. & ELECTRIC CO. (two cases).

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — STREET RAILWAYS — CONTROL OF STREETS — VESTED RIGHTS — COMPETING LINES — ORDINANCE — LIMITATION OF TIME FOR COMPLETING LINE — RIGHT TO TAKE ADVANTAGE OF BREACH.

1. Where a street railway company has lines of railway constructed in territory under authority of the board of county supervisors, and the territory is subsequently incorporated as a city, the control of the streets, including those on which railway lines have been built, passes from the board of supervisors to the municipal authorities.

2. Where a street railway company merely has permission for the laying of a double track on a street which is subsequently included within the limits of a city, but the company took no advantage of the right to lay a double track, and used a single track, in disobedience of the orders of the city authorities, it has no vested rights which will prevent the city from granting to another street railway company the right to put down a double-track car line on the street.

3. Where a street railway company had the right to put down a track for the operation of its lines within a limited time, but failed to put the track down in the time limited, the waiver of the forfeiture of the company's franchise by the state or municipality is not the granting of a new right.

4. Where the failure to complete a street railway within the time limited for its construction is due to an injunction being granted against the company by a competitor, the right to put down the line is not lost by the expiration of the period limited.

5. The failure to complete a street railway line within the time limited for its construction cannot be taken advantage of in a private action by a competitor to enjoin construction of the line, but any forfeiture can be enforced only on behalf of the public at the election of the state.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Elizabeth City County.

Suits by the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company against the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company, and by the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company against the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company, heard together. From a decree for defendant in the first suit, and complainant in the second, the Newport News Company appeals. Affirmed.

S. Gordon Cumming, for appellant. R. G. Bickford, Thos. W. Shelton, and W. J. Nelms, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. In October, 1898, the Newport News, Hampton & Old Point Railway Company was the owner of an electric street railway between the city of Newport

News and the federal reservation at Old Point, which passes through the said city, portions of the counties of Warwick and Elizabeth City, and of the town of Hampton. Its system consisted of a single track, with occasional turn-outs and switches, and a branch line extending from the main line, a distance of about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, to Buckroe Beach, a summer resort. In the month of October, 1898, the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company, for a valuable consideration, purchased all and singular, the rights, privileges, franchises, and properties of the said Newport News, Hampton & Old Point Railway Company, and immediately after its purchase began to improve its property, preparing plans for the eventual double-tracking of the entire system.

This new company obtained a franchise to double-track and parallel itself in the city of Newport News. In May, 1899, it obtained from the council of the town of Hampton the right to construct and operate an additional street railway track on, over, and along Armistead avenue and Queen street—being the streets theretofore occupied by a single track—and during the same month (May, 1899) obtained from the board of supervisors of Elizabeth City county the right to double-track where there had been theretofore a single track, "from Gatewood's corner to Libby's corner, on Mellen street; on, over and along the county road now occupied by said company." A portion of this latter grant from the board of supervisors was over certain county roads and streets, which on April 1, 1900, became part of the town of Phoebus, which town was incorporated by an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, approved January 22, 1900, and in force on and after April 1, 1900. Acts 1899-1900, p. 98.

That portion of the route authorized to be double-tracked by the board of supervisors, described as "from Gatewood's corner to Libby's corner, on Mellen street," is a distance of 7,176 feet. The distance from Gatewood's corner to the corporation line of the town of Phoebus is 2,994 feet—approximately one-third the entire double route granted by the board of supervisors of Elizabeth City county—and from the corporate line to the intersection of Mallory and County streets is 2,401 feet, and from the intersection of Mallory and Mellen streets to Libby's corner, in Mellen street, is 1,681 feet. The Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company has maintained a switch or turnout on Mallory street, between Mellen and County streets, thus affording a double track of this block; and prior to January 1, 1900, it, acting under the authority of the order of the board of supervisors, had double-tracked, and was operating its cars on such double track, from Gatewood's corner to the intersection of County and Mallory streets, but it did not at that time, nor up to the beginning of this litigation, double-track the bed of Mellen street, as it had leased a piece of track running on County street, one block distant from Mellen street, from the Citizens' Railway, Light & Power Company, and was using that for the return route for its cars from Old Point to Hampton, and now owns the track on County street. So that at the beginning of this litigation the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company had not exercised the right conferred upon it by the order of the board of supervisors to lay a double track in Mellen street, but for more than a year had only operated thereon a single track, upon which its cars ran in going to Old Point from Newport News, and in returning 'passed over and along County street, one block from Mellen street, and in the meantime had taken up its old track, and replaced it with new rails as a single track, and thereby indicated its purpose to continue to run its cars in only one direction along Mellen street. At the session of the General Assembly of Virginia of 1899-1900 (Acts 1899-1900, p. 495) the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company was granted a charter, and authorized to construct and operate, or otherwise acquire, a line of street railway in the city of Newport News, the town of Hampton, in the town of Phoebus, and in the counties of Elizabeth City and Warwick; and it has constructed the larger portion of its line, through the agency of the Vandegrift Construction Company. In December, 1900, this last-named company was granted by the council of the town of Phoebus the right to construct and operate a double-track street railway system within the limits of the said town, over certain streets therein, designated as "beginning on Mallory street, opposite Segar street, a double track on, over and along Mallory street from the said Segar street to the farthest side of Mellen street from said starting point; a double track on, over and along Mellen street from Mallory street to and across Water street, and into Mill Creek as far as the boundary line of the town of Phoebus extends. * * * For the purposes herein named, said company is hereby authorized and empowered to parallel or straddle any existing track upon said streets, or that may be placed upon the same hereafter. * * * The said company shall, unless prevented by the mandate of the highest court having cognizance of the litigation (should there be any) operate at least one track along the streets above mentioned, and all of its cars bound in a westerly direction shall go over said line. * * * And if it shall be finally determined that the said company has the legal right to operate a double-track street railway on Mellen and Mallory streets, then that part hereof which permits the said company to operate a railway on Segar street and Willard avenue shall become null and void six months from the date of such final determination * * * unless the said railway company shall operate a fifteen minutes' schedule on said Mallory, Mellen and Segar streets, and Willard avenue," etc.

Under the provisions of section 8 of the above-mentioned ordinance, it was provided that the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company commence its work in Phoebus within one year, and that its road be completed within two years from January 1, 1901; and in December, 1901, shortly before the expiration of the first year, and before it had begun any work within a mile and a half of Mellen street, the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company began to lay its track on Mellen street on both sides of the existing single track of the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company, whereupon the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company enjoined the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company and the Vandegrift Construction Company from proceeding with this work, upon the ground that it would constitute a deprivation of the vested rights of the complainant. Upon the granting of this injunction the general manager of the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company on the next day put a force of men to work tearing up the work done by the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company, and to install a double track on Mellen street, whereupon it was enjoined by the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company. By the terms of the injunction order granted the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company against the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company and the Vandegrift Construction Company, it was subject to dissolution on a hearing after 24 hours' notice, but no steps were taken to dissolve either of the injunctions until 1903, when the two causes were brought on to be heard together in vacation before the learned judge of the circuit court of Elizabeth City county, and by decree then entered the injunction theretofore awarded the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company was dissolved, and the injunction awarded the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company against the first-named company was continued. It is from this decree that the case is now before us for review, upon an appeal allowed the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company.

The decision of the case turns upon whether or not the appellant, by reason of the grant to it by the board of supervisors of Elizabeth City county, had a prior and exclusive vested right to use and occupy Mellen street with a double-track system of electric railway. The purpose of the ordinance of the council of Phoebus in conferring the rights it did upon the appellee company was to obtain a better system of electric car service on Mellen street, to meet the needs of the traveling public and business interests in the town of Phoebus. The council of Phoebus on April 27, 1900, requested the president of the appellant company to so order the running of its cars that those from Old Point might run along Mellen street, so as to give a more satisfactory car service on that street, but no attention was paid to this request, and the original method of running the cars was persisted in, certainly up to the time this litigation began.

The only authority the board of supervisors of Elizabeth City county had to confer the right upon appellant to occupy with its tracks any of the roads or streets within the limits of the county grows out of the terms of the charter of appellant, which provides that, before appellant could occupy the county roads and highways in the counties of Elizabeth City and Warwick, the consent of the board of supervisors of the respective counties should be first obtained to the location of the line or lines on the streets and highways within their respective limits and jurisdictions. The fifth section of the charter by which the company is authorized to locate its line or lines on the streets and highways in the counties and towns through which it proposed to run its line or lines provides that it might be done "after having first obtained the franchise or permission so to do from the duly constituted authorities," and further provides that "for the purposes of this act the said company shall and is hereby expressly invested with all the powers, rights, privileges and franchises conferred, and subject to all the restrictions imposed by chapter 40 of the Code of Virginia of 1887, and the acts of the General Assembly of Virginia amendatory thereof, and other laws of the State of Virginia as far as applicable." Section 1093 of the Code of 1887, which is in chapter 46, above referred to, is as follows:

"Sec. 1093. Streets," etc., "of City or Town not to be Occupied without Their Assent—Damages to Lots to be Paid Owners. No company shall cross or occupy with its works the streets or alleys, public or private, of any city or town, without the assent of the corporate authorities thereof, unless such assent be dispensed with by special provision of law; and in case any lot or lots along the line of such streets or alleys, shall by such occupation or crossing, be impaired in value, such company shall before crossing or occupying such streets or alleys, make compensation therefor to the owner of the same; said compensation, if the parties cannot agree upon the same, to be ascertained in the mode prescribed by this chapter."

This section indicates an adherence to the general policy of this state to require municipal consent to the occupancy of its streets by a railway company. In accordance with this policy, it was held in Wash., Alex. & Mt. V. Ry. Co. v. City Council of Alexandria, 98 Va. 344, 36 S. E. 385, that the power of a city to control and regulate its streets is an inherent and a continuing power, to be exercised as often as and whenever the city council may think proper, subject only to the limitation that it must act in good faith, and that the regulation must be reasonable, and not imposed arbitrarily or capriciously; the presumption being in favor of the propriety and validity of what the city has directed to be done.

In R. F. & P. R. R. Co. v. City of Richmond, 26 Grat. 83, it is said the right of a municipality to control the use of the streets, and to provide for the safety, comfort, and general welfare of the citizens therein residing, is an inherent right. In that case, which was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States (96 U. S. 521, 24 L. Ed. 734), the decision of this court was affirmed, which held that the ordinance of the city of Richmond forbidding the use of steam engines upon its streets by the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company, though the railroad company had so used Broad street for many years, and claimed the right to continue such use by virtue of its contract with the city, was a valid exercise of the authority in the city to control the use of its streets; the court being of opinion that the ordinance did not impair any vested right conferred upon the company by its charter, nor deprive the company of its property without due process of law.

In Baltimore v. Baltimore Trust, etc., Co., 166 U. S. 673, 17 Sup. Ct. 696, 41 L. Ed. 1180, it was held that the right of a street railway company under an ordinance to lay tracks in the streets is subject to reasonable regulations by subsequent ordinances as to the use of the streets, and that, although a street railway company had been granted a franchise to lay a double track in a street, a subsequent ordinance restricting its right to the use of a single track is not an unreasonable restriction of the company's right, or a material modification of a prior ordinance granting the company permission to lay double tracks in the street for many miles, and that a failure to provide any compensation to the street railway company for taking up one track in the street in which it has laid a double track, after notice from the city authorities to permit but one track on the street, does not make the ordinance unreasonable. According to that case, which is a well-reasoned one, it would have been a valid exercise of the town council of Phœbus' discretion to provide that appellant should not lay a double track in Mellen street, even had that right been conferred by a previous ordinance of the town, and that it would not have been a violation of any vested right in appellant, growing out of the previous ordinance. The right of the board of supervisors to control Mellen street after it had been severed from the county of Elizabeth City and became a part of the territory within the limits of the town of Phœbus ceased, and the control of Mellen street was from that time as absolutely under the control of the town authorities of Phœbus as if the town had been incorporated before the charter of appellant was granted.

In Ogden City Ry. Co. v. Ogden City, 7 Utah, 207, 26 Pac. 288, the city granted the plaintiff railway company the right to lay a track in a street, and afterwards granted defendant the right to lay a double-track railway in the same street. Before defendants commenced work, plaintiff sued to enjoin them from laying their track, and to have the ordinance giving them a right of way declared void; alleging that it (plaintiff) had constructed a single track, and that, if it were to lay down its other track, and defendants their two tracks, other modes of public travel would be obstructed, and also that defendants' wires and poles would interfere with plaintiff's rights as the owner of property abutting on the street. Held, "that a demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained." This decision is in accordance with the principle enunciated in the authorities cited above—that a municipality has an inherent and continuing right to control and regulate the use of its streets within its limits.

In Henderson v. Ogden City Ry. Co., cited in the last-named case, the opinion says such railroads and their business are subject to the police power, which the government cannot divest itself of by contract or otherwise, and, being so possessed of it, it is its duty to make use of it whenever the public good demands that it shall. The Legislature did not authorize the city council of Ogden City to grant to the appellants the exclusive right of way upon the street in question, nor do we think it had the power to do it. 7 Utah, 199, 26 Pac. 286.

Whether the establishment of a double-track system of electric railway in a street, in addition to a single-track system already there, would unduly overcrowd the street and render it unsafe to travelers thereon, is a matter for the public to deal with, and not a competing corporation seeking to maintain a monopoly in the street. Grand Rapids Bridge Co. v. Prange, 35 Mich. 400, 24 Am. Rep. 585.

In Elliot on Roads & Streets, § 745, the learned author says: "There is some conflict in the decided cases upon the question of the power of the Legislature to grant an exclusive right to a street railway company to occupy and use a highway. Some authorities hold that the Legislature cannot create a monopoly by granting an exclusive privilege, and there is much reason for this doctrine. [Citing numerous authorities.] At all events, the construction should be liberal in favor of the public, and strict as against the corporation claiming an exclusive privilege or monopoly." Again, in section 746, the same author says: "The effect of a grant to use a designated part of a highway is to license the company first in point of time to occupy and use the designated space, but it does not follow from that that the statute creates a monopoly, since others may occupy other parts of the same highway." Again, in section 750, he says: "If the company which secures the first grant actually occupies the streets it is authorized to use, then there is much reason for affirming that its right to the part of the street actually occupied and used is paramount and exclusive. By actually taking possession of the street and using it for the accommodation of the public, the company first in point of time does such acts as vest its right. But to have this effect, the company, as it seems to us, must take possession in good faith, and for the purpose of constructing and operating such a railway as the grant contemplates. A colorable possession, taken solely for the purpose of keeping out other companies, and unaccompanied by acts indicating an intention to furnish reasonable facilities for the accommodation of the public, ought not to be regarded as sufficient to vest a right under the general license." In section 751 the same author, in discussing "when grant may be made to other companies," says: "We very much doubt whether a general grant which would prevent the Legislature or the municipal authorities from granting privileges to other companies would be valid in cases where the right to use the highway is left entirely to the licensee, for this, as we believe, would be a surrender of the police power, which the Constitution will not permit. The Legislature cannot bind itself not to legislate for the welfare of the public, and it would seem to follow that it cannot rightfully place itself in a position where it cannot make provision for the public necessities. If it cannot do this, then it cannot make a grant which leaves it entirely in the discretion of a private corporation to provide, or decline to provide, the facilities for travel upon the highways which are demanded by the public welfare. We think there is sufficient reason for affirming that the Legislature must retain the power to provide for the necessities of the public, and that a general grant to occupy highways is only effective when something is done vesting the right granted, and securing what the public requires. Until something is done vesting the granted privilege, it is within the legislative power to secure the welfare of the public by granting the necessary license to another company, although there may be a prior general grant."

In the case at bar the appellant for about 18 months had used only a single track on Mellen street—the cars thereon running but in one direction, and returning, as has been remarked, upon another street—and did no act indicating an intention to furnish reasonable facilities for the accommodation of the public on Mellen street, until appellee, in the exercise of the right conferred upon it by its charter and the ordinance of the council of Phoebus, began work in locating its tracks upon Mellen street, and had been enjoined at the suit of the appellant from further proceeding with its work. There is nothing whatever in the charter of appellant, or in the permit granted it by the board of supervisors of Elizabeth City county, authorizing it to lay a double track upon Mellen street, that indicates an intention on the part of the granting power to confer upon appellant exclusive right to use and occupy Mellen street for the operation of a street-car line. There is nothing in the acts done by appellant indicating a purpose on its part to provide the necessary facilities for the traveling public on Mellen street, and, under the circumstances, the council of Phoebus was well warranted in the exercise of its right to promote the welfare of its citizens by conferring upon the appellee company the right to occupy the street with its tracks. If, as contended for appellant, the appellee has forfeited any of its rights under its charter or the ordinance of the town of Phoebus by reason of its failure to complete its line within the time limited in the charter or ordinance, the forfeiture could undoubtedly have been waived by the state of Virginia and the town of Phoebus, and the waiving of the forfeiture is not the granting of a new right. Therefore the provision of the new Constitution to which appellant refers does not apply. The charter of appellee has been so amended as to extend the time for the completion of the appellee's road to 1906, and section 9 of the franchise granted it by the town of Phoebus was so amended as to give two years and six months after January 1, 1901, in which to complete the work in that town. The construction of appellee's railway in Mellen street was stopped by the injunction sued out by the appellant. "Where the failure to complete the road is due to extrinsic causes, and in no wise the fault of the company—for example, by injunction.—* * * the right of the company is not lost." 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. of L. (old Ed.) 973-4. If from any cause appellee has forfeited its right to lay its tracks and operate its cars on and over Mellen street, such forfeiture cannot be taken advantage of in a private action, and can only be enforced on behalf of the public at the election of the state. Pixley v. Roanoke Nav. Co., 75 Va. 320; Grand Rapids, etc., Co. v. Prange, supra; People v. Albany & Ver. R. Co., 24 N. Y. 261, 82 Am. Dec. 295; Mackall v. C. & O. Canal Co., 94 U. S. 308, 24 L. Ed. 161; Nellis on St. Rys. 127.

It abundantly appears in the record that from the coming into existence of the appellee company it has been obstructed, wherever obstruction was possible, by the appellant company in the progress of its work at many points along its line, while in its failure to construct a double track on Mellen street the appellant company considered only the item of cost to itself, and the advantage to it in suppressing competition, and seems not to have considered the convenience or necessity of the traveling public in the town of Phoebus. The facts and circumstances surrounding appellant at the time this litigation was begun indicate that the public Interest was never even remotely considered.

The argument of the case has taken a very much wider range than the issues to be determined justify, and therefore we have not undertaken to consider all of the many questions discussed, nor to review the innumerable authorities cited.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the decree appealed from is right, and should be affirmed.

CITY OF RICHMOND et al. v. WILLIAMS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

TAXATION—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS—OWNER—LIENORS.

1. Creditors secured by a deed of trust are not the owners of the land, within the meaning of Act Feb. 19, 1892 (Acts 1891-92, p. 505, c. 312), providing that the owners shall be given notice and opportunity to be heard before assessments for improvements are levied against property.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Bill by C. U. Williams and another, trustees, against the city of Richmond and others. From the decree, the city appeals. Reversed.

H. R. Pollard, for appellant. Leake & Carter and L. L. Lewis, for appellees.

CARDWELL, J. On the 14th day of October, 1889, C. E. Belvin was the owner in fee of certain real estate, situated in that section adjacent to the city of Richmond known as "Lee District," and on that date he conveyed the whole of said real estate to C. U. Williams and N. W. Bowe, trustees, in trust to secure the payment of the sum of $13,440, evidenced by nine negotiable notes of even date with the deed, which deed was duly recorded in the clerk's office of Henrico county court on October 17, 1889. On the 19th day of February, 1892, an act of the General Assembly of Virginia was passed (Acts 1891-92, p. 505, c. 312) by which the corporate limits of the city of Richmond were extended in such manner that all of the said real estate was brought into the limits of the city; and by deed dated March 14, 1892, recorded in the office of the clerk of the chancery court of Richmond City, and in Henrico county court clerk's office, Belvin and wife conveyed the same property described in the deed of October 14, 1889, to H. Seldon Taylor, Chas. A. Rose, and M. M. Gilliam, trustees, in trust to secure certain negotiable notes, all of which were paid at maturity, except one for $22,800, which has not been paid in full. This note was held and owned by Charles R. Skinner, W. M. Walton, and Mary Walton Kent. Default having been made in the payment of the note of $12,000, secured by the deed of trust to Williams and Bowe, trustees, by direction of the holders of the note they proceeded under their deed of trust, on October —, 1900, to sell enough of the land to pay the said debt and interest, costs of sale, the execution of the trust, and to pay the state and city taxes in arrears on the property. The land left unsold at this sale was not sufficient to pay the debt still due Skinner and others by at least $1,500. Among the taxes assessed against the property sold by Williams and Bowe, trustees, in favor of the city of Richmond, was a special assessment for grading the streets upon which said lands front, which grading bills so assessed were made under ordinances of the city of Richmond passed after the recordation of the trust deed from Belvin and wife of March 14, 1892, to Taylor and others, trustees, to wit, in the years 1892 and 1893; the assessments of said grading bills being made in the years 1897 and 1898, and amounting to $941.22, principal and interest, as of December 1, 1900. A question having arisen as to whether Skinner and others, holding the lien of the trust deed of March 14, 1892, or the city of Richmond, by reason of its lien for the grading bills assessed on the property sold by Williams and Bowe, held a prior lien on said property, Williams and Bowe, trustees, filed their bill of interpleader in the chancery court of the city of Richmond, making the city, H. Seldon Taylor, and others, trustees in the deed of March 14, 1892, and Charles R. Skinner and others, the holders of the unpaid debt secured by said deed, parties defendant; and upon the hearing of the cause upon the bill, the answers of the several defendants thereto, and a statement of facts agreed by all parties, the chancery court held that the claim asserted by Skinner and others upon the funds remaining in the hands of Williams and Bowe, trustees, and deposited by them in the City Bank of Richmond to the credit of the court in this cause, was a superior lien thereon to that of the city for the grading bills in question, and so decreed. It is from this decree that an appeal was taken to this court by the city of Richmond.

The assessments for the grading of the streets through the property of Belvin, upon which the lien of the deed of trust held by Skinner and others rests, were made under sections 3 and 4 (pages 505 and 506) of the act of Assembly extending the corporate limits of the city of Richmond, above referred to, which provides as follows:

"Sec. 3. The city council of the said city may make such improvements within said territory as it now has the power as to the property within its present limits; but no improvement shall be made at the expense of the abutting owners until after allegations shall have been heard."

And the fourth section contains the provision that the assessments for the improvements authorized by the act "shall be a lien on such lots until paid," meaning the lots abutting upon the improvements made. The improvements in question here were made in proceedings commenced on the petition of Charles E. Belvin himself, by resolutions of the city council directing the committee on streets of the city council to hear "allegations" for and against the proposed improvements. A time was fixed by the committee for the hearing of said allegations, and it is agreed that Belvin was duly served with notice a reasonable time prior to the hearing given by the committee, and either appeared before the committee and declared in favor of the proposed improvements, or failed to appear or otherwise make protest against them. His petition for the improvements—that is, the opening and grading of the streets through his property—asked that the work should be done under and in accordance with the provisions of the act of Assembly extending the city limits so as to bring his property within the limits of the city, of February 19, 1892, supra, and the provisions of the charter of the city as it then stood; and in a suit instituted by him thereafter, and after the improvements he asked for had been made, he attacked the said act extending the corporate limits of the city as unconstitutional, but it was held by the chancery court of the city of Richmond, in which the cause was pending, that he was then estopped to assert the unconstitutionality of the act, and he was denied an appeal from that decree by this court.

A decision of the case turns upon the question whether or not the appellees, Skinker and others, creditors secured by the deed of trust above mentioned, are owners, within the meaning of the act of February 19, 1892, and entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard before the assessments in question upon the property of Belvin, upon which their debt was secured, became final and constituted a lien upon the property.

It may be said in the outset that the custom and form of procedure in the levying of an assessment upon lots abutting upon a street improved, to meet the costs of such improvements, has not, so far as we have been able to ascertain, recognized the right of a deed of trust creditor to notice and an opportunity to be heard before an assessment is made upon lots abutting on the improvements.

When the act of February 19, 1892, supra, was passed, the council, by the charter of the city as it then stood, was expressly authorized to make improvements of streets by grading, paving, etc., at the expense, in whole or in part, of abutting owners, and was further invested with the power to collect the cost of such improvements by the same processes which it was authorized to use to collect taxes. Acts 1869-70, p. 120, c. 101. And by ordinance of the council it was expressly provided that "all amounts which hereafter become due and payable to the city by property owners by and on account of any paving, grading, sewers, sewer connections and other improvements made by the order of the council are to be collected as and in the manner prescribed for the collection of city taxes." City Code 1885, pp. 172, 173.

The contention that a lienor by deed of trust or otherwise is to be recognized or dealt with, in the assessment of taxes, finds nothing to sustain it in the statutes providing for the assessment and collection of taxes for general purposes. By an examination of the statute (chapter 24 of the Code of 1887), and other statutes in pari materia, it will be seen that, in the assessment of lands with a tax, the owner (that is, "the person who by himself or his tenant has the freehold in possession") is alone dealt with or recognized as entitled to notice of the proposed tax. The conveyance of land to trustees to secure the payment of a debt is not regarded as changing the ownership or the status of the land, with respect to the proceedings necessary to subject it to taxation. Section 459 of the statutes (Code 1887) provides for the making out by the clerk of the court of lists of all deeds of conveyance of land admitted to record in the office of such clerk during the current year, which is to be furnished to the commissioner of the revenue for the proper transfer of lands from the grantor in such deeds to the grantee, but that section expressly requires that such list shall not include deeds of trust or mortgages made to secure debts. It is only by express provision of the statute and of the charter of the city of Richmond, or its ordinances, relating to the redemption of real estate delinquent for state or city taxes, that "any person having the right to charge such real estate for a debt" may redeem.

In Thomas v. Jones, 94 Va. 756, 27 S. E. 813, it was held that a lien for taxes is superior to a vendor's lien; and in Stevenson v. Henkle, 100 Va. 591, 42 S. E. 672, it was expressly decided that "a lien for taxes assessed on land is superior to a prior deed of trust to secure the payment of money." It is well settled that assessments to meet the costs of local improvements are made under the taxing power, and that the statute under which it is proposed to make such an assessment must provide for reasonable notice to the "owner" of the land to be assessed, and an opportunity to appear before a designated tribunal and have a hearing for or against the assessment at some stage in the proceedings before the assessment becomes final. It must also be made to appear that such notice and hearing has been given him, to contest the legality, justice, and correctness of the assessment, before it is finally determined upon; otherwise the requirement of "due process of law" would not be met, and the assessment would be void. This is the law as laid down repeatedly by this court and by the Supreme Court of the United States, the latest decision of this court being in Adams v. City of Roan- oke, 101 Va. —, 45 S. E. 881; and one of the latest by the Supreme Court of the United States is Voight v. Detroit, 184 U. S. 115, 22 Sup. Ct. 337, 46 L. Ed. 459. In neither of these cases, nor in the cases they cite and review, is there anything to be found that sustains the contention that a deed of trust creditor or mortgagee is to be regarded as an "owner of the land," to whom notice and an opportunity to be heard is to be given as to a proposed assessment to meet the costs of local improvements. In the later case of Turpin v. Lemon, 187 U. S. 51, 23 Sup. Ct. 20, 47 L. Ed. 70, when referring to proceedings for the imposition of special taxes for local improvements, practically the same expression is used, viz., that, in proceedings for the imposition of special taxes for local improvements, notice to the owner at some stage of the proceedings, as well as an opportunity to defend, is essential. It is true that this court has said in Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. 813, 50 Am. St. Rep. 846, and in other cases, that trustees in a deed of trust and the creditors secured are regarded as purchasers for a valuable consideration, but it is not thereby meant that they become the owners of the land conveyed. "They," as was said in Williams v. Lord & Robinson, 75 Va. 404, "acquire title to the security of the deed of trust, and stand in the attitude of bona fide purchasers of this"; but this, we repeat, does not make them owners of the land conveyed, within the contemplation of the statute authorizing the imposition of a general tax, or of a statute authorizing an assessment of a special tax to meet the cost of local improvements, and requiring notice, etc., as to the assessment proposed. If they are to be so regarded, why not a judgment creditor, or one holding a mechanic's lien, or any other lien, upon the property benefited by a local improvement? Assessments for local improvements proceed upon the theory of peculiar benefits conferred upon the persons liable to the assessment, in the enhancement of the value of their property by the improvements, and the enhancement of the value of the property upon which a debt is secured cannot be considered as the taking of the property of the creditor in any sense.

"In the assessment of a general tax, the law does not regard the different interests in the assessment. It looks to the person having the present right of enjoyment of the land to be assessed, whether tenant for life or years, for the tax on the fee-simple value of the land, and such person is the one to be assessed with the land." Burroughs on Taxation, 223.

"As a general rule, taxes are imposed upon the owner or person in possession of real estate, as a whole or as one entire interest, without reference to the particular estates or interests in the property. The land being charged with the taxes, all claims and pretensions must yield to such charge, and all persons must take notice." 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. of L. (1st Ed.) 122.

"The word 'owner' includes any person who has the usufruct, control, or occupation of the land, whether his interest in it is an absolute fee or an estate less than a fee." 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. of L. (1st Ed.) 299, 300. See, also, note to above text on page 301, where it is said, upon authority of a number of cases cited, that the owner or proprietor of a property is the person in whom, with his or her assent, it is for the time being beneficially vested, and who has the occupation or control or usufruct of it; e. g., a lessee is, during the term, the owner of the property demised.

In City of Norwich v. Hubbard, 22 Conn. 587, the same contentions were made that are made in the case here under review, but it was held otherwise, the opinion saying: "A mortgagee out of possession is not the proprietor of the mortgaged premises, and in common parlance was never spoken of as such. Nor is he to be so recognized in a legal sense. * * * In truth, the mortgagee has only a lien, and cannot be considered or treated as a proprietor or owner of the mortgaged estate. This view is corroborated by analogous cases. In laying out new highways, either by selectmen or by the county courts, or in repairing old ones, no provision is made by law for notice to be given to mortgagees, nor, in practice, is this ever done. The interests of mortgagees are not regarded in these proceedings. They are necessarily connected with the interests of the mortgagor, and, in this respect, subject to them. However reasonable we may believe it to be that a mortgagee should, by a timely notice, have an opportunity of protecting his rights, which the mortgagor has neglected, yet, as neither the charter of the city, nor any other law, has provided for this, we cannot require it, without the exercise of powers which we do not possess. It is sufficient, in order to create and enforce this lien [an assessment for a local improvement], that the city has done everything required of it by the charter and the law." To the same effect is the similar case of Schumacker v. Toberman, 56 Cal. 508.

It is the property, primarily, that is taxed for local improvements, not the individual. Asberry v. City of Roanoke, 91 Va. 562, 22 S. E. 360, 42 L. R. A. 636, and authorities cited.

In Osterberg v. Union Trust Co., 93 U. S. 424, 23 L. Ed. 964, it is held that "a lien for taxes does not stand upon the footing of an ordinary incumbrance, and, unless otherwise directed by statute, it is not displaced by a sale of the property under a pre-existing judgment or decree."

There is nothing in the case of Morey v. City of Duluth, 75 Minn. 221, 77 N. W. 829, so much relied on by appellant, that is opposed to the view we take of the case at bar. It is true that the Supreme Court of Minnesota, in construing the charter of the city of Duluth, under review, and under which an assessment upon land had been made for local improvements, held that mortgagees were included in the terms "persons interested" and "owner," as used in the charter, and had the right to appear and oppose the confirmation of the assessment and the entry of the judgment therefor; but it was also held that they had in that case failed to do so, they were concluded thereby, and the lien of the judgment was upheld as a lien paramount to the title or claim of the mortgagees. In other words, the effect of the decision is merely that, under the peculiar phraseology of the city's charter, all persons interested in the assessment, as well as the owner of the property proposed to be assessed, are given the right to appear at the hearing on the application for confirmation of the assessment, and it was the duty of the court to hear them. The opinion in the case fully refutes the contention that is made in this case, viz., that the lien of an assessment for local improvements cannot be upheld as a prior lien on the property upon which the assessment is made, unless expressly made so by statute. It says:

"It is true, as claimed by plaintiff, that the lien of the assessment attaches at a time fixed by the charter—that is, from and after the time of the confirmation of the assessment roll, and filing thereof—but this does not justify the conclusion that the lien is subordinate to all prior liens on the land, although the charter does not expressly declare that the lien of the assessment is paramount to all other liens.

"When the several provisions of the charter to which we have referred are read and considered together, it is clear that the only reasonable construction which can be given to them is that the lien of the assessment, when it once attaches, affects all interests in or liens upon the property, without reference to the time when they are acquired. Therefore the assessment is the paramount lien on the property, precisely as if the assessment were a general tax. Any other construction would practically defeat the whole scheme for local improvements provided for by the charter. The Legislature had the undoubted power to so make the assessment the paramount lien. Provident Institution for Savings v. Jersey City, 113 U. S. 506 [5 Sup. Ct. 612, 28 L. Ed. 1102].

"The proceeding authorized by the charter to charge land with the cost of local improvements to the extent of benefits received therefrom is one in rem. It is the whole interest in the land that is assessed for the improvement, not some particular estate therein. The improvement is for the benefit of all interests in the land—for that of the lienholder as well as that of the fee owner—and necessarily the lien of the assessment for the improvement must be coextensive with the estate benefited and assessed. 2

Blackwell, Tax Tit. § 606. If the land is sold under the judgment, the whole estate and interest of all parties therein passes to the purchaser, subject to the right of redemption, and the deed is made prima facie evidence of title in the grantee. The title conveyed by the deed is the whole interest in the land, not simply that of the fee owner.

"It is true that liens of the class to which assessment liens belong are purely statutory, and that their existence and extent depend on the statute. But our construction of the charter is that it does, by necessary implication, provide that the lien of the assessment on the property benefited by the improvement shall be paramount to all other interests therein, including prior mortgages or other liens thereon."

The cases of Sherwood v. City of Lafayette, 109 Ind. 411, 10 N. E. 89, 58 Am. Rep. 414, and State, etc., v. Insurance Co., 117 Ind. 251, 20 N. E. 144, also relied on as sustaining the view of the lower court in this case, are not applicable. The first named was a condemnation proceeding, and all that was decided is that the mortgagee, and not the mortgagor and owner in fee of the land taken for a street, was entitled to the damages awarded, although the amount had already been paid to the mortgagor. In the second-named case, the court was dealing only with the question whether the lien of a drainage assessment levied under a statute of the state of Indiana is junior to the lien of a pre-existing mortgage, and, reviewing briefly the statute, held merely that it was, as the Legislature had not by express terms given the lien of the assessment priority over pre-existing mortgages.

The process of taxation does not require the same kind of notice as is required in a suit at law, or even in proceedings for taking private property under the power of eminent domain. "It involves no violation of due process of law when it is executed according to customary form and established usages, or in subordination to the principles which underlie them." Turpin v. Lemon, supra, and authorities cited.

In Stevenson v. Henkle, supra, referring to the cases of Simmons v. Lyle's Adm'r, 32 Grat. 752, Com. v. Ashlin's Adm'r, 95 Va. 145, 28 S. E. 177, and Thomas v. Jones, supra, as holding that a tax lien is superior in dignity to judgment liens and to the vendor's lien, and in fact "prior in dignity to all other liens," the opinion by Harrison, J., well says that, if this were not the law, "the liens upon the land, as in this case, would often be greater than the value of the land, and, the tax lien being inferior, the land would escape all taxation." The principle that a tax lien is superior in dignity to all other liens upon the land on which it is assessed, upheld by the foregoing authorities, must, upon reason as well as authority, be extended to assessments by municipalities for local improvements, which are in the nature of a tax; otherwise the whole scheme for local improvements provided for in the charters of the several cities and towns in this state would be, as said in Morey v. City of Duluth, supra, "practically defeated," since such improvements might be completely prevented by a mortgage or deed of trust on property equal to the value of the property.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the decree appealed from, holding that "the paving bills of the city of Richmond mentioned in these proceedings are not a valid lien upon the funds deposited in the City Bank of Richmond * * * to the credit of the court in this cause, as against the beneficiaries in the deed of trust from Charles E. Belvin and wife to H. Seldon Taylor and others, trustees, of March 14, 1892," is erroneous, and should be reversed and annulled, and the cause will be remanded to the chancery court of the city of Richmond to be further proceeded with in accordance with this opinion.

CITY OF PETERSBURG v. PETERSBURG AQUEDUCT CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — POLICE POWER — STREETS — OBSTRUCTION — WATER COM-PANY — CHARTER RIGHTS.

1. Under Code 1887, § 1093, providing that no company shall occupy with its works the streets of a city without the consent of the council, and that the city shall have power to prevent the incumbering of the streets in any manner whatever, a city has power to prohibit a water company organized and chartered when the city was a sparsely settled town, and which had never since attempted to extend its system beyond the limits then established from digging up and obstructing the streets in extending its limits, even though the charter of the company authorizes it to dig up streets to lay and repair its pipes.

2. Conceding that a water company was entitled under its charter to dig up and obstruct the streets of a city without the latter's consent in order to extend its system, it was not entitled so to do where the facts show it to be insolvent, and without adequate means either as to capital or water supply of properly enlarging its system.

Appeal from Circuit Court of City of Petersburg.

Suit for an injunction by the city of Petersburg against the Petersburg Aqueduct Company. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. Maron and W. B. McIlwaine, for appellant. Davis & Davis, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. The object of this suit is to enjoin appellee from digging up or otherwise obstructing the streets of the city of Petersburg for the purpose of laying water mains therein, without the consent of the city council. At the hearing the trial court dismissed the bill on demurrer, and from that decree the city appeals.

The bill presents the following case: By an act of the General Assembly passed February 22, 1822 (Acts 1821-22, p. 73, c. 96), the aqueduct company was chartered for the purpose of conducting a full and sufficient supply of water from springs within the corporate limits of the town of Petersburg, or within a mile of the same, or from the falls of the river, or the basin of the canal, to and along the streets of the town, provided the streets or highways were not to be opened in such manner as to prevent the passing of teams or carriages therein with convenience; and that, after opening the ground in the streets or highways, the company should put the same in good repair under penalty of being prosecuted for a nuisance. At that time the population of the town numbered only a few thousand, and the inhabited part of it was mostly confined to the lower district of the present city along the tide-water level of Appomattox river. Soon after its incorporation the company acquired certain springs in the town and in the county of Chesterfield, and conveyed the waters therefrom through very small pipes, supplying some little water for domestic purposes, mainly for drinking purposes, to the inhabitants of the district referred to along the lower levels near the river. Many years ago the company installed a few fire hydrants, but they have long since been abandoned, doubtless on account of the insufficiency of the water supply. The small spring in the city from which the company in part drew its supply has become so contaminated as to require its absolute abandonment, so that the company's entire available source of supply is from the springs in Chesterfield county. The water from those springs is collected in two reservoirs, only a few feet square, from which it flows through a four-inch main, under Appomattox river, into the lower section of the city.

These conditions continued from the date of the charter until within a short time before the institution of this suit. In the meanwhile, as the town increased in size and population, the company became wholly unable to meet the growing demand, and to supply the community with sufficient water for drinking purposes alone, and made no attempt to do so. Nearly the whole city was devoid of any water supply, except from private wells, and no provision was made for protection against fire.

In this situation of affairs, in the year 1857, the city was compelled to establish, and by virtue of authority of its charter did establish, at a cost of a half a million of dollars, a thorough and adequate water system furnishing the community with an abundant supply of clear, pure, and wholesome water. The distribution of pipes and conduits conducts water through all parts of the city, and the pressure from high-service reservoirs and pumps forces the water to the highest elevations within the corporate limits, furnishing it in ample quantities for hygienic and protective purposes, and enabling the city to maintain an efficient fire department. Even in the lower parts of the city, traversed by the company's pipes, many citizens are obliged to take city water on account of the otherwise inadequate supply.

The bill further charges that if the company ever had a right to lay its pipes and conduct its water into any other parts of the city than those already occupied, which is denied, the presumption has long since arisen that it has surrendered such right, which surrender has been accepted by the commonwealth. In addition to that, it is alleged that the company is debarred, by reason of vested riparian rights, from taking water from the falls of the river or the basin of the canal, and is therefore limited by that fact, as well as by election to the springs in Chesterfield county, as a source of supply, which, as remarked, is wholly insufficient to furnish even its present system. It is also insisted that the company is financially embarrassed, having recently permitted a note for $5,000 to go to protest; and that only $10,000 of its maximum capital of $15,000 has been subscribed. That it is without artificial or mechanical means of forcing its meager water supply to higher levels than those which it at present occupies.

Petersburg was chartered as a town in May, 1784, and empowered to keep in order the streets and lands within its limits; and its hustings court was authorized to appoint surveyors of streets, but no general police power over its streets was expressly granted to the town authorities. In the year 1850 appellant was chartered as a city, and a new charter was granted it in March, 1875, which from time to time has been since amended as the exigencies of the community required. At the revision of the statutes of the state, in 1849, the Legislature adopted the general policy as to towns, which has since been applied to cities, that "no company shall cross or occupy with its works the streets or alleys, public or private, in any city or town, without the assent of the corporate authorities thereof, unless such assent be dispensed with by special provision of law" (Code Va. 1887, § 1098); and that policy has been vigorously upheld in the charters of the city.

It is charged that, in utter disregard of these salutary provisions of law governing such matters, and of the charter rights of the city, without any warrant of authority from it, and in derogation of its rights, and in defiance of its municipal agencies, the company had been for several days and was still engaged in digging up the streets and pavements of the city, and laying eight-inch pipes therein, where it had never had water pipes before, and at an elevation considerably higher than the source of its water supply; and had also deposited piles of its pipes on the roadway of the streets, thereby obstructing them, and making them dangerous to travelers; that the city had recently had constructed, at a very large outlay of corporate funds, pavements of vitrified brick upon concrete foundations and sheet asphalt, and before doing so, in order to prevent injury thereto by disturbing or breaking through the surface, had caused all underground structures, such as sewers, gas pipes, water pipes, etc., to be put in thoroughly good condition, and had all proper and necessary connections laid from the main pipe to the inner side of the curb line of said streets for the use of abutting owners, whether then desired for use or not, so as to be tapped when needed in future, without going beyond the curb line of the sidewalk; that, if the company has the right to dig up the unpaved streets of the city to lay or repair its pipes, it has equal right to dig up such pavements for the same purpose, the result of which would be to destroy the pavements, and involve the city in heavy loss.

Assuming, as the court must assume upon the demurrer to the bill, that all relevant and properly pleaded facts are true, the decree of the circuit court sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill is plainly erroneous.

In its last analysis, the contention of the company amounts to this: That a general power contained in a charter authorizing an aqueduct company to open ground in the streets of a city or town for the purpose of laying and repairing its water pipes places the company, with respect to the manner of exercising those rights, beyond legislative control.

To that proposition this court cannot give its assent. Bearing in mind the distinction between public and private corporations in the matter of public control—that the former are regarded as instrumentalities of the state, and liable to visitation and regulation, while the charters of the latter are contracts within the meaning of the contract clauses of the state and federal Constitutions, the obligation of which, in the sense of these clauses, cannot be impaired (New Orleans Water Co. v. Rivers, 115 U. S. 674, 6 Sup. Ct. 273, 29 L. Ed. 525; Louisville Gas Co. v. Citizens' Gas Co., 115 U. S. 683, 6 Sup. Ct. 265, 29 L. Ed. 510; New Orleans v. New Orleans Water Works Co., 142 U. S. 79, 12 Sup. Ct. 142, 35 L. Ed. 943)—nevertheless the police power of a state is a governmental function, the exercise of which neither the Legislature nor any subordinate agency thereof upon which part of its authority may have been conferred can alienate or surrender by grant, contract, or other delegation (Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Richmond, 26 Grat. 83; a. c. 96 U. S. 521, 24 L. Ed. 734; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. Ed. 989; Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. Ed. 1079; Butchers' Union Slaughter-House, etc., Co. v. Crescent City Live-Stock Landing, etc., Co., 111 U. S. 746, 4 Sup. Ct. 652, 28 L. Ed. 585; Powell v. Penna., 127 U. S. 678, 8 Sup. Ct. 992, 32 L. Ed. 253).

The prohibition of state laws impairing the obligation of contracts has never been construed as depriving the state of the power of protecting the public health, morals, or safety of its citizens as one or the other may be affected in the execution of such contract. So that while the state cannot deprive a company of the lawful exercise of its functions under its charter, it may unquestionably, in the interest of public welfare, regulate the use and prevent the abuse of charter powers.

It follows, as a necessary consequence from the foregoing statement of the law, that there is an implied reservation of the police power of the state in every charter granted by the Legislature. There is no conflict, therefore, between the provision of the charter in this case, authorizing the company to open ground in the streets and highways of the city for the purpose of laying or repairing its pipes, and the general statute found in section 1093 of the Code of 1887, and the provisions of section 6, cl. 8, of the charter of the city, that "no company shall occupy with its works the streets of the city without the consent of the council," and clause 9 of the same section, that the city shall have power "to prevent the cumbering of streets * * * in any manner whatsoever." Acts 1874-75, p. 147, c. 163. It would be a mischievous precedent for this court to hold that a company chartered over three-quarters of a century ago for the purpose of supplying water to a sparsely settled town of a few thousand inhabitants, with the privilege of opening streets and highways for that purpose (a privilege which during all these years it had never essayed to exercise beyond its original sphere of operations), should now be permitted, after the town had grown to be a city, under a general grant of power, to attempt to extend its system beyond former limits, and in so doing to obstruct and dig up the streets of the city in violation of general and special statutes of the state. Even if the charter was susceptible of such interpretation, the alleged facts that the company is practically insolvent and without adequate means, either as regards capital or water supply, of properly enlarging its present system, would justify the conclusion that its undertaking is an abuse, rather than a legitimate exercise, of charter rights.

The case of Wheat v. Alexandria, 88 Va. 742, 14 S. E. 672, is relied on as controlling authority for the contention of appellee, but the facts of the two cases are essentially different. In the former case the court was dealing with the reasonableness of, and right to enforce, a penal ordinance of the city of Alexandria, while this case involves the police power of the state.

The bill sets out a condition of facts which, if proved, would clearly entitle the city to the injunctive relief prayed for. The decree complained of is therefore erroneous, and must be reversed.

PORTSMOUTH ST. R. CO. v. PEED'S ADMINISTRATOR.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

STREET RAILROADS — NEGLIGENCE — DEATH — ACTION — DAMAGES — INSTRUCTIONS — PLEADING — WITNESSES — REFRESHING MEMORY.

1. Where a declaration is in two counts, and there is evidence to sustain one of them, so that defendant cannot demur to the evidence, and the one not sustained by the evidence is good in form, the court, on request of defendant, should instruct the jury to disregard the count not sustained.

2. Where, in an action against a street railroad for the death of one killed by being run over by a car, the negligence alleged in the declaration was excessive speed, it was error to instruct on failure to give warnings.

3. Code 1887, § 3384, declares that, where there appears to be a variance between the declaration and proof, there may be an amendment of the declaration, if it will not prejudice the opposite party, or the jury may find the facts, and the court give judgment according to the right of the case. Held that, in case of a variance between the evidence and allegations, the correct practice is to object to the evidence when offered, or move to exclude it; the attention of the court being thereby called to the variance, and an opportunity afforded to meet the emergency under the statute.

4. It is proper to refuse an instruction where there is no evidence to support it.

5. In an action against a street railroad for the death of one run over by a car, an instruction that failure to look for an approaching car by a person about to cross a street railway track, especially at a street crossing, was not negligence, as a matter of law—the street car having no superior right to that of a pedestrian, and the question being whether a prudent person, acting prudently, would have thought it necessary to do so—was erroneous, as misleading.

6. While, generally speaking, one who is about to cross a street railroad should look and listen for cars, it is not an inflexible rule; and the question is whether a prudent man, acting prudently, would have thought it unnecessary to do so.

7. Where, in an action for death, there is no evidence of payment by plaintiff of doctors' bills and burial expenses, an instruction authorizing their recovery is erroneous.

8. In an action for death, evidence that deceased left a family, and followed a trade which gave practically constant employment, is sufficient to warrant an instruction that the jury, in estimating the damages for his death, may take into consideration compensation for the loss of his care, attention, society, and comfort to his family, and for solace to them for the sorrow, suffering, and mental anguish occasioned by his death.

9. In an action against a street railroad for the death of one run over by a car, plaintiff's evidence showed that deceased was walking outside defendant's track, with his back turned to an approaching car, when he attempted to cross the track, and that he had not taken more than two steps when he was struck, and that he was deaf. Defendant requested an instruction that it was the duty of a person approaching a street car track to exercise the care which ordinarily prudent persons would exercise, and make such use of his faculties as ordinarily prudent persons would make use of under the circumstances, and that, if such person were deaf, it was more incumbent on him to exercise his sight, and that if deceased failed to exercise such care, and his failure contributed to the accident, the jury should find for defendant. The instruction was given, with the addition that if the jury further found that the motor-man saw or might have seen deceased go on the track, or approach it with apparent intention to cross it, and thereafter used ordinary care to stop the car, they should find for defendant. Held, that defendant was entitled to the instruction, and its modification was error.

10. It was error to refuse the charge that, if deceased stepped in front of a moving car of defendant when the car was so close on him that a collision could not be avoided by the utmost care on the part of defendant's servants, the jury must find for the defendant.

11. In an action for the death of one run over by a street car, it was not error to receive testimony of a witness objected to as giving the rate of speed 80 feet from the scene of the accident.

12. The testimony of the witness was not inadmissible because of the fact that at the time he observed the car he was in his storehouse, 25 feet from the door.

13. A witness may be allowed to refer to the stenographic report of his evidence at a former trial for the purpose of refreshing his memory.

14. Stenographer's notes of testimony on a former trial may not be referred to for the purpose of contradicting a witness.

Error to Hastings Court of Portsmouth.

Action by the administrator of Leroy L. Peed against the Portsmouth Street Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Richard B. Tunstall and T. J. Wool, for plaintiff in error. John W. Happer and Frank L. Crocker, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. On the afternoon of March 3, 1899, plaintiff's intestate, Leroy L. Peed, while attempting to cross Crawford street at or near its intersection with Columbia street, in the city of Portsmouth, was struck by a passing car of the defendant company, receiving injuries from which he died. Thereupon the defendant in error instituted this action against the plaintiff in error to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of his intestate, which resulted in the judgment now under review.

The declaration contains two counts. The first count alleges that the accident was due to the negligence of the defendant in running its cars "at such a great, high, and rapid rate of speed as to become thereby unmanageable and incapable of being stopped when occasion for stopping the same should arise," whilst the second count attributes the accident to the negligence of the defendant in failing to equip its cars with suitable fenders.

At the trial, after the evidence had closed, the defendant moved the court to strike out an ordinance of the city of Portsmouth with respect to car fenders, on the ground that there was no evidence tending to show a failure of duty on the part of the defendant in that regard, which motion the court sustained. Whereupon the defendant submitted a further motion that the jury be instructed to disregard the second count of the declaration, as there was no evidence to support it, which motion the court overruled. Sustaining the second motion was a corollary to granting the first, and the court erred in overruling it.

The jury returned a general verdict, and it cannot be affirmed that their finding was not influenced by the ruling of the court with respect to the second count, notwithstanding the fact that there was no evidence to sustain it. The court, in the presence of the jury, had refused to instruct them to disregard the count, and they may naturally have interpreted that ruling to mean that they must regard it.

The only remedy which a defendant has in such case is to move the court to instruct the jury to disregard the unsustained count. Being unobjectionable in form, it is not amenable to demurrer; and the defendant cannot demur to the evidence where, as in this case, there is another count in the declaration with some evidence tending to uphold it. The rationale for disregarding such a count is the same as in case of a variance between the evidence and allegation. Both rest upon the fact of a failure to prove what is alleged. Roe v. Crutchfield, 1 Hen. & M. 361; Bush v. Campbell, 26 Grat. 431; B. & O. Ry. Co. v. Whittington, 30 Grat. 810; Richmond Ry. & Elec. Co. v. Bowles, 92 Va. 738, 24 S. E. 358; Eckles v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 96 Va. 69, 25 S. E. 545; Richmond Ry. & Elec. Co. v. West, 100 Va. 184, 40 S. E. 643; West v. Richmond Ry. & Elec. Co., 102 Va. —, 46 S. E. 83.

While that error alone might not warrant a reversal, the ruling involves a question of practice which ought to be settled.

The next assignment of error relates to the ruling of the court on instructions.

The objection to the first instruction given at the instance of the plaintiff is that it was not justified by the pleading. As remarked, the declaration sets out two grounds of negligence, namely, excessive speed and a defective fender. There being no evidence to support the second charge, the only ground upon which the plaintiff could recover, if at all, was for the alleged excessive speed; yet the instruction injected into the case a new element, and told the jury that either a failure to give warning of the approach of the car, or its excessive speed, would entitle the plaintiff to recover. Under the authorities cited above, the court erred in instructing the jury that they could find a verdict on a case not made by the declaration. It should be observed, however, in that connection, that, in case of a variance between the evidence and allegations, the usual and correct practice is to object to the evidence when offered, or move to exclude it. Attention is thus called to the discrepancy, and opportunity afforded the trial court to meet the emergency, in a proper case, in one of the modes prescribed by section 3384 of the Code of 1887.

Plaintiff's second instruction is subject to the same objection as the first, and that part of the instruction predicated on the jury's belief from the evidence that the deceased used ordinary care in looking and listening before attempting to cross Crawford street is liable to the further objection that there was no evidence on which to base it.

The third instruction told the jury that failure to look for an approaching car by a person about to cross a street railway track, especially at a street crossing, is not negligence, as a matter of law, the street car having no superior right to that of a pedestrian; the question being whether a prudent person, acting prudently, would have thought it necessary to do so.

While the qualifying language lessens the vice of the instruction, it does not entirely remove its misleading tendency. The doctrine on the subject is thus stated in 2 Shearman & Redfield on the Law of Negligence (5th Ed.) at pp. 869, 870:

"While, generally speaking, one who is about to cross a street railroad should both look and listen for cars, this is not an inflexible rule; nor is it to be enforced with any such strictness as in the case of an ordinary steam railroad. It is not negligence, as a matter of law, to omit to do so. The question is whether a prudent man, acting prudently, would have thought it unnecessary to do so."

The above statement of the law is quoted with approval by this court in the recent case of Bass v. Norfolk Ry. Co., 100 Va. 1, 40 S. E. 100. The statement of a part of the rule, without the context, was calculated to mislead the jury, and therefore ought not to have been given.

The remaining instruction of the plaintiff to which objection is made relates to the measure of damages. The instruction told the jury that, "if they shall find for the plaintiff, in estimating his damages they may take into consideration compensation for the loss of his care, attention, and society to his family, together with such sum as they may deem fair and just by way of solace and comfort to them for the sorrow, suffering, and mental anguish occasioned by his death, not to exceed, however, the sum of $10,000."

The evidence shows that the deceased was 64 years of age; that he left a family consisting of a wife, three sons, and two daughters; and that he was a ship calker by trade, with practically constant employment. This evidence was sufficient to warrant the court in giving the instruction. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Noell's Adm'r, 32 Gratt. 894.

The next assignment of error is the refusal of the trial court to give the third instruction asked for by the defendant, and the modification of that instruction.

The instruction told the jury that it is the duty of a person approaching a street car track to exercise the care which ordinarily prudent persons would exercise; and make such use of his faculties as ordinarily prudent persons would make use of under similar circumstances, and, if such person is deaf, it is more incumbent upon him to exercise his sight; and if they believe from the evidence that the deceased failed to exercise such care, and his failure to do so contributed to the accident in which he met his death, and if they further find from the evidence that the motorman saw, or by ordinary care might have seen, the decedent go upon the track, or approach the track with apparent intention to cross it, and thereafter used ordinary care to stop the car, they must find for the defendant. The addendum of the court is italicized.

The instruction, as offered by the defendant, is a correct exposition of the law applicable to the evidence of the only witness for the plaintiff who saw the accident. The car was running on Crawford street, which runs north and south, and is intersected by Columbia street, running east and west. The deceased, who was proved to have been deaf, started from the southeast corner of Columbia street, and crossed that street, walking outside the track until he passed a delivery wagon in front of a store on the northeast corner, when, with his back toward the approaching car, and his head bent forward, he attempted to cross the track, and had not taken more than two steps before the car struck him. The witness further testified that he did not think the deceased was going on the track, and, if he had thought so, he would certainly have called out to save him. The testimony of several of the defendant's witnesses also tends to sustain the theory that the deceased gave no indication of his intention to cross the track until the car was so close upon him that it could not be stopped in time to avert the accident. Upon this evidence the defendant was entitled to the instruction asked for, without the qualification made to it by the court.

The same objection obtains to the court's addition to defendant's instruction No. 4. The amendment involves the principle embodied in the qualification to instruction No. 8, and, for the reason stated in that connection, ought not to have been given.

Instructions 5 and 6, which the court rejected, told the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that the deceased stepped in front of a moving car of the defendant when the car was so close upon him that a collision could not be avoided by the utmost care on the part of defendant's employees, they must find for the defendant.

The evidence referred to tended to sustain that theory, and the court erred in refusing to give the instructions. Richmond Traction Co. v. Martin, 102 Va. —, 45 S. E. 886.

There are two other assignments of error which may be briefly noticed. The first assignment is to the admission of the testimony of a witness for the plaintiff with respect to the speed of the car. His evidence was objected to as giving the rate of speed 80 feet from the scene of the accident, and because the position of the witness, who was standing in his storehouse, 20 or 25 feet from the door, was not such as to enable him to determine the rate of speed of the car.

Of both objections it may be remarked that they affect the weight, rather than the admissibility, of the evidence. There is therefore no error in that assignment.

The remaining assignment is the refusal of the court to permit a witness who had testified on a former occasion to refresh his memory from the stenographer's minutes of his testimony.

It was permissible to allow this reference to the minutes for the bona fide purpose of refreshing the memory of the witness, but not to contradict him. The rule in such case does not require that the paper should have been given to the witness. Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Grat. 527, 544; Greenleaf on Ev. (16th Ed., Wigmore) § 439c.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the trial court must be reversed and annulled, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial to be had, not in conflict with the views expressed herein.

AMERICAN BONDING & TRUST CO. OF BALTIMORE v. MILSTEAD.

PLEADING—CONTRACT UNDER SEAL—COUNT IN ASSUMPSIT—STATUTES—ALLEGATIONS OF DAMAGES—JURY—CHANGE OF VENUE—CONTINUANCES—AMENDED BILL OF PARTICULARS—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—TRIAL—EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES—BONDS—LIABILITY OF SURETY—NEGLIGENCE OF PRINCIPAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Inasmuch as Acts 1897-98, p. 103, c. 98, provides that in any case where an action of covenant will lie an action of assumpsit may be maintained, counts in assumpsit may be joined in the same declaration on a contract under seal.

2. Where the damages claimed in a declaration are set out in the final count thereof in language broad enough to include the other counts, it is not necessary that the claim for damages be inserted at the end of each count.

3. Since Code 1887, § 893, makes provision for summoning a jury by one other than the sergeant of the city in cases where such officer is unfit to serve, the fact that the officer was plaintiff in a cause was no ground for a change of venue.

4. In an action against the surety on the official bond of an officer the first count of the declaration set out the officer's appointment and the execution of the bond, the default of the officer, and the amount of damages claimed by reason thereof, and the refusal of the defendant to pay the damages claimed, and the second count set out a renewal of the bond, and identified the covenants therein as those set forth in the first bond. Held, that the declaration stated a good cause of action.

5. In an action against the surety on the bond of a deputy sergeant of a city the original bill of particulars gave the names of the persons from whom and for whom he had collected moneys, which he had failed to account for, all of which collections were made within a period of six months before the flight of the officer, and subsequently, and two months after the filing of such bill, another bill was filed on the demand of plaintiff, which merely showed at what time the several amounts collected by the officer had been paid by plaintiff to the parties entitled thereto. Held, that it was not error to refuse a continuance on the ground that the amended bill had just been filed.

6. Where the defendant pleaded the general issue, and then sought to file special pleas setting up matters which could have been proven under the general issue, and the order rejecting the pleas reserved to defendant the privilege to offer any evidence under the general issue that would have been proper under the pleas, there was no error.

7. In an action against the surety on the bond of a public officer a witness testified that he called on the officer on a certain day with reference to certain domestic troubles of the officer. Held, that it was not error to refuse to permit the witness to answer a question as to whether the officer was intoxicated, and whether he remained intoxicated for several days after, the evidence being immaterial.

8. Where a question is asked, and the witness is not permitted to answer, the bill of exceptions must show what the party offering the witness expected or proposed to prove by him, which rule is applicable not only to direct but cross examination.

9. In an action by the sergeant of a city against the surety on the bond of plaintiff's deputy sergeant defendant sought to show by a certain witness that the witness had loaned the deputy money on a certain date, the object of the testimony being to prove a loan by the witness at about the same time that plaintiff was claimed to have loaned the deputy, but it appeared that any money loaned by the witness or plaintiff to the deputy was to aid him in certain domestic troubles, and not because of any default in the discharge of his public duties. Held, that there was no error in refusing to require the witness to answer questions as to the loan.

10. In an action by the sergeant of a city against the surety on the bond of his deputy sergeant defendant sought to show that plaintiff had notice of the deputy's embezzlement, and committed a fraud on defendant in continuing him in office. A witness for defendant was asked on cross-examination as to whether witness had made any suggestion to plaintiff that the deputy was embezzling money, referring to an occasion when witness spoke to plaintiff with reference to some money which witness was informed the deputy had collected and did not pay over to the witness, as counsel for the party to whom the money was going. Held, that the question was proper.

11. Where the sergeant of a city knew that his deputy was failing to remit collections made by virtue of his office, but continued such deputy in office, he could not recover for such embezzlements from the surety on the bond of the deputy, the surety not having been informed of such facts by the sergeant.

12. In the absence of a stipulation a sergeant of a city does not owe it to the surety on the official bond of the sergeant's deputy to make continuous and diligent search into each levy by his deputy and the payment of money collected thereunder.

13. In an action by the sergeant of a city against the surety on the official bond of plaintiff's deputy, the evidence conclusively showed that plaintiff had no knowledge of the deputy's embezzlements until after his discharge, and the court instructed that knowledge of facts and circumstances naturally calculated to excite suspicion in the mind of a person of ordinary care and to prompt him to inquire is sufficient to affect the party with knowledge of all facts necessarily to be discovered on such inquiry, and to which the facts known furnished a reasonable and natural clue, and, if the jury believed from the evidence that plaintiff had such knowledge, the jury should, in the absence of countervailing evidence, find plaintiff chargeable with notice. Held, that defendant could not complain of the instruction.

14. It is not error to refuse instructions on matters fully covered by other instructions.

15. Mere negligence on the part of the obligee in the bond of a public officer will not avoid the contract of suretyship, but good faith is all that is required.

Error to Corporation Court of Newport News.

Action by one Milstead against the American Bonding & Trust Company of Baltimore. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Thomas W. Shelton, for plaintiff in error.
R. G. Bickford and R. G. Lett, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the corporation court of the city of Newport News in an action brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error to recover certain damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the breach of a promise and undertaking set forth in a certain contract in writing executed by one E. L. Herndon, with plaintiff in error as his surety, to guaranty to defendant in error the faithful performance of the duties of Herndon as the deputy for defendant in error, sergeant of the city of Newport News.

The plaintiff in error refused to pay the amounts claimed by defendant in error because of the default of the said deputy upon the ground that defendant in error "knew of Herndon's peculations, and had facts and circumstances brought to his attention equivalent to notice, and not only did not notify plaintiff in error, the surety, but condoned such action by loaning him money."

The declaration in the case contains two counts, to which plaintiff in error demurred, and, the demurrer having been overruled, this action of the court is assigned as error.

The bond sued on is in the usual form used by the bonding and guaranty companies, and recites that plaintiff in error, the surety, and Edwin L. Herndon, the principal, are held and firmly bound unto E. W. Milstead, sergeant of the city of Newport News, state of Virginia, in the sum of $2,000, to the payment whereof well and truly to be made to the said E. W. Milstead, etc., and the condition of the bond is as follows:

"That whereas the above bound, Edwin L. Herndon, on the 16th day of May, 1898, was duly appointed deputy sergeant of the city of Newport News, state of Virginia, by the judge of the corporation court of the city of Newport News, state of Virginia, upon the recommendation of E. W. Milstead, sergeant of the said city: Now if the said Edwin L. Herndon shall faithfully discharge the duties of the said office, post, or trust, according to law, then this obligation to be void, or otherwise to remain in full force and virtue."

The bond bears date the 1st day of June, 1898, and the first count in the declaration sets out the appointment of Herndon as deputy sergeant, and the execution of the bond; the renewals or extensions thereof upon the reappointment of Herndon as deputy sergeant on several occasions, including the last on the 9th day of July, 1900, to cover the period between May 16, 1900, and May 16, 1901; the default of Herndon in the performance of his duties as deputy sergeant, and the amount of damages claimed by the plaintiff by reason of such default; the refusal of the surety, plaintiff in error, to pay the amount of damages claimed—that is, the amount of the several sums of money received, collected, and retained by Herndon, the deputy—his insolvency; and his departure from the state of Virginia, etc. The defaults, it is claimed in that count, operate as a breach laid to have occurred between the 9th of July, 1900, and the 16th of May, 1901, and is that part of the deputy's term which is particularly covered by the last bond after the renewal or extension thereof on the 9th day of July, 1900.

The second count simply sets out the writing of July 9, 1900, and identifies the condition and covenants therein described as being those set forth in the first bond of the 1st of June, 1898. In this count the conditions and the covenants are identified by a reference to the bond, while in the first count the conditions are identified by recital and averment.

The grounds stated for the demurrer rest upon the erroneous theory that a special count in assumpsit cannot be joined in the declaration with a special count on a contract under seal. The counts in the declaration are but counts in assumpsit.

"In an action in assumpsit, the promise is the legal cause of action, and where a count states that the defendant agreed or undertook, these words import a promise, and the count, therefore, is, in form, assumpsit." 4 Rob. Pract. 230.

In support of the contention of counsel for plaintiff in error, the cases of Gary v. Abington Pub. Co., 94 Va. 775, 27 S. E. 595, and Booker v. Donahoe, 95 Va. 359, 28 S. E. 584, are cited; but neither of the cases support the contention, as both are to the point only that counts in tort cannot be joined with counts on contract. Since the act of assembly approved January 25, 1898 (Acts 1897-98, p. 103), counts in assumpsit can be joined in the same declaration with counts in assumpsit on a contract under seal.

In Grubb v. Burfort, 98 Va. 553, 37 S. E. 4, the opinion by Buchanan, J., following the construction of a similar statute with reference to the actions of trespass and trespass on the case given by the court in the case of Parsons v. Harper, 16 Grat. 64, says: "The ground of demurrer to the whole declaration is that there is a misjoinder of counts. All the counts are common counts in assumpsit, except the last, which is a special count upon or for the breach of an agreement under seal. There is no doubt that at common law those counts could not be united in one declaration, and that such misjoinder would have been fatal on general demurrer. But by act of assembly approved January 25, 1898 (Acts 1897-98, p. 103, c. 96), it is provided 'that in any case where an action of covenant will lie there may be maintained an action of assumpsit.' Under that act assumpsit can be maintained upon the writing sued on in the special count, and it is clear that an action of covenant would lie upon it. Since an action of assumpsit will lie upon the cause of action in the last count, as well as upon the several causes of action in the other counts, we see no reason why they may not be properly united in one action of assumpsit, as was done in this case."

It is further contended that the demurrer should have been sustained, because damages were claimed only at the end of the second count, and is not in language broad enough to include the first. But this contention is without merit, and the authorities cited do not sustain it. The declaration sets out at the end of each count the breach relied on by the plaintiff, and the damage claimed is stated at the conclusion of the second count in language broad enough to include the first. The gravamen of each count is the same.

In Postlewaite v. Wise, 17 W. Va. 24, it was held that the damages claimed at the end of the declaration applied to each of the counts, that it is both unusual and unnecessary to insert the claim for damages at the end of each count, and that damages for all the causes of action in the several counts may be claimed at the end of the declaration.

To the same effect is Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. 53.

We are of opinion that the declaration in this case, and each count thereof, set out a good cause of action, and that the demurrer was properly overruled. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 95 Va. 445, 28 S. E. 594.

At the calling of the case on the 2d of January, 1903, it was continued, but during the term plaintiff in error moved the court for a change of venue, which motion was overruled, and this action of the court is assigned as error.

The sole ground of the motion was that the defendant in error (plaintiff below) was sergeant of the city of Newport News, and that it was to be assumed that by reason of his position he would exercise influence over the jury to be selected to try the cause. This was but a broad assertion, unsupported by evidence of any character either at the time the motion was made or at any time during the trial. Section 893 of the Code of 1887 makes ample provision for a case in which the sergeant is unfit from the circumstances in which he is placed to serve process or summon a jury, and it does not appear from the record by whom the jury in this case was summoned. It does appear, however, that, in addition to no good reason being given for a change of venue at the February term of the court, 1903, to which the case had been continued by consent of parties, "a jury of nine persons were called, qualified jurors and free from exceptions, and from the panel two were struck off by the parties, beginning with the plaintiff, each striking off one, and the remaining seven constituted the jury" that rendered the verdict complained of. No suggestion was then made that the jury had been improperly summoned, or that the defendant (plaintiff in error here) could not have a fair trial with the jury thus selected.

The court is further of opinion that the court below did not err in overruling the motion of plaintiff in error, made at the January term, 1903, for a continuance of the cause.

The ground for this motion was that an amended bill of particulars, which plaintiff in error had called for, had just been filed, and which merely showed at what time the several amounts collected by Herndon, deputy sergeant, had been paid by the defendant in error to the parties entitled thereto. This amended bill of particulars was not called for until eleven months after the institution of the suit and over two months after the filing of the original bill of particulars, in which the names of the persons from whom and for whom Herndon collected moneys that he had failed to account for is definitely set forth, and these collections were all made within a period of about six months before Herndon's defalcation and departure from the city of Newport News.

We are unable to see why this information furnished by the amended bill of particulars was material to plaintiff in error, or why it could not have obtained that information from the original bill of particulars and by inquiry of the persons named therein, from whom and for whom Herndon had collected the respective amounts stated. In point of fact the case was continued at the January term upon counsel agreeing, in order to avoid compelling defendant in error to summon again 41 witnesses, that the moneys stated in the bill of particulars were collected by Herndon by virtue of his office as deputy sergeant, as in the declaration alleged, after the 9th of July, 1900, and before the 16th day of May, 1901; that Herndon had not paid these moneys to any person entitled thereto, but still wrongfully withheld the same; and that the defendant in error had, out of his own private funds, before the institution of this suit, made good the said moneys to the several parties entitled thereto. These terms were not imposed by the court upon plaintiff in error, but were merely an agreement of facts arrived at between counsel, whereupon the continuance was by consent; and it nowhere appears in the record that the facts agreed were not the real facts of the case, or that plaintiff in error was at all injured by embodying the agreement in the order entered.

The court is further of opinion that the court below did not err in refusing to allow plaintiff in error to file the three special pleas offered at the February term of court, 1903, when the cause was tried. Plaintiff in error had pleaded at the prior term the general issue, and not only were the matters set up in the special pleas such as could have been proven under the general issue, but the privilege was expressly reserved to it, in the order rejecting the pleas, to offer any evidence under the general issue that was proper to be offered under the pleas tendered; and there is no suggestion anywhere in the record that plaintiff in error was prevented from introducing any evidence which it desired in support of the matters stated in the pleas, or prejudiced by their rejection.

The court is further of opinion that the court below did not err in its refusal to allow the defendant in error, while on the witness stand, to answer the following cross-question propounded to him:

"Was Mr. Herndon intoxicated, and did he remain intoxicated for several days after that?"

The occasion referred to in the question was on a day in August, 1900, when Herndon was in some domestic trouble, and the witness had called to see him with reference to that trouble. We are unable to see the materiality of the evidence sought to be elicited from the witness by the question. This assignment of error, for another cause, could not be sustained, as the bill of exception is faulty, in that it does not indicate what the plaintiff in error proposed to prove by the witness. It is true counsel explained the object of the question, which goes alone to its materiality, but fails to show what was expected to be proved by the witness and its materiality to the issue in the case. "Where a question is asked, and the witness is not permitted to answer, the bill of exceptions must show what the party offering the witness expected or proposed to prove by him." And the same rule applies where a question is asked on cross-examination which the witness is not permitted to answer. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Pollard, 94 Va. 357, 28 S. E. 421, 86 L. R. A. 271, 64 Am. St. Rep. 715; Childress v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 94 Va. 189, 26 S. E. 424; Brock v. Bear, 100 Va. 563, 42 S. E. 307.

The court is further of opinion that the lower court did not err in refusing to allow Dr. H. P. Taylor, a witness introduced by plaintiff in error, to answer the question, propounded by its counsel, as to whether or not the witness loaned Herndon money on a certain date in August, 1900; the object of which question, as counsel stated, being to prove by the witness that he had indorsed for Herndon and loaned him money in August, 1900, about the time defendant in error loaned him $300. We are wholly unable to see the materiality of this evidence, or that plaintiff in error was prejudiced by its exclusion, especially as it abundantly appears that, if money was lent by the witness Taylor or the defendant in error to Herndon in August, 1900, it was to aid him in removing difficulties confronting him growing out of domestic troubles, and not out of any default in the discharge of the duties of his office as deputy sergeant, of which default defendant in error at that time had no knowledge whatever.

The court is further of opinion that there is no merit in the plaintiff in error's sixth assignment of error (bill of exceptions No. 3). Plaintiff in error had introduced the witness C. A. Ashby on its own behalf, and on cross-examination counsel for defendant in error propounded to him the question, "Did you make any suggestion to Mr. Milstead, Mr. Ashby, that Mr. Herndon was actually stealing or embezzling that money?"—referring to an occasion prior to Herndon's disappearance from Newport News, when the witness spoke to Milstead (defendant in error) with reference to some money which the witness was informed Herndon had collected, and would not pay over to the witness as counsel for the party to whom the money was going; and the objection to the question was on the ground that, the facts having been set out to Milstead, the answer would be mere legal opinion.

It is manifest that this was a proper question, as plaintiff in error was seeking to prove that defendant in error had knowledge of Herndon's peculations, and committed a fraud upon plaintiff in error by continuing Herndon in his office as deputy; and the answer witness made but negated the contention that defendant in error was informed by the witness of Herndon's defaults, the answer being as follows: "No, sir. Mr. Milstead was rather slow about it, but I never knew until Mr. Herndon left here as to his being short. There was no suggestion made then."

At the trial of the cause plaintiff in error asked for six instructions, two of which, viz., the third and sixth, were refused, and the first, second, fourth, and fifth were granted, with a modification of the second, and this action of the court is assigned as error.

The first instruction sets out that the knowledge of the defalcation of Herndon, without dismissal, would release the surety, and fully covered the law on the point that if defendant in error knew, or might, in justice to Herndon's surety (plaintiff in error), have known, from facts brought to his knowledge, that Herndon was failing to remit collections made by virtue of his office, and continued Herndon in his office, there could be no recovery in this action; and the fourth and fifth instructions given were practically to the same effect, varying only from the first in referring to the facts which it was considered that the evidence tended to prove.

The second instruction, as offered, injected into the case the rule of constructive notice, which was founded on the mistaken theory that there was on the part of defendant in error a duty to make continuous and diligent search into each levy of his deputy and the payment of money collected. The rule of law invoked by plaintiff in error to the effect that "whenever inquiry is a duty the party bound to make it is affected with knowledge of all which he would have discovered had he performed the duty," has no application to this class of cases, in the absence of special provisions in the contract sued on; and in this case no such conditions and duties as propounded in the instruction were imposed upon the defendant in error, the bond being conditioned only upon Herndon's faithful discharge of the duties of his office as deputy sergeant.

The instruction, as given, was as follows, the modification appearing in italics:

"(2) The court instructs the jury that knowledge of facts and circumstances naturally calculated to excite suspicion in the mind of a person of ordinary care, and to prompt him to pause and inquire, is sufficient to affect a party with notice of all facts necessarily to be discovered upon such inquiry, and to which the facts known furnish a reasonable and natural clue; and if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Milstead, had such knowledge of such facts and circumstances, they shall, in the absence of countervailing evidence, find him chargeable with notice."

Had the court granted the instruction as asked, the record discloses no avenue of inquiry, which, if defendant in error had followed, would have led him to the knowledge of Herndon's defalcation. It is agreed that all the moneys in the declaration mentioned, demanded by defendant in error in this action, were collected by Herndon after the 9th day of July, 1900, and before the 16th day of May, 1901, and the evidence shows unmistakably that Herndon's account was straight on July 6, 1900, and that the defalcations occurred only within about three months before Herndon's discharge, and that knowledge of the default was not brought home to defendant in error until a confession made by Herndon after his discharge. This confession was in writing, and was brought into the record by plaintiff in error, and the defendant in error testifies as to the date when he received it, and that it was the first intimation that he had of Herndon's defalcation; and there is no evidence that could be considered as tending to successfully contradict that statement. Therefore it is manifest that the modification of this instruction could not have been prejudicial to plaintiff in error, though, as said by the learned judge below, its phraseology is not happy.

All that need be said of plaintiff in error's third instruction refused is that the proposition of law contained therein, namely, that defendant in error was required to observe the utmost good faith toward plaintiff in error, as surety for Herndon, and if, from the evidence, the jury believed that he failed to do so, then the surety would be discharged from liability for the subsequent acts of Herndon, was fully covered by the instructions which the court did give.

Brandt on Suretyship, § 423, says: "The mere negligence of the officers of a bank in examining or checking the accounts of a clerk or cashier does not amount to a fraud or concealment, and will not discharge his surety." To the same effect is R. F. & P. R. R. Co. v. Kasey, 30 Grat. 227. And in Bostwick v. Van Voorhis, 91 N. Y. 353, relied on by plaintiff in error, it is said at page 361: "Before a bond in such a case can be avoided, the fraud and bad faith should be brought home to the obligee by quite clear and decisive evidence; otherwise bonds of this character will furnish a very precarious security to the parties who take them." "A concealment which will avoid a guaranty must be a fraudulent one. If not fraudulent in fact or in law, the defense is not made out."

The law of vendor and vendee has no analogy to that of surety and creditor, unless special provisions in the surety bond impose like conditions and duties as those imposed by the rule applicable to vendor and vendee, and, as already said, there were no such provisions in the bond in this case.

The sixth instruction offered by plaintiff in error and refused, as did its second as offered, sought to impose upon defendant in error duties not imposed either by the law or by the contract between the parties, and to have done so would have established a rule which would, as was said in Howe Machine Co. v. Farrington, 82 N. Y. 127, make instruments of that character of little value. Good faith on the part of defendant in error was the test as to whether or not he was entitled to recover in this action. R. F. & P. R. R. Co. v. Kasey, supra; Crawn v. Com., 84 Va. 287, 4 S. E. 721, 10 Am. St. Rep. 839; Daniel on Neg. Insts. § 1309; Stearns on Suretyship, pp. 154, 157, 455; Brandt on Suretyship, supra.

"If the acts of fraud or dishonesty by the principal are not known to the creditor, the duty of disclosure does not apply, even though the creditor, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, might have discovered the default. Such diligence need not be exercised in the interest of the surety or guarantor."

"Fraud will not be imputed because the creditor, by reason of negligence or inattention to his own affairs, does not know of the facts which materially affect the surety's risk." Stearns on Suretyship, supra.

All that was proper in the instructions refused was embraced in the instructions given, which, in our opinion, covered the entire case, and fairly submitted it to the determination of the jury. When instructions have already been given which cover the entire case and fairly submit it to the jury, to add repeated statements of the law, though in somewhat different form, would only tend to mislead and confuse the jury, and it is not error to refuse the additional instructions. Ferguson v. Wills, 88 Va. 189, 13 S. E. 802; McDonald v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 95 Va. 99, 27 S. E. 821; Myer v. Faulk, 99 Va. 389, 33 S. E. 178.

The court is further of opinion that the remaining assignment of error, which is to the refusal of the trial judge to set aside the verdict of the jury because contrary to the law and the evidence, is without merit, as the verdict is plainly in accordance with the law and the facts proven.

The judgment of the corporation court is affirmed.

(102 Va. 847)

NEWPORT NEWS & O. P. RY. & ELECTRIC CO. v. HAMPTON ROADS RY. & ELECTRIC CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

STATE CORPORATION COMMISSION—TRACK CROSSING—JURISDICTION—PENDING LITIGATION—FINDING OF COMMISSION.

1. The state corporation commission is not deprived of jurisdiction in controversies arising between two railway companies concerning a desired crossing, given it by Code 1887, § 1094, because of pending litigation, when that litigation is determined.

2. In addition to the presumption arising from the provision contained in paragraph "f," § 156, of article 12, of the Constitution, that the rulings of the state corporation commission are to be regarded as prima facie just, reasonable, and correct, held, that the evidence supports the finding of the commission that the crossing between two railroads should be established.

Appeal from State Corporation Commission.

Proceedings by the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company against the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company to determine the necessity and propriety of a certain railroad crossing. From the judgment of the state corporation commission the petitioner has appealed. Affirmed.

S. Gordon Cumming, for appellant. R. G. Bickford, Thos. W. Shelton, and W. J. Nelms, for appellee.

BOARDWELL, J. The Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company, by an ordinance of the council of the town of Phoebus, was given permission to lay upon certain streets of the town its tracks, and to operate on and over them electric cars plying between the city of Newport News and Old Point Comfort and other points east of the town of Phoebus. The Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company had previously been granted the privilege of using certain streets in said town, had laid its tracks, and was using them. Thereupon, in accordance with the provisions of section 1094 of the Code of Virginia of 1887, the president of the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company served notice on the president of the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company, advising the last-named company of the necessity and propriety of its crossing the tracks of the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company at four points within the corporate limits of the town of Phoebus, and furnished plans, specifications, appliances, and methods of operating such crossings, indicating the points of crossing, and otherwise complying with the requirements of the statute. The Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company declined to agree to the crossings upon any terms, and elected to apply to the corporation commission to inquire into the necessity and propriety of these proposed crossings, as provided by said section 1094 of the Code. When the matter came on to be heard before the corporation commission upon the petition of the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company, the notice of the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company, the plans, maps, specifications, description of appliances, and methods of operating said crossings, and the arguments of counsel, and the testimony of witnesses, the corporation commission ordered that E. J. Willis, an expert engineer, should report upon the matters set out in the record. This expert made a careful personal inspection of the points and surroundings of the proposed crossings, and made his report to the corporation commission, whereupon the corporation commission, in the light of all the facts brought before it by both companies, and the report of the expert engineer, pronounced favorably upon the necessity and propriety of the Hampton Roads Railway & Electric Company crossing with its tracks the tracks of the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company at four points in the town of Phoebus, viz.: First, at the intersection of Segar and Mellen streets; second, at the intersection of Willard avenue and Mellen street; third, at the intersection of Mellen and Water streets; and fourth, at the intersection of Mallory avenue and Mellen street; and in the manner indicated upon the plans and drawings filed with the notice and papers in the proceedings. The finding or order of the corporation commission then proceeds to prescribe the rail to be used at all of said crossings, and that the said crossings, both as to the track and overhead wire crossings, be made with the usual approved appliances used in the construction of crossings of electric railroads with solid block crossings and switches; and it further provides that at all of said crossings, the trains or cars of the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company shall have the right of way, and furthermore provides with the utmost detail the manner in which the cars of the respective companies are to be operated over said crossings.

From so much of this finding or order as permits the crossing of its track at the three last named points, the Newport News & Old Point Railway & Electric Company has appealed to this court.

There are but two grounds suggested by appellant why this finding or order of the corporation commission should be reversed, viz.: First, that the corporation commission was without jurisdiction in the premises; and, second, that the record does not establish the necessity and propriety of the crossings in question.

As to the first ground, it rests solely upon the fact that there was pending at the time in the circuit court of Elizabeth City county a litigation between the same parties over the right of appellee to the use of Mellen street in any way—by a single or double track or otherwise—in which litigation it was being contended, that the ordinance of the town of Phoebus conferring upon appellee the right to the use of Mellen street was ultra vires and void; and, further, if said ordinance was valid, appellee had lost the right thereby conferred by a failure to commence and complete its lines within the town of Phoebus in accordance with the provisions of the ordinance as to the time when the work of laying its tracks in the street was to begin and be completed.

A complete answer to this contention is that the litigation between these parties, referred to, has terminated by a decision of this court just rendered (47 S. E. 839), affirming the decree of the circuit court of Elizabeth City county, the effect of which is that the ordinance of the town of Phoebus is a valid ordinance, and that appellee, by virtue thereof, has the right to lay its tracks in Mellen street and other streets of the town of Phoebus.

As to the necessity and propriety of the crossings in question, authorized by the corporation commission, it need only be said that, in addition to the provision contained in the Constitution (article 12, § 156, par. "f"), that such rulings of the commission are to be regarded as "prima facie just, reasonable, and correct," and the provisions of the statute referred to, there is nothing whatever in the record that overcomes in the slightest degree the presumption arising upon the finding of the corporation commission that the crossings authorized are necessary and proper to be made; nor is there anything in the record to sustain the contention that they are unnecessary, and would be unsafe. On the contrary, the expert engineer, in his report, says, as to the crossings, when constructed in accordance with the methods and specifications furnished him by the chairman of the corporation commission: "I consider them all necessary and all reasonably safe, considering the conditions to be met. I would make no suggestions as to changes, additions, or safeguards. I believe that, while these complicated crossings would retard the schedules of both roads, and will necessitate slow and careful running down Mellen street by both companies, they are not, with proper care and diligence on the part of both companies, associated with particular danger to passengers or to the public." The right of appellee to cross the tracks of appellant is not in question. It is the manner of crossing, not for the benefit of the railroads, but for the benefit of the public. The object of creating the state corporation commission was to protect the public rights by regulating public utilities. That the commission in this matter has been untiring, most careful, and painstaking in its efforts to ascertain all local conditions before making its finding or ruling, is clearly shown by the evidence before it and the report of the expert.

It follows that the finding or order of the corporation commission is approved and affirmed.

Mack Manufacturing Company brings error. Reversed.

C. C. Carlin and Samuel G. Brent, for plaintiff in error. J. K. M. Norton and E. B. Taylor, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. By an ordinance of the city council of Alexandria it was provided that certain portions of King street should be graded, paved, and curbed, under the supervision of the city engineer, in a good and substantial manner, using for the pavement vitrified brick, and certain portions of the cost thereof to be paid by the city of Alexandria and the residue by the Washington, Alexandria & Mt. Vernon Railway Company and abutting property holders. To meet the cost of this improvement chargeable upon the city's treasury, the sum of $24,000 was appropriated by the ordinance, to be paid out as the work progressed, and pursuant to the ordinance a contract was entered into on behalf of the city with Charles M. Cuvillier, contracting under the style and firm name of Cuvillier & Co., whereby the latter undertook to do the work of paving, etc., King street. This contract provided that "all payments under this contract shall be made upon the certificate of the city engineer, countersigned by the committee on streets of the city council, upon the presentation of which to the auditor he shall draw his warrant upon the treasurer for the sum so certified to be due, payable out of the funds of the city treasury available for paving and curbing King street, under the ordinance passed May 27, 1902, and approved by the mayor May 29, 1902." These certificates were to be issued by E. C. Dunn, city engineer, upon estimates made by him about the 1st of each month during the progress of the work, and to be made of the amount of work then done, and of the relative value thereof at the prices named in the contract. In order to carry out this contract, Cuvillier & Co. purchased from the Mack Manufacturing Company the needed vitrified brick, and the Mack Manufacturing Company furnished the brick from time to time as they were called for. On the 15th of October, 1902, Cuvillier & Co. gave to C. H. Yohe, agent for the Mack Manufacturing Company, the following order:

"To E. C. Dunn, Esq., City Engineer: Please pay to C. H. Yohe, Agt. for Mack Mfg. Co., amount due us on block laid in street from time to time as said payments may become due. [Signed] Cuvillier & Co."

Yohe immediately placed this order in the hands of Dunn, the city engineer, and showed the same to E. S. Leadbeater, chairman of the committee of streets of the city council of Alexandria, which order Dunn accepted, as he testifies, and filed the same in his office. On October 24, 1902, Yohe, as agent as aforesaid, called upon Dunn, and received from him an estimate due Cuvillier & Co., amounting to the sum of $1,000, which Yohe took to Cuvillier & Co., and the latter indorsed it payable to C. H. Yohe, agent for the Mack Manufacturing Company. Yohe then took the estimate to Leadbeater, chairman of the committee on streets, who indorsed the same "Approved," and it was then taken to E. T. Price, auditor of the city, who drew a warrant on the city treasurer for the amount of the estimate, payable to Cuvillier & Co.; Price saying to Yohe that he was in the habit of making the warrant payable in this way, so as not to confuse his accounts, but, if Cuvillier & Co. refused to indorse the same, he (Yohe) could bring it back to him, and he (Price) would make it payable to Yohe as agent for the Mack Manufacturing Company. Cuvillier & Co. indorsed the warrant and Yohe collected the money due thereon from the city treasury. On December 8, 1902, Yohe obtained from Dunn, the city engineer, a further estimate on the work done by Cuvillier & Co., amounting to $2,700, which he took to Leadbeater, chairman of the committee on streets, who approved the same, and pursuing the same course in collecting this estimate as he had done in collecting the former, Yohe received the amount thereof from the treasury of the city. Cuvillier & Co. having become insolvent, on the 21st day of February, 1903, confessed a judgment in favor of William A. Smoot & Co. in the clerk's office of the circuit court of the city of Alexandria for the sum of $4,808.82, with interest and costs, and subsequently confessed judgments in favor of other parties, including the Mack Manufacturing Company. Upon the judgment in favor of William A. Smoot & Co. a fieri facias was immediately issued, and a suggestion sued out against the city council of Alexandria and the Washington, Alexandria & Mt. Vernon Railway Company, summoning the council and the railway company to appear before the judge of the circuit court of the city on the first day of the next regular term of the court to answer the suggestion. The city council on the 16th of March, 1903, answered the summons, and subsequently filed a supplemental answer, admitting that the city was indebted to Cuvillier & Co. for paving, etc., King street, under the contract above mentioned, and called attention to the writing given by Cuvillier & Co. on the 15th day of October, 1902, and further admitted that there was due and to become due from the city to Cuvillier & Co. a sum considerably in excess of the amount claimed by the Mack Manufacturing Company upon its order of October 15, 1902, namely, $1,374.37, and submitted to the court the question whether or not the city should pay this sum of $1,374.37 to the Mack Manufacturing Company or to the satisfaction of the fieri facias on judgments confessed by Cuvillier & Co. in favor of William A. Smoot & Co. and others. The Washington, Alexandria & Mt. Vernon Railway Company also answered, admitting an indebtedness to Cuvillier & Co. on their contract for paving King street, but with this answer we have no concern. Upon the filing of these answers an agreement was entered into by all parties to the several garnishee proceedings heard together, whereby all matters of law and fact, without the intervention of a jury, were submitted to the court for its determination as to who was entitled to be paid out of the funds due from the city council, and in what order of priority; and the court held, inter alia, that the lien of the fi. fa. sued out by William A. Smoot & Co. had priority over the claim of the Mack Manufacturing Company, by virtue of its assignment of October 15, 1902, prior in date to the fi. fa. in favor of W. A. Smoot & Co.

This judgment was suspended to the extent of $1,500 for 60 days, to enable the Mack Manufacturing Company to apply for a writ of error thereto, and which writ was awarded by one of the judges of this court.

The controversy here, therefore, between the plaintiff in error, the Mack Manufacturing Company, and the defendant in error, William A. Smoot & Co., and the sole question that we deem it necessary to consider, is whether or not the order given by Cuvillier & Co. to plaintiff in error, above set out, constituted an assignment pro tanto of the funds due from the city of Alexandria to Cuvillier & Co. as the work done by the latter in paving King street progressed.

As has been remarked, Dunn, the city engineer, testified that he accepted the order, and it was acted upon in disbursing the funds applicable to the cost of paving King street until the garnishee proceedings by the creditors of Cuvillier & Co. were set on foot. Not only was the order acted upon as before stated, but notice of it was unquestionably brought home to every official of the city who had any connection with the execution of the work of paving King street, or the expenditure of the money expressly appropriated by the ordinance of the council to meet the cost of the improvement, and, while wholly unnecessary to the validity of the order as an assignment of the funds in question, notice of the order was brought home to defendant in error before they obtained the confession of judgment from Cuvillier & Co. The order was regarded, not only by plaintiff in error, but by Cuvillier & Co. and by Dunn, the city engineer, upon whose certificate, approved by the chairman of the committee on streets, alone, the funds could be withdrawn from the city's treasury, as a valid assignment of the funds pro tanto to plaintiff in error.

In Hicks v. Roanoke Brick Co., 94 Va. 745, 27 S. E. 598, the opinion by Riely, J., says: "There can be no doubt as to the doctrine that when, for a valuable consideration from the payee, an order is drawn upon a third person, and made payable out of a particular fund, then due or to become due from him to the drawer, and is delivered to the payee, it operates as an equitable assignment pro tanto of the fund, and constitutes a lien upon it in the hands of him who owes the debt, or has possession of the fund out of which the order is made payable." That case is relied on by defendant in error, because the order upon which the payee claimed an equitable assignment of the fund to become due from the city of Roanoke was held not to constitute an equitable lien in favor of payee on the fund; but that decision was based upon the fact that the paper relied on was but "a mere promise or agreement by the drawer of the order to pay, when and as it collected from the city of Roanoke the money the drawer would owe to the contractor, and the conditions upon which the drawer of the order agreed to pay had never been, and never could be, fulfilled."

And in Clayton v. Fawcett, 2 Leigh, 19, also relied on by defendant in error, the writing in question was held not to constitute an equitable assignment of the fund upon which it was drawn, for the reason that the payment of the amount named was to depend on the drawer being absent. See Brooks v. Hatch, 6 Leigh, 542.

In Chesapeake Classified Bldg. Ass'n v. Coleman et al., 94 Va. 433, 26 S. E. 843, it was held "that, in order to constitute a valid assignment in equity, all that is necessary is an order from the person to whom the money is due or coming on the person in whose hands or under whose control it may be to pay to the payee; and where the drawee had notice of the order and thereafter paid the money to the drawer, the drawee was liable to the payee for the amount thereof." In that case the contractor gave an order on the building association in the following words: "Pay to Coleman & Sams, Trustees, for Balance and Jones five hundred and thirty-nine ⁸⁸/₁₀₀ dollars and charge same to balance due me on A. M. E. Church." Notice of this order was given to the secretary of the association, and the association was informed of the order by letter from the payees of the same date as the order, and the letter was received by the association, and read in a meeting of the board of directors. Afterwards the association, in disregard of the order, paid the money to the drawer thereof, and this payment was regarded not to be a valid payment, and the association was required to pay again the amount of the order to the payees named therein. See, also, Didier v. Patterson, 93 Va. 534, 25 S. E. 661; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1283; Merchants' & M. Nat. Bank v. Barnes, 18 Mont. 335, 45 Pac. 218, 47 L. R. A. 737, 56 Am. St. Rep. 586; Philadelphia v. Lockhart, 73 Pa. 211; 2 Shinn on Attach. §§ 537, 540; Dickerson v. City of Spokane (Wash.) 66 Pac. 381; Walton v. Horkan, 112 Ga. 814, 38 S. E. 105, 81 Am. St. Rep. 77; Conway v. Cutting, 51 N. H. 407; Kirtland v. Moore, 40 N. J. Eq. 106, 2 Atl. 269.

In 2 Shinn on Attachments, supra, it is said: "Choses in action, other than negotiable instruments, which, without fraud, have been equitably assigned, are no longer the property of the assignor, and therefore cannot be garnished at suit of assignor's creditors; and the fact that the assignee cannot, in many states, maintain an action at law, but must sue in the name of the assignor, does not affect the rule. The garnishing creditor can stand on no better footing than his debtor, and the assignor has lost control over it.

"When a debt, fund, or property has been assigned for a good and valuable consideration, and notice has been given to the debtor of that fact, the same is beyond the reach of the assignor's creditors by process of garnishment, no matter in what way the debtor was informed of the assignment. It is sufficient that he know that his creditor is divested of all his rights to the debt assigned."

In Dickerson v. City of Spokane, supra, an order addressed to the comptroller of the city directed payment to the payee of the order a sum of money out of any moneys belonging to the drawer that might thereafter become due him from the city "on the waterworks contract," which order was filed with the comptroller of the city, and it was held to constitute an equitable assignment of so much of the moneys owing to the contractor as would equal the amount of the order.

In Bank v. Barnes, supra, a contractor gave an order on a mining company to deliver to the payee named in the order a check to become due to the drawer, and the payee, the Merchants', etc., Bank, immediately presented the order to the mining company for acceptance, but it was not accepted at that time, as there was no money yet due the drawer. Afterwards the mining company, in disregard of the order, paid the money due to the drawer thereof to a garnishing creditor, and it was held that the order constituted a valid assignment of the fund, and that the payment made by the mining company did not discharge its liability to the payee of the order.

To the same effect is Philadelphia v. Lockhart, supra, where the order was addressed to the board of school controllers, and drawn by a contractor for the building of a schoolhouse in the city of Philadelphia. Notice of the order was given to the school controllers, and it was held a sufficient notice to the city of the rights of the payee in the order.

In the case at bar the city council of Alexandria, under its contract with Cuvillier & Co., required Dunn, its engineer, to take charge of the work of paving King street, and upon his certificate all payments were to be made on account of the work. This constituted Dunn the agent of the city, and, as was said in the opinion in Philadelphia v. Lockhart, supra, notice to an agent, bound, in the discharge of his duty, to act upon it and communicate it to his principal, is notice to the principal.

No question was raised by the city, or any one else, as to the right of plaintiff in error, by virtue of the order of October 15, 1902, to be paid for the brick it furnished for paving King street out of the money to become due from the city to Cuvillier & Co. as the work progressed, until the insolvency of the latter; and whether the office of city engineer was created by the charter of the city or by an ordinance of its council does not alter the case, and, if it were conceded that notice to the city was necessary in order to make the order in question a valid assignment in favor of the plaintiff in error, notice to Dunn, the engineer, was all-sufficient. The council of the city of Alexandria, as stakeholder, has in its hands a fund that one of two parties is entitled to, and it is immaterial what notice the city had of the order in question. Our statute (section 3801 of the Code of 1887) expressly excepts from the lien of a writ of f. fa. any estate of the debtor which has been assigned for a valuable consideration, unless the assignee had notice of the f. fa. at the time of the assignment, and it is not questioned here that the order held by plaintiff in error, prior in date to the f. fa. of defendant in error, was given for a valuable consideration.

It follows that we are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court is erroneous, and should be reversed and annulled; and this court will enter such judgment as the circuit court should have entered, namely, that plaintiff in error recover of the city of Alexandria the sum of $1,374.37, with interest from the 21st day of February, 1903, till paid, and also to recover of the defendant in error the costs incurred by plaintiff in error in this court and in the circuit court.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. OLIVER.

MASTER AND SERVANT—PERSONAL INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE — HARMLESS ERROR—SPECIAL JURY — VERDICT—EXCESSIVENESS.

1. Under Code 1887, § 3158, authorizing a special jury, the discretion of the trial court in refusing one cannot be interfered with on appeal, where there was no showing, in support of the request, that the facts alleged therein were true, and it is not made to appear on appeal that any prejudice resulted from the refusal.

2. In an action against a railroad company for injuries to a brakeman caused by the collision of an incoming train with the train under which plaintiff was working in a switchyard, the evidence showed that a fellow servant of plaintiff had been sent out by order of the yard conductor to flag an incoming train, and had done so, returning on the train. The rules of the railroad company required brakemen sent out under such circumstances to stay out until recalled by the yard whistle, and provided that the brakemen must be instructed in the rules, furnished with time-tables, and carry watches, but there was evidence that the brakeman who went out to flag the incoming train had not been instructed in the rules and carried no watch, and that the rule as to remaining out until recalled did not apply to yard brakemen. When this brakeman returned he was seen by the yard conductor and put to work by him on the same train under which plaintiff was working at the time he was injured. Held, that there was sufficient basis in the evidence for an instruction that, if the yard conductor could have known by reasonable diligence that the brakeman had returned without flagging the train which injured plaintiff in time to have had that train flagged, they should find for plaintiff.

3. In reviewing the evidence to determine whether it affords sufficient basis for an instruction, it is not to be considered as upon a demurrer to the evidence, but the question is whether there is evidence upon which to rest the instruction, or to which it is referable.

4. When it clearly appears from a consideration of the instructions as a whole that the jury could not have been misled by them, the judgment should not be reversed, though as abstract propositions they may not accurately state the law.

5. Where it can be seen from the whole record that, even under instructions in all respects correct, a different verdict could not have been rightly found, the court will not reverse the judgment for error in instructions.

6. In an action against a railroad company for personal injuries, a juror is not disqualified by reason of the fact that he has a claim against the company for personal injuries, which he intends to prosecute.

7. A negro brakeman 24 years of age, strong, healthy, and industrious, in the line of promotion, having a wife and two children to support, and earning from $1 to $1.50 a day, was injured so as to necessitate the amputation of a foot. Held, that a verdict for $5,000 was not excessive.

Error to Corporation Court of Danville.

Action by James Oliver against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Berkeley & Harrison, for plaintiff in error.
Cabell and Ouster, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. James Oliver, plaintiff in the court below, received injuries while in the service of the Southern Railway Company on its yards in the city of Danville, Va., and brought this action in the corporation court of the said city to recover damages therefor, and upon the trial judgment was rendered on the verdict of the jury against the defendant company for $5,000.

The circumstances under which the plaintiff was injured are as follows: There are three tracks of the defendant company in front of its passenger depot in the city of Danville, and at about 4 o'clock on the morning of March 10, 1903, passenger train No. 11, from Richmond, was standing on the outer track, heading south. Passenger train No. 34 had just come in from the south, and was standing on the middle track, heading north, while No. 39 was standing on the main track next to the depot, heading south. Just before train No. 39 from the north arrived in front of the depot, and while passenger train No. 40, from the south, was standing on the main track next to the depot, John Balze, yard flagman, was sent out by John Willard, yard conductor, to flag train No. 34, then overdue and coming from the south, with instructions, as Balze, who was examined as a witness for defendant, swears, to flag No. 34 and come in on it. It was while Balze was out on his instructions from Willard that No. 40 proceeded north, passing No. 39 at North Danville, and the latter train came in and occupied the main track next to the depot. Balze did flag No. 34 and came in on it to the yard, and was at once, as he testifies, set to work by Willard to aid in taking cars from No. 11 and coupling them to train No. 39. When Balze returned from flagging train No. 34, Oliver was coupling cars to and under No. 39, under the immediate orders of Willard, the yard conductor. No. 32 was expected from the south, but trains about that time were running irregularly, and No. 40 had come in to the depot on No. 32's time, and no one seemed to know exactly when No. 32 would be in, as will be seen from the evidence. While Oliver was under one of the cars of No. 39, train No. 32 rushed swiftly into the depot yard and collided with train No. 39, under which Oliver was engaged, knocked the engine and train of No. 39 back some distance, throwing Oliver down, several car wheels passing over him, and so mashing and mangling his foot and ankle that they had to be amputated below the knee.

Oliver, Balze, and John Waddill were all brakemen, members of the yard crew, and Willard was the yard conductor in charge of these brakemen, and this crew worked under Yardmaster Pierce in the day, and his assistant, P. H. Gilliland, at night, the latter being in charge the night of the accident. It was the duty of this crew to make up the trains, taking cars from one train and putting same on to another, coupling hose, etc., and also to flag incoming trains, so as to protect trains standing at the station, when instructed so to do by Willard, the yard conductor, or either of the yardmasters. Oliver and Balze were of course in the same grade, and worked under the same conductor, with exactly the same duties; and the trial of this case proceeded upon the theory throughout that, if the injuries to Oliver were caused by the negligence of Balze, Oliver could not recover, as they were to be regarded as fellow servants; but if the proximate cause of the injuries was the negligence of Yard Conductor Willard, or any other officer or agent of a higher grade of employment with the defendant company than that of Oliver, the fellow servant doctrine did not apply. Constitution of Virginia, § 162; Acts 1901-02, p. 335, c. 322.

There is no controversy as to its being Willard's duty to control and direct the general and immediate work of Oliver, and also that of Balze, working in the same crew with Oliver.

We are asked to reverse the judgment of the lower court upon the following grounds, viz.: (1) The refusal of the court to order, on the motion of the defendant company, a special jury; (2) the giving of plaintiff's instruction No. 2; (3) the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict because counsel for the defendant company made affidavit that they had heard that Crews, one of the jurors, had been in a collision on the defendant company's road, and intended to make claim or sue the company; (4) that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence; and (5) that the damages awarded by the jury are excessive.

The reason urged why a special jury should be allowed was that "a collision had taken place before daybreak between two passenger trains, two men had been killed and several wounded, and much feeling aroused adverse to the defendant, in addition to the unfortunate prejudice, especially in Danville, against this company."

There is nothing whatever in the record to sustain this contention, or to show that the corporation court did not exercise a sound discretion in refusing a special jury. It could not assume, in the absence of any proof to that effect, that the conditions existed that counsel suggested.

In Atlantic & Danville R. Co. v. Peake, 87 Va. 133, 12 S. E. 348, a motion was made for a special jury, on the ground that the case was one "involving questions in which a whole magisterial district was interested, and that it would be almost an impossibility to draw from the 'jury box' a jury that would not contain some name or names from that district, and that there was much prejudice in that district against the defendant company." But there being produced no evidence or affidavits to prove the grounds of the motion, it was overruled, and this court approved the action of the circuit court. The opinion by Lewis, P., in disposing of the question, virtually presented whether the allowance of a special jury is or is not a matter of right, and, after quoting the statute (section 3158 of the Code of 1887), and remarking that the statute left the question as to whether or not a special jury should be allowed, as at common law, to the discretion of the court—"a discretion, it is true, not arbitrary, but a sound judicial discretion, to be governed by settled principles, and reviewable, when exercised, by the appellate court"—says: "Each case, therefore, must stand on its own circumstances, and, where it appears from a survey of the record that injustice has not been done, the judgment of the trial court will not be reversed, although the appellate court may be of opinion that, upon the showing made, a special jury ought to have been allowed. In such a case the error is not to the prejudice of the party complaining." And in Goodell's Ex'rs v. Gibbons, 91 Va. 608, 22 S. E. 604, it is held that a motion for a special jury is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and its judgment will not be reversed unless it plainly appears that the discretion has been improperly exercised.

At the trial the three instructions asked by the defendant company were given, and no objection is urged as to Nos. 1 and 3 given at the instance of the plaintiff. The objection made to plaintiff's instruction No. 2 is that it nullified the instructions Nos. 1 and 2 given for the defendant company, and misled the jury. It is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the yard conductor, Willard, was an employé of the defendant company having the right or charged with the duty to control or direct the general services or the immediate work of the plaintiff, ordered John Balze, a co-employé of the plaintiff, to flag train No. 34 only, and did not order him to flag train No. 32, and that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the failure to flag No. 32, or if they believe from the evidence that the said Willard ordered the said Balze to flag both trains No. 34 and 32, and that the said Willard knew, or could have known by reasonable diligence, that the said Balze had returned without flagging train No. 32 in time to have the said latter train flagged before the collision, they should find for the plaintiff."

The defendant company's instructions Nos. 1 and 2 told the jury that if Balze's neglect caused the accident the plaintiff could not recover, and it is argued that plaintiff's instruction No. 2 holds that Willard was bound to specify and name the trains to be flagged; that when he sent Balze out to flag, to protect the station filled with trains, and told him to look out for No. 34, but did not name No. 32, although Balze knew No. 32 was coming, and although the rules required he should stay out until called in, yet because Willard did not designate the train, and Balze forgot it, that makes Willard, and not Balze, the faulty party whereby defendant's instructions were nullified.

Had plaintiff's instruction No. 2 omitted the words "or could have known by reasonable diligence," so that it would have simply read that if Willard ordered Balze to flag train No. 34 only, and did not order him to flag train No. 32, and that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the failure to flag No. 32, and that Willard knew that Balze had returned, without flagging train No. 32, in time to have had the latter train flagged before the collision, the jury should find for the plaintiff, there could be no doubt, we think, as to the correctness of the instruction. The words "or could have known by reasonable diligence" should not have been inserted in the instruction without evidence in the record tending to prove a state of facts or circumstances, brought home to Willard, sufficient to put him on inquiry as to whether or not train No. 32 had been flagged, and which inquiry, prosecuted with reasonable diligence, would have enabled him to have ascertained the fact that it had not been flagged, and in time for him to have had it flagged, and thereby prevented the collision. In reviewing the evidence in connection with an instruction given or refused, the rule requiring that it shall be considered as upon a demurrer to evidence does not apply. The question is whether there is evidence upon which to rest the instruction, or to which it is referable. In this case, although the jury might have believed that Balze was told to flag No. 32, or that it was his duty to have done so under the rules of the company, yet with those words, "or could have known by reasonable diligence" that he had not done so—that is to say, that Willard could have known by reasonable diligence that fact—still they might have been misled by this expression in the instruction, even though there was no evidence to justify its insertion therein. But let us examine the evidence on this point.

Balze, the defendant company's witness, as will be remembered, says he, Waddill, and the plaintiff made up the yard crew, and worked directly under the orders of Willard, yard conductor, and that Willard was under Pierce, the yardmaster, in the day, and his assistant, Gilliland, at night; that it was the duty of the yard conductor and his crew to make up trains, taking cars from one train and putting them on another, and also to flag incoming trains, so as to protect those on the yard, if and when ordered by the yard conductor, and to do only as ordered, and that the yard conductor controls by oral and not written orders. Tunstall, the yard engineer on duty the night of the accident, and who was a witness for the plaintiff, corroborates Balze. Balze further testifies that the defendant company's rules 99 and 100, as to flagging trains, did not apply to the crew of the yard, and that they were governed by oral orders of the yardmaster, his assistant, or the yard conductor. He was asked the question whether the yard brakeman flagged by said rules, and his reply is, "We don't flag that way on the yard." He further states that he was told by Willard to go out and flag No. 34, and come in on it; that he carried out the instructions given him by Willard absolutely that night, as he had done before, and as was ordinarily done on the yard; and that both Gilliland and Willard knew that he had gone out to flag No. 34, and had returned upon that train, and that they united in putting him to work on the train No. 39, which plaintiff was coupling up after his (Balze's) return on No. 34. This latter statement is nowhere denied in the record, but is corroborated, we think, as will presently be seen, by Willard. Further, this witness says that there was plenty of time after he came in on No. 34, and after he was seen by Willard and put to work, to have had No. 32 flagged, thus preventing the collision with No. 39; and that he had neither watch nor time-table, and that the officers under whom he worked knew it. True, he says he knew No. 32 was a scheduled train, but he did not know whether it was on time or not, and as a matter of fact it was behind time. It was sought to make the witness say that he forgot No. 32, but he emphatically denies that he did forget it, and insisted that he was not instructed to flag No. 32, and that he did as he was instructed. A rule of the company required that Balze, and other employes of the defendant company working in the grade that he was, should be instructed in the rules of the company, and be furnished with a time-table, and be required to have a watch; but it clearly appears that he had not been instructed in the rules, nor furnished with a time-table, nor had a watch, and that the officers of the defendant company under whom he worked knew these facts. Gilliland, called as a witness for the defendant company, testifies that Balze was not to his knowledge instructed in the rules of the company, and that he did not know whether any one performed this duty or not; he could not say whether he had been furnished with a time-table or had a watch, as the rules of the company required, or not, and while he says that the yard flagmen have their duties made out just as well as the yardmaster, he admitted that they go wholly by the instructions as to what they are to do by the yardmaster and the conductor. He further says that Willard was in charge of the shifting of cars from other trains to train No. 39 on the night of the accident, and that Balze told him that he forgot No. 32 after the accident occurred; but he in no way impairs the statement, made by Balze, that he and Willard both knew that Balze had come in on No. 34, and by both told to help in the work at which the plaintiff, Oliver, was engaged.

Willard, also examined as a witness for the defendant company, admits that he was excited at the time that he sent Balze out to flag, as was usual with him and others on the yard when a number of trains were standing in the yard and others expected, and he nowhere says that he instructed Balze to flag No. 32, nor does he deny that he saw Balze after he returned on No. 34 and before the collision. On the contrary, he says that he was superintending, or that he was looking after, the shifting being done by Oliver, and it clearly appears that Balze was assisting in doing this work, and that Balze cut the car loose that was being coupled up by the plaintiff. According to the statement of both Gilliland and Willard, the latter was directing the shifting of the cars from other trains to train No. 39, and, if this is true, the statement of Balze that these witnesses saw him and directed him to go at this work must also be true, as Balze was so engaged before the collision, and cut loose the car that plaintiff was coupling on to No. 39 at the time of the collision. Willard knew, as he admits, that "No. 32 was behind, but was expected to arrive in a short time, not over four or five minutes late." So that he must have known that Balze had not flagged No. 32, but had only flagged No. 84 and come in on it. He falls back on the rules of the company, and says Balze should have stayed out until called in by the yard whistle—that is, the whistle of the engine on the yard—but he knew that he had not been so called in, and, while he says that Balze told him the first time he met him that he forgot No. 82 (meaning the first time he met him after the accident), it was sought to have him say, in effect, that Balze had admitted to him that he was instructed to flag No. 82 and forgot it, but he fails to so testify. This question was propounded to him: "Told you he forgot No. 82 and came in on No. 84? A. I don't know about this." And then on cross-examination the following questions were propounded to him, and the following answers given:

"Q. Did you not direct Balze to go out and flag No. 84 and say nothing about No. 82?"

"A. No, sir; I told him to go out and flag for me—watch No. 84; she was close on No. 40.

"Q. What No. 40 do you mean by that?"

"A. No. 84 was right on the block of No. 40.

"Q. Should he have stayed out there until blown in?"

"A. Under my instructions he should have done so.

"Q. You told him to go out and flag No. 84 without waiting to be called in?"

"A. Yes, sir."

It thus appears from Balze's statement that the yard flagmen were controlled by instructions from the yardmaster or conductor, and not by the printed rules of the company, and also that in giving his instructions to Balze, which were given while No. 40 was standing on the main track, Willard had in mind the protection of No. 40 by having No. 84 flagged. Under these and other circumstances pointed out above, the jury was well warranted in finding that Willard ought to have known by the exercise of reasonable diligence that No. 82 had not been flagged, and this although they might have believed that Balze was instructed to flag both No. 84 and No. 82, and forgot the latter.

We are therefore of opinion that plaintiff's instruction No. 2 could not have misled the jury to the prejudice of the defendant company.

But for another reason we are of opinion that the judgment of the lower court should not be reversed because of instruction No. 2 given for the plaintiff. When all the instructions are read and construed together in the light of the evidence, it clearly appears, we think, that the jury could not have been misled nor deceived by any of them. When this is the case a judgment should not be reversed, though, as abstract propositions, they may not accurately state the law. Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey, 92 Va. 554, 24 S. E. 232; Russell Creek Coal Co. v. Wells, 96 Va. 418, 31 S. E. 614.

But if it could be said, in the light of the evidence, that instruction No. 2, in the respect discussed, was erroneous, it is well settled that where it can be seen from the whole record that, even under instruction in all respects correct, a different verdict could not have been rightly found—which is the case here, as we view it—this court will not reverse it. Richmond Ry., &c., Co. v. Garthright, 92 Va. 627, 24 S. E. 287, 32 L. R. A. 220, 53 Am. St. Rep. 839.

The next question to be considered is, should the judgment be reversed because the lower court refused to set aside the verdict of the jury on account of the affidavits of counsel that they had heard that one of the jurors had been in a collision on the defendant company's road and intended to make claim or sue the company?

We think not. The affiants do not state as a fact that this juror was making a claim to damage or intended to sue the defendant company, but merely state that they heard, after the trial, that such was the case.

"A new trial will not be granted on account of the disqualification of a juror for matter that is a principal cause of challenge, which existed before he was elected and sworn as such juror, but which was unknown to the party until after the trial, and which could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence, unless it appears, from the whole case before the court on motion for a new trial, that the party suffered injustice from the fact that such juror served in the trial of the case." Reynolds v. Richmond & M. Ry. Co., 92 Va. 407, 23 S. E. 772, and authorities cited.

But was Crews disqualified as a juror, even if what the affiants heard was a fact? We do not think so. He may have had an honest claim against the defendant company and yet regarded his oath as a juror, and there is nothing whatever in this record to indicate that he did not.

In Richardson v. Planters' Bank, 94 Va. 130, 26 S. E. 413, Riely, J., in discussing the question whether the fact that one of the jurors was a debtor to the defendant disqualified him as a juror, says: "If the juror does not stand indifferent to the cause, he is not competent. If he has any interest in the cause, or is related to either party, or has expressed or formed any opinion, or is sensible of any bias or prejudice, he is excluded by the law. The last disqualification has been applied in numerous business relations. The partner, or the clerk or other employé, of either of the parties, has been held to be incompetent. But we have been cited to no case that has gone so far as to hold that a debtor of the defendant was incompetent. To hold, as a legal presumption, that such relationship would be likely to warp the judgment, would be, in our opinion, to estimate too cheaply integrity under the sanction of the law."

We can see no reason why what was said in that case as to the incompetency of a debtor to the party defendant does not apply with equal force where the juror, as in this case, might have had a claim against the defendant company.

In considering whether the verdict in this case was contrary to the law and the evidence, we do not deem it necessary to review further the evidence, as we have very fully outlined it in considering the instructions to the jury, and we are of opinion that it very clearly appears thereby that this court could not say, either that the verdict was without evidence, or that the evidence was not sufficient to support it. Nor would we be justified in holding that the damages awarded by the jury are excessive. The suggestion that "the loss of a foot to a negro laborer would not, to a fair-minded jury, suggest a verdict of $5,000," could not of itself have any weight in determining this question. As has been seen, the plaintiff sustained the loss of his foot, amputated between the ankle and the knee, and the evidence shows that he was 24 years old when hurt, was in the line of promotion, industrious, strong, and healthy; that he had a wife and two children to support, and contributed largely to the support of a mother and an invalid father; that he was always employed at from $1 to $1.50 per day, and was maimed and disabled while in the discharge of his duties under the immediate supervision of his superior as an employé of the defendant company, and without fault upon his part.

It was said by this court, in Richmond Ry., etc., Co. v. Garthright, that no method has yet been devised nor scales adjusted by which to measure or weigh and value in money the degrees of pain and anguish of a suffering human being, nor ever likely to be, and that the verdict of the jury will not be disturbed unless the damages awarded be so great as to necessarily have been the result of prejudice or partiality. It must be clearly shown in the record that the jury was actuated by prejudice or partiality, otherwise, under the well-settled rules of the law, the verdict will not be disturbed. We do not think the record in this case would justify the reversal of the judgment on the ground that the damages awarded the plaintiff are excessive.

It follows, therefore, that the judgment of the corporation court of the city of Danville must be affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. WILLIAMS' EX'R.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 18, 1904.)

TAXATION — PERSONAL PROPERTY — DEATH OF OWNER — SITUS FOR TAXATION.

1. Under Code 1887, § 491, providing for the assessment of all personalty not exempt from taxation, and section 492, as amended by Acts 1897-98, p. 519, c. 490, providing that the property of a decedent shall be listed by the personal representative, and if it consists of bonds or stocks in any other county or city other than that of his residence, or in another state, it shall be taxed to the owner thereof, debts and shares of stock, for purposes of taxation, are located at the domicile of the creditor, though the evidence of the same be without the jurisdiction of the court.

2. On the death of a decedent, the legal title to debts due him passes to his executor, and should be taxed at the domicile of the executor.

3. Where testator devised certain property to a charitable institution, it is not exempt from taxation until the estate is administered, but is to be assessed in the name of the executor.

Error to Circuit Court, Amherst County.

Application of Indiana F. Williams' executor to be relieved from assessment of taxes against the estate. From the judgment granting the same, the commonwealth brings error. Reversed.

Wm. A. Anderson, Atty. Gen., and Otto L. Evans, for the Commonwealth. Daniel & Harper, A. E. Strode, and J. D. Horsley, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. Mrs. Williams, a citizen and resident of Amherst county, died in that county on the 29th of October, 1900, and Stephen R. Harding qualified as executor of her will in the county court of Amherst on the 23d of November of that year. Mrs. Williams at the time of her death owned a large personal property, consisting in the main of stocks and bonds, a part of which were in the vaults of a safe-deposit company in the city of New York. Up to the time of her death all of her property had been assessed for taxation in the state of Virginia, and that it was properly so assessed is not controverted.

On January 19, 1901, Harding was granted ancillary administration upon the will of Mrs. Williams in the state of New York, and, before he was permitted to remove the certificates of stock and evidences of debt deposited in the city of New York, he was required to pay a succession tax, amounting to about $19,000. This payment was made about March 20, 1901, and after that time the certificates of stock, bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness were delivered to him, and by him brought into the state of Virginia.

The executor named in the will having thus qualified in the courts of this state, and been granted ancillary administration in the courts of the state of New York, in the latter part of January, 1901, filed his bill in the circuit court of Amherst county, making all those interested in the estate parties defendant, asking a construction of the will, and submitting all questions arising under it to the determination of the court.

In May, 1902, the executor gave notice that he would, on the first day of the May term of the county court of Amherst county, "apply to the said court for relief against the assessment of taxes, county levies, and other local taxes assessed against me on personal property in my hands belonging to the estate of Indiana F. Williams, deceased, for the year beginning February 1, 1901, and so entered in the personal property book of the courthouse district of Amherst county, the grounds for my application being, among others, that the property so listed as being in my hands was held by me in trust:

"(1) A part, to wit, $43,250 thereof, consisted of gas stock in a New York corporation, the same being a specific legacy given Chas. N. McCall, of New York City, under the will of Mrs. I. F. Williams.

"(2) The balance of said estate in my hands so listed went under the residuary clause of said will to Sweet Briar Institute, a charitable educational corporation whose property is exempt from taxation under the laws of the state of Virginia.

"Respectfully,

"[Signed] S. R. Harding,
"Ex'or of Indiana F. Williams, Dec'd."

The executor by this notice asked for relief from all taxation by the state, the county of Amherst, or any subdivision thereof, and in the county court all matters raised by the notice were disposed of in one order. The facts proved before the county court were substantially as we have stated, and that court was of opinion: First, "that the bulk of the property consisted of securities in foreign corporations, the evidences of which were at the time of the assessment deposited in the city of New York, and outside of the jurisdiction of the state, not under the control of the executor, and therefore exempt from taxation here." Secondly, "that at the date of assessment the executor had also qualified as administrator in New York, and there was pending in the circuit court of Amherst county a suit in chancery, instituted by him, having for its object the administration of the whole estate in his hands, or to come in his hands, under the guidance of the court, and the record shows that the whole estate at the time of assessment was under the control of the court; that, while in the beginning the foreign investments were beyond the state jurisdiction, the personal representative by his own act had brought them within the jurisdiction, and therefore they were proper subjects for assessment by the examiner of records under the act of 1895-6." And, thirdly, that "the whole personal estate being under the control of the court and unadministered as of February 1, 1901, constituted a fund in the suit liable to assessment for taxation, regardless of who became the recipients of the fund under future decrees of the court."

From this judgment of the county court an appeal was taken to the circuit court of Amherst county, and that court being of opinion that "the New York property not in possession of the applicant in Virginia on the 1st day of February, 1901, was not liable to taxation in Virginia for that year, and that the shares of stock in the Lynchburg Cotton Mill & Improvement Company, and in the National Exchange Bank of Lynchburg, Virginia, had been improperly assessed for taxation against the applicant," reversed the judgment of the county court, and relieved the executor from county and district taxes, amounting to $3,264.21, and from taxes upon the same property due to the state, amounting to $2,007.90. To these judgments a writ of error was awarded by one of the judges of this court.

Mrs. Williams being at the time of her death a citizen of the state of Virginia, resident in the county of Amherst, was she taxable in this state and county upon intangible personal property, consisting of bonds and stocks, the evidences of ownership of which were in the vaults of a safe-deposit company in the city of New York, and held by it merely as a custodian?

Section 491 of the Code of Virginia of 1887 provides that: "The commissioner shall ascertain and assess all the personal property not exempt from taxation, and all subjects of taxation in his county, district, or city, on the said first day of February in each year.

* * * It shall be his duty to call on every person in his county, etc., to furnish a list of such property, money, credits, or other subject of taxation as required by law, and the value thereof." And under section 492, as amended by Acts 1897-98, p. 519, c. 490, it is provided, among other things, that: "If the property be the estate of a deceased person, it shall be listed by the personal representative or person in possession, and taxed to the estate of such deceased person. * * * If the property consists of money, bonds, stock, or other evidences of public or private debts, in any county or city other than that of his residence, or state other than Virginia, it shall be listed by and taxed to the owner thereof." By Acts 1897-98, p. 756, c. 707, it is provided that it shall be the duty of the examiner of records, annually, "to examine all causes pending in the courts of his circuit and the records thereof, and ascertain and report all money, bonds, notes, stocks, shares of stocks, capital, capital stock, choses in action, other evidences of debt, and all and every other species of personal property and income subject to taxation, under the control of the courts in his circuit, or held by any person, bank or corporation subject to the order of such courts, or in the hands of or under the control of receivers, commissioners and fiduciaries appointed by any deed or will."

It was the evident purpose of the Legislature to subject to taxation the subjects enumerated, such as moneys, bonds, stocks, or other evidences of public or private debt, wherever the actual situs of the evidences of such money, bonds, stocks, or other public or private debts might chance to be, if they were owned by a citizen and resident of Virginia, or in the hands of or under the control of receivers, commissioners, or fiduciaries appointed by any deed or will of record in Virginia and under the jurisdiction of its courts.

It is not questioned that during her lifetime Mrs. Williams was properly assessed for taxation upon these evidences of debt, which for convenience we shall hereafter designate as "the New York personalty." Let us consider for a moment upon what that right to tax in Virginia intangible personal property, the evidences of ownership of which were in the custody of a New York safe-deposit company, rests:

The bonds and certificates of stock were in New York City for safe-keeping. Of these bonds and stocks there were 50 shares of stock of the Consolidated Gas Company of New York, 6 $1,000 bonds of the Long Island Railway Company, and 6 $1,000 bonds of the Union Railway Company of New York City. The remainder of what we designate as "New York personalty," amounting to $497,000 in value, were bonds and certificates of stock in companies incorporated by and having their legal domicile in states other than that of New York.

In 2 Thompson on Corporations, § 2348, the legal effect and character of a stock certificate is very clearly stated. He says: "First, it is to be observed that such a certificate is merely the paper representative of an incorporeal right, and that it stands on a similar footing to that of other muniments of title. It is not in itself property, but it is merely the symbol or paper evidence of property." The author is here speaking of a certificate of stock, but the quotation applies with equal force to bonds or promissory notes of individuals or of incorporated companies. They are all the mere symbols or paper evidences of property, while it is the intangible incorporeal right existing in the creditor to demand of his debtor performance of the obligation which constitutes property.

Upon this subject Cooley on Taxation (2d Ed.) at page 21, says: "The mere right of a foreign creditor to receive from his debtor within the state the payment of his demand cannot be subjected to taxation within the state. It is a right that is personal to the creditor where he resides, and the residence or place of business of his debtor is immaterial."

Minor on Conflict of Laws, § 123, after stating that tangible personal property is taxable at the place of its actual situs, proceeds to discuss intangible personalty, with respect to which he says more difficulty is experienced in ascertaining the situs where it may be taxed. "The general practice is to treat debts as located, for purposes of taxation, at the creditor's domicile, and there is no doubt that they may have their situs there for that purpose." He gives, as an illustration, that shares of stock in a corporation are usually taxable at the domicile of the owner and not of the corporation, and this, it is stated in the note, is true even though a tax has already been paid on the stock in the domicile of the corporation; citing in support of these several propositions numerous authorities.

The adjudged cases are to the same effect. We will cite a few of the more pertinent.

In Hunter v. Board of Supervisors, etc., 33 Iowa, 378, 11 Am. Rep. 132, where a resident of Iowa had deposited for safe-keeping in Illinois promissory notes that had never been brought by him into Iowa, it was held that they were subject to taxation in the latter state. The notes in such case, says the court, are merely the evidence of the debts or rights represented, and these follow the person of the owner; that it seems a different rule might apply if the notes represented money loaned or invested through an agent in another state. And just here it may be well to repeat that in this case the New York personalty was in New York merely for safe-keeping. It was not there in the hands of an agent charged with any duty or clothed with any power or authority with respect to it, except as custodian. Those cases, therefore, such as Oatlin v. Hull, 21 Vt. 152, where notes were left by a resident of the state of New York in the state of Vermont, in the hands of an agent, for management, collection, and investment, in which it was held that the property was within the state of Vermont for the purposes of taxation, have no application here. As was said in Hunter v. Board of Supervisors, supra: "We may concede that money and credits under the control or management of an agent in another state, belonging to a resident of this state, with a view to be invested, loaned, or used for pecuniary profit by such agent, would not be the subject of taxation in this state."

In the case reported in 15 Wall. 300, 21 L. Ed. 179, as the "State Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds," Mr. Justice Field, delivering the unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, says:

"The power of taxation, however vast in its character and searching in its extent, is necessarily limited to subjects within the jurisdiction of the state. These subjects are persons, property, and business. Whatever form taxation may assume, whether as duties, imposts, excises, or licenses, it must relate to one of these subjects. It is not possible to conceive of any other, though, as applied to them, the taxation may be exercised in a great variety of ways. It may touch property in every shape, in its natural condition, in its manufactured form, and in its various transmutations. And the amount of the taxation may be determined by the value of the property, or its use, or its capacity, or its productiveness. It may touch business in the almost infinite forms in which it is conducted—in professions, in commerce, in manufacture, and in transportation. Unless restrained by provisions of the federal Constitution, the power of the state as to the mode, form, and extent of taxation is unlimited, where the subjects to which it applies are within her jurisdiction.

"Corporations may be taxed, like natural persons, upon their property and business. But debts owing by corporations, like debts owing by individuals, are not property of debtors in any sense; they are obligations of the debtors, and only possess value in the hands of the creditors. With them they are property, and in their hands they may be taxed. To call debts property of the debtors is simply to misuse terms. All the property there can be, in the nature of things, in debts of corporations, belongs to the creditors to whom they are payable, and follows their domicile, wherever that may be. Their debts can have no locality separate from the parties to whom they are due. This principle might be stated in many different ways, and supported by citations in numerous adjudications, but no number of authorities and no forms of expression could add anything to its obvious truth, which is recognized upon its simple statement."

Many cases are reviewed in this opinion, and the conclusions of the court are thus summed up in the syllabus: "Bonds issued by a railroad company are property in the hands of the holders, and, when held by non-residents of the state in which the company was incorporated, they are property beyond the jurisdiction of that state. A law of Pennsylvania, passed on the 1st of May, 1868, which requires the treasurer of the company incorporated and doing business in that state to retain 5 per cent. of the interest due on bonds of the company, made and payable out of the state to nonresidents of the state, citizens of other states, and held by them, is not, therefore, a legitimate exercise of the taxing power of the state. It is a law which interferes between the company and the bondholder, and, under the pretense of levying a tax, impairs the obligation of the contract between parties." See Commonwealth v. O. & O. R. R. Co., 27 Grat. 344.

These authorities are sufficient to establish the right of the state to assess for taxation, against Mrs. Williams, during her lifetime, the New York personalty, although the evidences of her right to that property were not in her actual possession in Amherst county, because the incorporeal right was in her, and she was in the county of Amherst, though the symbols or paper evidences of the property were in the state of New York.

But it is said that her death changed all this. The property, real and personal, which had belonged to her during her lifetime, continued to be the subject of taxation after her death. It passed under her will, and therefore it comes within the terms of the statute. To the moment of the death of Mrs. Williams it was, as we have seen, properly taxable in Amherst county. By her will title to all her personalty passed to her executor. He was not in possession on the 1st of February, 1901, of the paper evidences of this New York personalty, nor was his testatrix in such possession at the moment of her death. That fact did not exempt it from taxation in this state during her lifetime; why should it operate to shield it from taxation after her death, when by her will the title to this property passed to the executor? It may be conceded that an executor has no extraterritorial power; that an executor appointed by, and who qualifies under, a will proved in Virginia, has no right to sue in the courts of New York, but that the will must be admitted to probate and letters of administration be granted by the courts of that state. But that does not militate against the proposition that the title to all personal property of decedent passed to her executor, and payment to him and an acquittance given by him would have been a complete discharge and satisfaction of any obligation due to the estate which he represented. The state of New York might rightfully hold any personal property, tangible or intangible, within its borders, or any evidences of debt, subject to the satisfaction of any claims for taxes upon its part, or the demands of its citizens, but, those claims and demands being satisfied, the estate of the decedent is to be delivered to the executor appointed by the state of the decedent's domicile at the time of her death, there to be administered. In this case there were no debts due in the state of New York, and it is earnestly contended by counsel for appellant that the transfer or succession tax which was assessed upon the New York personalty was not lawful, and that its collection could have been successfully resisted by the executor. But with that we have no concern. The sole question before us is, was the property rightfully assessed with taxes by the state of Virginia and the county of Amherst?

Speaking of the place at which personal property belonging to decedent estates is taxable, Cooley on Taxation (2d Ed.) at page 376, says: "To determine where the personal property belonging to the estates of decedent estates shall be taxed, it is necessary to consult statutes. It is sometimes taxable to the estate as such at the place of situs if the deceased was a nonresident, or at his last place of domicile if a resident; but sometimes also to the personal representative in his character as such, and at his place of domicile. And it will continue to be taxable to the estate or to the representative until actually distributed, but not afterwards."

Desty on Taxation, vol. 1, at page 333, says: "The personal estate of a testator accompanies him wherever he may reside and become domiciled, so that he acquires the right of disposing of and dealing with it according to the law of his domicile. Personal property of deceased is not taxable after the appointment of the executor, and before distribution, when the property is not within the commonwealth, and neither the executor nor any person having an interest is a resident of the state." And further on the same author says: "The possession and control over property of an estate by an executor are those of the owner, for purposes of assessment and taxation. The legal title to personal property, consisting of money, stocks, and bonds of testator, is in the executor for purposes of administration."

It will be observed that this author states the law to be that the property of deceased is not taxable after the appointment of the executor, and before distribution, when it is not within the commonwealth, and neither the executor nor any person having interest in it is a resident of the state. The authority cited for this proposition is Dallinger v. Rapallo (O. C.) 14 Fed. 83, in which the opinion was delivered on the circuit by Mr. Justice Day of the Supreme Court, and the syllabus of the case is sufficient to explain what was there decided. "Personal property of a deceased inhabitant of Massachusetts is not taxable under Gen. St. 1860, c. 12, § 20, after the appointment of an executor and before distribution, when the property is not within the commonwealth, and neither the executor nor any person having an interest in or right to receive the property has a domicile or residence there." This is a proposition which does not admit of question, and the converse of which is authority in support of the right to tax in this case.

In Mayor and Aldermen of Gallatin v. Alexander, Executor of S. Wallace, 10 Lea, 475, it appears that Wallace died in Sumner county, Tenn., leaving a will by which he gave his personal estate to his nephews and nieces, some of whom were nonresidents of the state, and none of whom resided in the town of Gallatin; that Alexander, a resident of the town of Gallatin, was appointed executor of Wallace; that on his qualification he took charge of the personal estate, which consisted, among other things, of notes of individuals and of various foreign corporations, and bonds of several counties of the state of Kentucky. The court held that the legal title to this property was in the executor, and that its situs for the purpose of taxation was at the residence or domicile of the executor. Bonaparte v. Baltimore, 104 U. S. 592, 28 L. Ed. 845.

In Burroughs on Taxation, at page 224, it is said: "The personal property of decedents is taxed at the domicile of the decedent to the person having legal title, and not in the name of the deceased person. During the settlement of the estate it must have a situs somewhere, and none so appropriate as where the decedent lived."

We are of opinion that the New York personalty, for convenience so called, was properly assessed for taxation to the executor of the will of Mrs. Indiana F. Williams, and, in support of that conclusion, refer to the following authorities in addition to those already cited: Horne v. Green, 52 Miss. 452; Foresman v. Byrns, 68 Ind. 247; Frothingham v. Shaw, 175 Mass. 59, 55 N. E. 623, 78 Am. St. Rep. 475; Goldgart v. The People, 106 Ill. 25; Boyd v. Selma, 96 Ala. 144, 154, 11 South. 398, 16 L. R. A. 729; Cameron v. Burlington, 56 Iowa, 320, 9 N. W. 239; Baldwin v. Shine, 84 Ky. 502, 2 S. W. 164.

We are of opinion that there is error in so much of the judgment of the circuit court as relieves the executor from state and county taxation upon the New York personalty.

With respect to the stock in the National Exchange Bank of Lynchburg and in the Lynchburg Cotton Mill & Improvement Company, we concur with the circuit court, and its judgment is, with respect to those items, affirmed.

The exemption from taxation claimed by the executor upon the ground that the property sought to be taxed belongs to the Sweet Briar Institute, a charitable institution, is without merit. Until the estate is administered, it is assessed for taxation in the name of the executor. Until the estate was administered, and the legacy paid to the Sweet Briar Institute in due course of administration, it could not be known that it would receive anything under this bequest. McGregor's Ex'rs v. Vapel, 24 Iowa, 436. With respect to this contention we merely decide that appellee was not entitled to the exemption as of the 1st day of February, 1901. Beyond that we intend to express no opinion.

For these reasons, the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, and this court will enter such judgment as the circuit court should have rendered.

WILSON v. LANGHORNE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

CONTINGENT REMAINDER—DEED—INSOLVENCY—JUDGMENT—TRUSTS—LOAN BY TRUSTEE TO REMAINDERMAN—CHARGE ON ESTATE—STATUTES—COMMON LAW.

1. In the absence of an estoppel, the deed of a debtor, conveying all of his property, real and personal, to a trustee, for the benefit of creditors, does not, at common law, pass the debtor's interest in a contingent remainder.

2. Under Code 1887, § 2418, providing that any interest in or claim to real estate may be disposed of by deed or will, that any estate may be made to vest in futuro by deed in like manner as by will, and that any estate which would be good as an executory devise shall be good if created by deed, the deed of a debtor, conveying all of his property, real and personal, to a trustee, for the benefit of creditors, passes the debtor's interest in a contingent remainder.

3. Where a testator devised real estate to his daughter in trust, with remainder to her children surviving her, but did not authorize the trustee to make loans or advancements to the remaindermen, the fact that the trustee loaned money to a remainderman will not operate ex proprio vigore as a lien or charge on the interest of the remainderman in the estate.

4. Under Code 1887, § 3567, providing that every judgment for money rendered against any person shall be a lien on all the real estate of or to which such person is or becomes possessed at or after the date of the judgment, a judgment rendered against a debtor at a time when he was a contingent remainderman in certain real estate binds the interest of the remainderman in the estate when it thereafter vests by the happening of the contingency on which it depended.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Lynchburg.

Suit by H. S. Langhorne and others against William B. Wilson, Jr., and others. From the decree Wilson appeals, and the complainants file cross-error. Reversed on Wilson's appeal, and affirmed on cross-bill.

F. W. Whitaker and J. Singleton Diggs, for appellant. J. T. Coleman, Horsley & Blackford, Harrison & Long, John H. & L. D. Lewis, and Kirkpatrick & Howard, for appellees.

KEITH, P. H. S. Langhorne, George W. Langhorne, Jr., and Anna T. Curville presented their bill to the corporation court of the city of Lynchburg, in which they show that one Anderson H. Armistead devised to George W. Langhorne, Sr., as special trustee, certain real estate situated in the city of Lynchburg, and in the counties of Campbell and Appomattox, upon the following trusts:

"All the rents, profits and issues to be held by the said George W. Langhorne in special trust for the sole and separate use of my daughter, Nannie M. Langhorne, during her lifetime, and at her death the same shall be the property of her children surviving her or their descendants, if any have died before her leaving descendants, equally to be divided, the descendants of any such deceased child, however, to take only what the parent would if living; and in case my daughter shall survive all her children and their descendants then at her death I give the said property to my son J. A. Armistead for his life, and at his death to his children surviving him." Authority was given to the trustee, when Nannie M. Langhorne should so direct in writing, to sell all or any of the trust property on reasonable time and reinvest the proceeds in other property, "such other property to be held to the same use and purpose above set forth and no other."

It appears that Nannie M. Langhorne was twice married, that Anna T. Curville and A. A. Langhorne (who is named as a defendant) were the children of her first marriage, and H. S. Langhorne, George W. Langhorne, Jr., and Alice S. Langhorne were the children of her second marriage, George W. Langhorne, the trustee, being her second husband, and the brother of her first husband. George W.

Langhorne, the trustee, loaned to A. Armistead Langhorne a portion of the trust estate, as evidenced by bonds, the first of which bears date September 23, 1884, payable five years after date, with interest, for $500; the second dated May 15, 1889, payable five years after date, with interest, for $2,075; the third, dated July 15, 1891, payable three years after date, with interest, for $2,135; and a fourth, dated November 14, 1894, payable twelve months after date, with interest, for $150. These bonds are now in the possession of the trustee, and no part of them has been paid. Anna T. Curville is the surety in the bond dated May 15, 1889.

It further appears that on the 13th of June, 1892, A. A. Langhorne, together with one R. A. Dirom, then partners trading as A. A. Langhorne & Co., conveyed to certain creditors all of their social assets, and "also any and all other property of every description, to the said firm or either member thereof belonging."

Nannie M. Langhorne died in May, 1902. All necessary parties are made to the bill, which concludes with a prayer for the settlement of all proper accounts, and that the trust estate may be partitioned in kind, or by sale and division of the proceeds, among those entitled thereto, and that A. Armistead Langhorne may be charged with the bonds and interest due by him. William V. Wilson, Jr., trustee in the deed from Langhorne & Co., filed his answer at the October term, 1902, in which he insists that it was the intention of A. A. Langhorne to convey to him, for the benefit of his creditors, everything which he owned at the time the deed was executed. He therefore prays that the deed of assignment of June 13, 1892, "be decreed to be in full force and effect, and binding upon the interest of the said A. A. Langhorne in said estate, and that his said interest be subjected to the payment of the debts secured in said deed of assignment."

The controversy in this case arises over the disposition of the interest of A. A. Langhorne in the property bequeathed by A. H. Armistead to a trustee for Nannie M. Langhorne during her lifetime, and at her death to her children surviving her or their descendants. As it could not be known until her death which of her children would survive her, they took contingent remainders, which became vested, upon the death of Nannie M. Langhorne, in such of her children as were then living. Howbert v. Cauthorn, 100 Va. 649, 42 S. E. 683. Upon this point there is no dispute. A. A. Langhorne took a contingent interest by the will of his grandfather, which, upon the death of his mother, became a vested estate.

Upon the part of appellant it is contended that this interest is subject to the deed made by Langhorne & Co. in June, 1892, and which is filed as an exhibit with the bill. Upon the part of appellees it is claimed that the interest of A. A. Langhorne did not pass under the deed, first, because it does not appear from the language of the deed that it was the intention of the parties to convey this interest to the trustee; second, that a contingent interest cannot pass save by estoppel, and, as there was no clause of general warranty in the deed, no estoppel was created; and, third, that the money loaned by the trustee at various times to A. A. Langhorne constituted advancements out of the trust fund which constitute charges upon his interest, for which he must account before he, or those claiming under him, as purchasers or as judgment creditors, can participate in the fund.

The corporation court was of opinion, and so decreed, that the deed in question "does not embrace, and was not intended to embrace, carry, or in any way affect, A. A. Langhorne's contingent remainder in the property devised under the will of Anderson H. Armistead, deceased," but held that it was bound by the judgments obtained by certain of his creditors, and that what remained of his share should be paid in equal parts to George W. Langhorne, Jr., Anna T. Curville, Alice S. Langhorne, and G. H. Wilkins. From this decree W. V. Wilson, trustee in the deed of June 13, 1892, and Maria Dirom, one of the beneficiaries under said deed, obtained an appeal, and certain of the appellees assign as cross-error the provisions of the decree which direct payments to be made out of the trust fund to certain judgment creditors of A. A. Langhorne.

In construing the deed of June 13, 1892, it is well to bear in mind that it was made by a debtor in failing circumstances, for the benefit of all his creditors, and undertakes to place at their disposition all of the debtor's property. The declarations of trust in the deed are, first, to secure the payment of all rent due by the firm, all clerk hire unpaid, and the cost of recording and executing the trust; second, "to secure the payment pro rata of so many of the following creditors, which are believed to be all the creditors of the parties of the first part, as shall, within sixty days from the date of this deed, file with the trustee a written acceptance of their pro rata share hereunder in full of their claims against the said firm of A. A. Langhorne & Co." Then follows a long list of debts, ranging in amount from one of less than $5 to that secured to Mrs. Dirom of more than $1,000. The third class, under the deed, was to consist of those of his creditors who declined to accept the provisions of the deed, and give a full discharge of all their claims as the price of participating in the benefits of the deed, and "any other debts due by the said parties of the first part, or either of them," which by chance might have been omitted from the careful enumeration of debts given in the deed.

A requisite of a deed from a failing debtor which requires a release from his creditors is that it shall convey the whole of his property, and this deed should be construed in the light of that rule. Apart from this, however, the language of the deed is comprehensive in its terms. In the preceding part of the granting clause all the social assets had been conveyed, nothing of the slightest value seems to have been omitted, and then, doubtless having in view the intention to require their creditors to give a full acquittance of all their claims as the condition of sharing in the benefits of the assignment, the sentence under consideration was added—"also any and all other property of every description, to the said firm or either member thereof belonging." Language could not be more comprehensive, and it is a settled rule of construction, which does not need to be buttressed by authorities, that force and effect must be given, if possible, to every word in a written instrument.

In Mundy v. Vawter, 3 Grat. 518, similar language is construed, and it was held that, as between the parties, a conveyance of "all the estate, both real and personal, to which the grantor is entitled, in law or in equity, in possession, remainder, or reversion," is valid to pass the grantor's whole estate.

In Vanmeter v. Vanmeter, 3 Grat. 148, it was held that a conveyance of all of the lands of the grantor in the county of H. was sufficient.

In Carrington v. Goddin, 13 Grat. 609, both of these cases are cited with approval.

In Feckheimer v. Nat. Bank, 79 Va. 80, a conveyance by deed of all of grantor's "property, real and personal," was held to embrace shares of bank stock. See, also, Bullard v. Bank, 18 Wall. 589, 21 L. Ed. 923.

In Lewis's Adm'r v. Glenn, Trustee, 84 Va., at page 964, 6 S. E. 875, construing a trust deed to secure the payment of grantor's debts, the court said: "It is evident from the financially embarrassed condition of the company, and from the face of the deed itself, that its general and leading object in making the deed was to dedicate all of its assets and effects of every kind to the payment of its debts." Then follows an enumeration of the property conveyed, which concluded as follows: "But the omission of any property, money, or other thing from such schedule is not to prevent the same from being hereby granted or assigned;" and it was held that it manifested a clear intent of the grantor to convey all of its estate, rights, and credits of every kind, including its uncalled subscriptions, in trust for the payment of its debts. Such was unquestionably the company's intention in executing the deed. "The language employed in the deed is apt and sufficient to pass everything the company owned, and clearly embraced the uncalled and unpaid subscriptions in the hands of its stockholders"—citing Mundy v. Vawter, supra, and other cases.

The intention of the grantor must be gathered from the language he has seen fit to employ. If there be a doubt upon the construction of the deed, it is to be construed most strongly against the grantor—another rule of construction which is well established. Looking, therefore, to the language employed, in the light of the authorities cited, and we reach the conclusion that A. A. Langborne must be considered as having intended to convey all that the language which he employed was capable of passing to his grantee.

We are here called upon to consider, it may be well to observe, the effect of the language only as between the grantor and the grantee. Counsel for Mrs. Curville, it is true, endeavor to place her in the position of a purchaser for value and without notice; but the deed under which she claims bears date the 19th of January, 1903, while the bill in which she is named as a party plaintiff was filed some months before that date, and the answer of Wilson, trustee, which specifically states his claim, was filed at the October term, 1902.

At common law "a vested remainder lying in grant passes by deed without livery. But a contingent remainder is a mere right, and cannot be transferred before the contingency otherwise than by estoppel." Lomax's Dig. vol. 1, p. 602.

In Preston on Estates, at pages 75, 76, it is said: "A contingent interest does not give any certain nor any immediate right, or any estate, in the land. It gives a mere possibility—a possibility which is coupled with an interest when the person is fixed and ascertained; and such possibility, coupled with an interest, is devisable by will, may be released, may pass by the bargain and sale of commissioners of bankrupt, may be bound or extinguished by estoppel, but it cannot be granted or transferred by the ordinary rules of the common law, though it may be bound in equity by contract."

In Doe v. Oliver, 10 Barn. & Cress. 181, 21 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 50, testator devised lands to his wife for life, remainder to all the children of his brother that should be living at the time of his wife's decease. His brother left one daughter, who married, and afterwards, with her husband, during the life of the testator's widow, levied a fine come ceo of the lands, and declared the use to A. B. After the death of the widow, A. B. brought ejectment against the tenant in possession. Held, that it was maintainable; for that although the brother's daughter had only a contingent remainder during the life of the widow, and the fine could operate only by estoppel until the contingency happened, yet afterwards it operated on the estate.

It would seem from these authorities that at common law a contingent remainder, especially where the contingency depended upon uncertainty as to the person, passed only by estoppel, and here it is conceded there was no estoppel.

This brings us to the consideration of section 2418 of the Code of Virginia of 1887:

"Any interest in or claim to real estate may be disposed of by deed or will. Any estate may be made to commence in futuro, by deed, in like manner as by will; and any estate which would be good as an executory devise or bequest, shall be good if created by deed."

This section stands now as it appears in the Code of 1849, and treating of it in Carrington v. Goddin, supra, Judge Moncure, speaking for the court, says: "It is very clear that before the Code took effect a bargainee of a party not in possession, actual or constructive, at the time of the execution of the deed, could not maintain ejectment in his own name, at least against the party at that time in the adverse possession of the land. His disability to maintain the action proceeded, not from the act against conveying or taking pretended titles (1 Rev. Code, 375), but from the common law, whose maxim it was that nothing in action or entry could be granted over. A feoffment was void without livery of seisin, and without possession there could be no livery of seisin. 4 Kent, Com. 448; 2 Lom. Dig. 8, 9. The statute of uses (1 Rev. Code, p. 370, c. 99, § 29) did not remove the disability, because it only operated on a possession existing in the bargainor at the time of the execution of the deed, and transferred that possession to the use created or declared in favor of the bargainee. If no possession existed in the bargainor, of course none could be transferred to the bargainee. But the Code has changed the common-law rule by declaring that 'an interest in or claim to real estate may be disposed of by deed or will.' Code 1849, p. 500, c. 118, § 5. That such a change was contemplated by the revisors is manifest from their report, p. 602, § 5, and note. They recommended the adoption of a section similar to 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, § 6, in which 'a right of entry' is expressly named. Instead of adopting that section, which is complicated in its details, the Legislature enacted the provision before quoted. Their object was to use brief and plain terms, which would be at least as extensive in their meaning as the terms used in the statute of Victoria. They could not have used more comprehensive terms than they did. A right of entry is certainly 'an interest in or claim to real estate,' and may therefore 'be disposed of by deed or will.'"

The court in that case indulges in no refinement of construction. It is content to give to plain words their usual and everyday meaning, and the interpretation there placed upon the statute did away forever with the niceties by which the devolution of property had theretofore been embarrassed and hindered, and made capable of disposition by deed or will any interest in or claim to real estate.

Minor's Institutes (3d Ed.) vol. 2, p. 416, states the law as follows: "As to conveyances inter vivos, while vested remainders, lying in grant, as they do, pass by deed without livery, a contingent remainder is a mere right, and, except in equity, cannot at common law be transferred before the contingency, otherwise than by estoppel, as by matter of record or of deed indented. This matter, however, is assisted in Virginia by statute, which provides that any interest in or claim to real estate may be disposed of by deed or will."

Young v. Young, 89 Va. 675, 17 S. E. 470, 23 L. R. A. 642, is to the same effect. It was there held that a contingent remainder, being a mere possibility, was not the subject of attachment, but that, being an interest in or claim to real estate, may be conveyed under section 2418.

In Nutter v. Russell, 8 Metc. (Ky.) 163, dealing with the power of court to sell a contingent remainder, the following language is used: "In the case cited, of Jackson v. Waldron, 13 Wend. 178, a majority of the court decided that an interest, such as we have been considering, created by will, was a 'naked' possibility, as it is called, and not assignable or releasable.

"It is sufficient to say, in reply to the argument founded on this decision, that we are inclined to concur with the chancellor in the reasoning as well as in the conclusion announced in his dissenting opinion. But it is unnecessary to decide the point upon the general principles discussed by the court in the several opinions delivered in that case; for, according to our own statutes, 'any interest in, or claim to, real estate, may be disposed of by deed or will in writing. Any estate may be made to commence in futuro, by deed in like manner as by will, and any estate which would be good as an executory devise or bequest shall be good if created by deed.'"

It will be observed that the statute there construed is in substance identical with section 2418 of our Code.

It will be remembered that when the bill was filed in this case the life tenant was dead, and A. A. Langhorne, having survived her, had a vested estate. We are of opinion that it passed under the deed to Wilson, trustee in the deed of June 13, 1892. It may be well to remark that Howbert v. Cauthorn, supra, did not decide that a contingent remainder would not pass by deed or will, but that a court of chancery, in its discretion, would not sell so unsubstantial and shadowy an interest.

We come now to the last contention made by the appellees, which is that the money loaned by the trustee at various times to A. A. Langhorne constituted advancements out of the trust fund, which constitute charges upon his interest, for which he must account before he, or those claiming under him as purchasers or as judgment creditors, can participate in the fund.

The will which creates the fund in this case did not authorize the trustee to make loans or "advancements" to the remainder-men, and if the trustee saw fit to do so the mere lending of the money created no charge upon the fund. The trustee seems to have understood and acted upon this view in the first instance. He knew, of course, that if A. A. Langhorne died before his mother his interest perished, and, to guard against this contingency, policies of insurance were taken out upon the life of A. A. Langhorne; but these policies were permitted to lapse. Had advancements been authorized by the will, they must have been brought into hotchpot; or, if a lien had been taken to secure the loan, it would have brought the case within the influence of Grove v. Grove, 100 Va. 556, 42 S. E. 312, in which Judge Whittle delivered the opinion, holding that one tenant who discharges a lien on the common property, or pays more than his share of the purchase price, is entitled to ratable contribution from the cotenants. But it cannot be contended that a mere loan of money to A. A. Langhorne, where the trustee acted under a will which did not authorize him to make advancements, could operate ex proprio vigore as a lien or charge upon the particular interest.

The cross-error assigned by the appellees is, in view of the conclusion reached upon the other questions considered, of little moment. There was, however, in this respect, no error in the decree to the prejudice of appellees. Without determining whether or not a judgment binds a contingent remainder while the contingency continues, the judgment in this case became effective to bind the interest of A. A. Langhorne as soon as that interest vested; for section 3567 declares that "every judgment for money rendered in this state, heretofore or hereafter, against any person, shall be a lien on all the real estate of or to which such person is or becomes possessed or entitled, at or after the date of such judgment."

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that the debt secured by the deed from A. A. Langhorne to Wilson, trustee, constituted the first lien upon the interest of A. A. Langhorne, under the will of A. H. Armistead. The decree of the corporation court must therefore be reversed.

TAYLOR v. COMMONWEALTH et al.

NAVIGABLE WATERS—LAND BELOW LOW-WATER MARK—OWNERSHIP—RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN PROPRIETOR.

1. Code 1887, § 1338, declaring that all the beds of the bays, rivers, creeks, and shores of the sea not conveyed by special grant shall continue and remain the property of the commonwealth, and may be used as a common by all the people of the state for the purpose of fishing, fowling, and catching oysters, etc., is not an arbitrary assumption of title on the part of the state, but is declaratory of the common law.

2. The title to the bed of a navigable river between low-water mark and the line of navigability is not in the adjacent riparian proprietor, but in the state for the benefit of its citizens, and the riparian owner merely has certain rights beyond low-water mark, such as the right to build wharves, of access to the water, and the right of way over it.

3. Acts 1899-1900, p. 797, c. 757, leasing a tract of land lying under the waters of the York river below low-water mark, including an artesian well thereon, is not objectionable as interfering with any of the rights of the adjacent riparian proprietor.

4. Code 1887, § 2137, authorizing the assignment to riparian owners for their exclusive use of a tract of land fronting on the stream, not exceeding one-half acre, for use as oyster-planting ground, does not permit the right to receive such land to be exercised in a capricious and arbitrary manner so as to injure others, but requires the right to be exercised in the manner least injurious to others, if that can be accomplished without wrong to the riparian owner.

Appeal from Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by one Taylor against the commonwealth and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McGuire & Riely and Robert Stiles, for appellant. William A. Anderson, Atty. Gen., and Isaac Diggs, for appellees.

KEITH, P. Appellant filed her bill in the circuit court of the city of Richmond, in which she states that she is the owner in fee simple of a tract of land in Gloucester county known as "Rosewell," containing 250 acres, fronting on York river, being a portion of a tract which was the property of her father, now deceased, allotted to her by a decree of the circuit court of Gloucester county. That as riparian proprietor her rights in the soil under the waters of York river extend to the channel or navigable portion of the river; and that from the original grant from the English crown of this land, down to and including the lifetime of complainant's father, the proprietors of Rosewell had been in the habit of leasing the oyster lands upon their water front. That the last person who held such a lease from the proprietor of Rosewell, while still occupying the relation of tenant to complainant, accepted from the commonwealth a subsequent lease of the flats, or oyster-planting grounds, in front of Rosewell. That about the year 1892, while said lessee was occupying the Rosewell flats, under the circumstances above set out, an artesian well was sunk between low-water mark and the channel or navigable portion of York river, and on the land of which complainant claims she is the owner and riparian proprietor. That the water from this well has mineral properties of great value, and that the lessee and others united in the formation of a company for the purpose of selling the water, which company was granted a charter by the circuit court of the city of Richmond in March, 1893, under the style of the "Colonial Water Company," since which time it has sold great quantities of water without the consent of complainant. That the Colonial Water Company occupies and claims to hold the ground on which the well is located by virtue of the oyster lease above set forth, but that said lease conveys to the water company no title to the ground. The bill further shows that at the session of 1899-1900 the General Assembly passed "An act to lease for a term of years ten acres of land lying under the waters of York river, below low water mark, in the county of Gloucester, including an artesian well thereon, and to provide for a survey of same and for fixing the price to be paid therefor per annum; and to permit said company to erect buildings and make improvements thereon, and to provide for the determination of all proper questions which may arise between the parties to any suit brought under this act." Acts 1899-1900, p. 797, c. 757. That, acting under the provisions of this statute, the Colonial Water Company has caused a survey and plat to be made by the county surveyor of Gloucester county of 10 acres of the land of complainant, including the well—that is to say, the land of which complainant is the owner and riparian proprietor—and that the company has caused that survey and plat to be returned to the clerk's office of Gloucester county, and posted a notice at the front door of the courthouse on the 4th of May, 1900, to the effect that said survey and plat had been filed in compliance with the provisions of the act of Assembly aforesaid; but that in fact the survey, plat, and notice are erroneous, and do not comply with the requirements of said act. That complainant is advised that the act aforesaid authorizes the lease of 10 acres of land, including the artesian well, only on the condition that it shall be determined by the court that the commonwealth is the owner of the land, and that the private rights of no person shall be infringed upon. That it in plain terms declares it to be the purpose of the sovereign power of the state that the private rights of complainant shall not be interfered with or infringed upon, whether the commonwealth be or be not the owner of said land. That, even though the commonwealth be the owner, it by no means follows from the act that a lease may be made to the Colonial Water Company, because it is expressly provided by its terms: First, that no natural oyster-bed rock or shoal shall be included in said 10 acres of land; second, that the private rights of no person shall be infringed upon; and, third, that navigation in York river shall in no manner be obstructed or impeded. That it further declares that complainant's rights of every character, existing at the time of its passage, whether as owner of the land, riparian proprietor, or otherwise, shall be respected, and shall be paramount and superior to any rights which can by any possibility be acquired by the Colonial Water Company by virtue of said act. That the commonwealth is not the owner of the land in controversy, but that, on the contrary, complainant is its sole owner, including said artesian well; and, further, that, even though the commonwealth were such owner, the private rights of complainant would be grossly interfered with and infringed upon by any lease made under said act of March 5, 1900. That, without waiving any of her said rights, attention is called to the fact that at the time of the passage of the act of March 5, 1900, and for a long time previous thereto, complainant had, and still has, the statutory right to select any portion of the oyster-planting ground fronting on Rosewell, whether occupied by another person or not, and have same assigned to her exclusive use, provided only that said assignment does not exceed half an acre. See section 2187, Code 1887, as amended by Acts 1898-94, p. 842, c. 743. That complainant has never relinquished, and now claims, the right to have assigned to her, under said statute, one-half an acre of said ground, including the Colonial well; and further claims that the lease of 10 acres of land, as provided by the act of March 5, 1900, cannot be granted without infringing upon this and other rights of complainant, none of which she relinquishes, but all of which she claims and insists upon.

The prayer of the bill is that the well and the water therefrom be declared the property of complainant; that it be decreed that no lease can be made under the provisions of the act of March 5, 1900; that the lease under which the Colonial Water Company claims to hold said well conveys no title to it whatsoever; and that said company may be compelled to surrender the possession thereof to complainant; and for general relief.

To this bill the commonwealth of Virginia and the Colonial Water Company were made parties defendant, and filed their demurrer upon the following grounds:

First. The bill alleges that the plaintiff is the owner in fee simple of the soil of the bed of York river, between low-water mark and the channel or navigable part of said stream, while the "demurrants insist that the right of plaintiff extends only to low-water mark, and that she has no interest in the soil of the bed of said river, but that the soil of said bed is the property of the state of Virginia, so declared by statute, and the state, through the Legislature, has the authority to rent portions of the said bed to the demurrant or any one else."

Second. That, if plaintiff has any right whatever in the soil of said river between low-water mark and the channel or navigable portion of said river, it is only the right to pass over the surface of the water in boats, vessels, or river craft, or to erect wharves, piers, or bulkheads opposite her said land; provided the navigation be not obstructed, nor the private rights of any person be otherwise injured thereby; and that, should the plaintiff undertake to construct or build any such wharf, pier, or bulkhead from her shore to a point of navigability, she would be required to so construct them as not to interfere with the said well or the demurrant."

Third. That "the bill alleges that the plat, notice, and proceedings under the act of March 5, 1900, are erroneous, and do not comply with the requirements of the law; that these acts were performed by the county surveyor, and are presumed to be correct, and the bill should point out wherein that officer failed in the discharge of his duties.

Fourth. That "plaintiff claims one-half acre of land for oyster-planting purposes, but this right does not give her the ownership of the well, and she would be required to use said land for oyster purposes, so as not to interfere with the well, and she would not thereby acquire ownership or control of the well, nor the fee simple to the soil of the bed of the river."

The Colonial Water Company also filed a cross-bill, but it is not at present necessary to consider the questions which it presents.

When the case came on to be heard, the judge of the circuit court filed a learned and able opinion, and entered a decree sustaining the demurrer and dismissing complainant's bill, but reserving for further consideration questions between the Colonial Water Company and the commonwealth of Virginia arising upon the cross-bill. That decree is before us for review.

By section 1338 of the Code of 1887 it is declared that: "All the beds of the bays, rivers, creeks, and the shores of the sea within the jurisdiction of this commonwealth, and not conveyed by special grant or compact according to law, shall continue and remain the property of the commonwealth of Virginia, and may be used as a common by all the people of the state for the purpose of fishing and fowling, and of taking or catching oysters and other shell fish, subject to the provisions of chapters ninety-five, ninety-six and ninety-seven, and any future laws that may be passed by the General Assembly; and no grant shall hereafter be issued by the register of the land office to pass any estate or interest of the commonwealth in any natural oyster bed, rock, or shoal, whether the said bed, rock, or shoal shall ebb bare or not." And section 1339, subject to the provisions of the section just quoted, extends "the limits or bounds of the several tracts of land lying on the said bays, rivers, creeks, and shores, and the rights and privileges of the owners of such lands * * * to low water mark, but no farther."

Is section 1338 a mere self-servient declaration of title, an arbitrary assumption of right upon the part of the state, or is it in accordance with the law of the land as commonly received and understood? The discussion of the subject invited us to explore the past, and to investigate the power and authority, the interest and the title, of the English crown in the soil under the tidal waters of that realm; and to discriminate between the power of the crown before the adoption of the Magna Charta, and as limited by that instrument. The difficulty of the task, and the consciousness that at this day we could throw no light upon a subject which has been so often considered by the ablest jurists, dispose us to follow the example of Chief Justice Taney, who, in the case of Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. 407, 10 L. Ed. 997, wisely said: "We do not propose to meddle with the point as to the power of the King, since Magna Charta, to grant to a subject a portion of the soil covered by the navigable waters of the kingdom. * * * For when the Revolution took place the people of each state became themselves sovereign, and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters and the soils under them for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the general government. A grant made by their authority must therefore, manifestly, be tried and determined by different principles from those which apply to grants of the British crown, when the title is held by a single individual in trust for the whole nation."

In Smith v. Maryland, 18 How. 71, 15 L. Ed. 269, Justice Curtis, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Whatever soil below low-water mark is the subject of exclusive propriety and ownership belongs to the state on whose maritime border and within whose territory it lies, subject to any lawful grants of that soil by the state, or the sovereign power which governed its territory before the Declaration of Independence. But this soil is held by the state, not only subject to, but in some sense in trust for, the enjoyment of certain public rights."

The case of McCready v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 94 U. S. 891, 24 L. Ed. 248, and Id., 27 Gratt. 985, is one of peculiar interest in the consideration of this case. It originated in the county of Gloucester, in this state, and involved the constitutionality of an act of Assembly which forbade the planting of oysters in the waters of the state by any person not a resident of the state. The case came to this court, which held, Judge Anderson delivering the opinion, that the navigable waters and the soil under them within the territorial limits of the state are the property of the state, to be controlled by it within its discretion for the benefit of its people, the only limitation upon that power being that it could not interfere with the authority of the government of the United States in regulating commerce and navigation. Upon a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to the judgment of this court Justice Waite, after reviewing numerous cases upon the subject, declares that the principle has been long settled "that each state owns the beds of all the tide waters within its jurisdiction, unless they have been granted away. In like manner the states own the tide waters themselves, and the fish in them, so far as they are capable of ownership while running. For this purpose the state represents its people, and the ownership is that of the people in their united sovereignty. The title thus held is subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which, in respect to foreign and interstate commerce, has been granted to the United States. There has been, however, no such grant of power over the fisheries. These remain under the exclusive control of the state, which has consequently the right, in its discretion, to appropriate its tide waters, and their beds, to be used by its people as a common for taking and cultivating fish, so far as it may be done without obstructing navigation. Such an appropriation is, in effect, nothing more than a regulation of the use by the people of their common property. The right which the people of the state thus acquire comes not from their citizenship alone, but from their citizenship and property combined. It is, in fact, a property right, and not a mere privilege or immunity of citizenship."

Illinois Cent. Ry. Co. v. The People of the State of Illinois, 146 U. S. 387, 18 Sup. Ct. 110, 36 L. Ed. 1018, contains an interesting discussion of this whole subject. The opinion of the majority was delivered by Mr. Justice Field, and in it he states it to be "the settled law of this country that the ownership of and dominion and sovereignty over lands covered by tide waters, within the limits of the several states, belong to the respective states within which they are found, with the consequent right to use or dispose of any portion thereof when that can be done without substantial impairment of the interest of the public in the waters, and subject always to the paramount right of Congress to control their navigation so far as may be necessary for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the states. This doctrine has been often announced by this court, and is not questioned by counsel of any of the parties." He then shows that the same doctrine is held applicable to lands covered by fresh water in the Great Lakes, over which is conducted an extended commerce with different states and foreign nations, and which possess all the general characteristics of open seas, except with respect to the freshness of their waters and the absence of the ebb and flow of the tide. "In other respects they are inland seas, and there is no reason or principle for the assertion of dominion and sovereignty over and ownership by the state of lands covered by tide waters that is not equally applicable to its ownership of and dominion and sovereignty over lands covered by the fresh waters of these lakes." As to the character of the title held by the state, he concludes that it is different from that which states hold in lands intended for sale. "It is a title held in trust for the people of the state, that they may enjoy the navigation of the waters, carry on commerce over them, and have liberty of fishing therein, freed from the obstruction and interference of private parties. The interest of the people in the navigation of the waters and in commerce over them may be improved in many instances by the erection of wharves, docks, and piers therein, for which purpose the state may grant parcels of the submerged lands; and, so long as their disposition is made for such purposes, no valid objections can be made to the grants. It is grants of parcels of lands under navigable waters, that may afford foundations for wharves, piers, docks, and other structures in aid of commerce, and grants of parcels which, being occupied, do not substantially impair the public interest in the lands and water remaining, that are chiefly considered and sustained in the adjudged cases as a valid exercise of legislative power, consistently with the trust to the public upon which such lands are held by the state. But that is a very different doctrine from the one which would sanction the abdication of the general control of the state over lands under the navigable waters of an entire harbor or bay, or of a sea or lake. Such abdication is not consistent with the exercise of that trust which requires the government of the state to preserve such waters for the use of the public. The trust devolving upon the state for the benefit of the public, and which can only be discharged by the management and control of property in which the public has an interest, cannot be relinquished by a transfer of the property. The control of the state for the purposes of the trust can never be lost, except as to such parcels as are used in promoting the interests of the public therein, or can be disposed of without any substantial impairment of the public interest in the lands and waters remaining." He further declares in this opinion that the state can no more abdicate its trust over property in which the whole people are interested than it can abdicate its police powers in the administration of government and the preservation of the peace. "In the administration of government the use of such powers may for a limited period be delegated to a municipality or other body, but there always remains with the state the right to revoke those powers and exercise them in a more direct manner, and one more conformable to its wishes. So, with trusts connected with public property, or property of a special character, like lands under navigable waters, they cannot be placed entirely beyond the direction and control of the state."

This opinion was concurred in by three of the members of the court, while a dissenting opinion was delivered by Justice Shiras, concurred in by two of the Justices, and the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Blatchford did not sit.

The dissenting opinion maintains to the fullest extent the right of the state over the soil under tide waters within its limits, with the consequent right to dispose of the title to any part of the soil in such manner as it may deem proper, subject only to the paramount right of navigation.

The position of the majority of the court is fairly summed up in the first syllabus of the report: "The ownership of and dominion and sovereignty over lands covered by tide waters, and the fresh waters of the Great Lakes, within the limits of the several states, belong to the respective states within which they are found, with the consequent right to use or dispose of any portion thereof, when that can be done without impairment of the interest of the public in the waters, subject to the right of Congress to control their navigation for the regulation of commerce;" while, in the view of the minority, the right of a state is absolute and its control without limit.

In Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1, 14 Sup. Ct. 548, 38 L. Ed. 331, this subject was further discussed by Mr. Justice Gray, who delivered the opinion, in which many authorities are considered, and the conclusion reached that the lands under tide waters are vested in the states for the benefit of the whole people, within their respective borders, subject to the rights surrendered by the Constitution to the United States. See, also, Commonwealth v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53; Florida v. Black River Phosphate Co., 32 Fla. 82, 13 South. 640, 21 L. R. A. 189; Gough v. Bell, 21 N. J. Law, 156; Langdon v. New York, 93 N. Y. 129; Pollard v. Hagan, 8 How. 212, 11 L. Ed. 565.

The authorities which we have cited abundantly establish the proposition asserted by the court in McCready v. Commonwealth, supra, that the navigable waters and the soil under them, within the territorial limits of a state, are the property of the state, to be controlled by the state, in its own discretion, for the benefit of the people of the state, and demonstrate that section 1388 of the Code is a declaration of right in the state, sanctioned and supported by the common law. See, also, French v. Bankhead, 11 Gratt. 186.

Let us look at the case from another point of view. The claim of appellant rests upon her right as riparian owner, by virtue of which she asserts title to the bed of the river between low-water mark and the line of navigability, and to its exclusive use and enjoyment, subject only to the paramount right of the United States and the right of fishery, which she concedes to the commonwealth as trustee for its citizens. It is for the plaintiff to maintain her right. The possession of the defendant is sufficient, except as against the claim of one having a better right to the possession.

At common law the title of the owner of land bounded by a tidal stream extended to high-water mark and no farther. By an act of the Legislative Assembly of Virginia, passed in 1679 (2 Hen. St. p. 456), it was declared that "every man's right by virtue of his patent extends into the rivers or creeks so far as low-water mark," and our present statute upon the subject is found in section 1339, of the Code of 1887, which is set out in the beginning of this opinion. See Garrison v. Hall, 75 Va. 159; 1 Lomax's Dig. 661; 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 341, c. 87. The effect of this legislation is to extend the limits or boundaries of land "by operation of law down to ordinary low-water mark, and the right to the soil between ordinary high and low water mark annexed as incident or appurtenant to the adjacent land." French v. Bankhead, supra; Groner v. Foster, 24 Va. 650, 27 S. El. 493.

The fee-simple title, therefore, of a riparian owner ends with low-water mark. Between that point and the line of navigability the riparian owner has a qualified right, of which Justice Miller, in Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. Ed. 984, speaks as follows: "But whether the title of the owner of such a lot extends beyond the dry land or not, he is certainly entitled to the rights of a riparian proprietor whose land is bounded by a navigable stream; and among those rights are access to the navigable part of the river from the front of his lot, the right to make a landing, wharf or pier, for his own use or for the use of the public, subject to such general rules and regulations as the Legislature may see proper to impose for the protection of the rights of the public, whatever those may be. This riparian right is property, and is valuable, and, though it must be enjoyed in due subjection to the rights of the public, it cannot be arbitrarily or capriciously destroyed or impaired. It is a right of which, when once vested, the owner can only be deprived in accordance with established law, and, if necessary, that it be taken for the public good upon due compensation."

This court said, with respect to this subject, in Norfolk City v. Cooke, 27 Grat., at page 435: "This right of the riparian owner is not a mere license or privilege, but is property, property in the soil, up to the line of navigability, though covered by water; for the wharf, pier, or bulkhead can only be built on the soil. It is not a mere easement to pass over the water, or a privilege to use the surface, but property in the soil under the water, on which to fasten and build such structures; and for this purpose, and subject to the restriction that navigation shall not be obstructed, is as much property as the land above the margin of a navigable stream." This is a broad statement of the law, which we are not called upon in this case either to criticise or approve, further than to remark that we think it well established that the right to build wharves is one which is subject to state regulation, and, while it involves a certain use of the soil under the water for the specific purposes designated, is not exclusive ownership.

Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 78, after stating the opinion of those writers and judges who maintain that the riparian owner has no private rights which are appurtenant to his land other than those of any other member of the public, and that the only difference is that he is more conveniently situated to enjoy the privileges which all the public have in common, and that he has access to the waters over his own land which the public has not, says: "There are cases which hold that the riparian owners, upon waters the bed of which belongs to the public, have valuable rights appurtenant to their estates, of which they cannot be deprived without compensation. This seems to us the better and sounder rule. The opposite conclusion has been reached by a narrow and technical course of reasoning, based upon the fact that the title to the soil is in the state or the public. It is assumed that this title gives the state the same absolute and exclusive control of the waters and their bed as an individual possesses over his private property. But there is really no analogy between the relations of a riparian owner to the waters upon which he abuts and the relations between the proprietors of adjoining lands. The state holds the title to public waters as a trustee merely, for the use of all the public in common. The very object in declaring the title in the public is the better to secure this common use and benefit. * * * It is more reasonable, more logical, and more just to say that these privileges are in fact rights, as inviolable as the soil itself. The public loses nothing, for it is conceded that all these rights are subject to the paramount right of the state to use and improve the waters as shall best subserve the common rights of all."

We have reached the conclusion that the title to the bed of the river in question is held by the commonwealth for the benefit of all of its citizens, and that the riparian owner has certain rights with respect to it. These rights are enumerated in section 83 of the second Edition of Lewis on Eminent Domain, as follows:

"First. The right to be and remain a riparian proprietor and to enjoy the natural advantages thereby conferred upon the land by its adjacency to the water.

"Second. The right of access to the water, including a right of way to and from the navigable part.

"Third. The right to build a pier or wharf out to navigable water, subject to any regulations of the state.

"Fourth. The right to accretions or alluvium.

"Fifth. The right to make a reasonable use of the water as it flows past or laves the land."

These rights of the riparian owner and the commonwealth must be exercised, if possible, so that the one shall not unnecessarily disturb or impair the enjoyment of the other. Appellant has built no wharf or pier, nor any like structure, upon her premises, nor does it appear that she contemplates doing so. When she does exercise that right, it must be in accordance with such rules and regulations as the commonwealth imposes for the protection of the rights of the public. Nor does it appear that the right in the plaintiff of access to the water from her land, or of a right of way to and from her shore to the navigable part of the stream, has been interrupted or threatened, and the other enumerated rights are not called in question in this record.

When the riparian owner complains of an injury done to him in respect to these rights, the question to be considered is, does he present a case in which there has been any substantial interruption or impairment of his rights? Were he the owner in fee simple of the soil, any entry upon it without his consent would constitute a trespass; but, having mere easements in the river, the riparian owner has no cause of complaint so long as he is permitted the full and undiminished enjoyment of those rights.

Two cases in the House of Lords illustrate this position. The Duke of Buccleuch was the occupier, under a lease from the crown, of a house, the garden of which ran down to the Thames, where a wall protected it from the river, which flowed up to it at high water. There was a door in this wall, which was locked or opened at the pleasure of the plaintiff, and afforded him the means, at high water, of landing persons and goods, while at low water he was afforded the same privilege by a paved causeway, which ran from the door to the river. The river was embanked under authority of an act of Parliament, and a large strip of dry land was formed where the river had formerly flowed up to the garden, and a public road was made between this strip of land and the river, and the plaintiff claimed compensation under the act. It was held that the loss of the use of the river frontage, and the consequent loss of privacy, and the increase of dust and noise by the creation of the embankment and road, were subjects to be considered as occasioning deterioration in the value of the property. Duke of Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Bd. of Wks., 5 Eng. & Irish App. 418.

In North Shore Ry. Co. v. Plon, 14 App. Cas. 612, an appeal from the Supreme Court of Canada, it appears that Plon had a large manufacturing establishment upon the foreshore of the river St. Charles, a navigable stream, and upon which appellants constructed an embankment, whereby access to the river was cut off. The embankment extended along the whole length of respondent's river front, and cut off access to the river except at two openings one in front of and the other adjoining respondent's premises, through which the river was accessible at certain high tides.

In both these cases damages were awarded, it appearing that the right of access was in one case destroyed, and in the other case so far interrupted as to be rendered of little value.

In the case before us the property of the plaintiff is used merely for farming purposes. There has not been erected, and as far as the record discloses there is no purpose to erect, any pier or wharf. She is engaged in no business requiring such access to the channel of the stream as cannot be fully enjoyed consistently with every right which the state has exercised, or which it has delegated to others. The commonwealth holds as trustee a vast body of land covered by the flow of the tide, precisely as in the case before us, for the benefit of her citizens. It is not only her right, but her duty, as such trustee, to render this property productive. Is it reasonable that the commonwealth, holding title to the soil, is to be wholly subordinated in the use of it to the use with which another is clothed merely by virtue of being an owner of the adjoining shore, when the rights of each and all can be fully protected without diminution and without hindrance. If the time should come when the river front of the plaintiff shall be divided into lots whose owners find it necessary to their profitable enjoyment to erect piers and wharves upon them, if they engage in business which shall require exclusive access to the channel of the stream, it may be that a case could then be presented more meritorious than that which we have under consideration, and in the light of changed conditions the court may be again called upon to consider the respective rights of the riparian owner and those remaining in the commonwealth, or which have been granted by her to others. The property in dispute was originally leased by the state as an oyster planting ground. By chance, in the prosecution of that industry, mineral water was discovered far beneath the soil, which has proved of great value. There may be other and more valuable substances hidden in the soil; as to that, conjecture would be idle. But whatever that soil contains belongs to the state, and the state, and it alone, has the right to develop those hidden sources of wealth, if such there be, for the common benefit of all of its citizens.

With respect to plaintiff's claim to have the half acre of land assigned to her under the statute, as an oyster planting ground, it may be observed, first, that this is no part of her common-law right, but is the creature of statute, of which she has not availed herself, and as to which she has no cause of action, if before availing herself of the right a subsequent statute defeats it. But, if this be not so, she ought not to be permitted, capriciously and arbitrarily, to exercise that right, and to locate the half acre in a manner most injurious to others and not more beneficial to herself, so far as the facts in this case disclose. She should be required to exercise that right in the manner least injurious to others, if that end can be accomplished without a wrong to her.

The views which we have expressed are not in conflict with any case heretofore decided by this court. Where the nature of the title of the commonwealth has been considered, it has generally been in cases which involved the power of the state over the waters within it, with respect to the right of fishery, and language is used which implies absolute ownership and dominion. Of this class of cases McCready v. Commonwealth, supra, is a fitting illustration. We shall not prolong this opinion by discussing each case in detail, but content ourselves with observing that the opinions are to be read and interpreted in the light of the facts under consideration. Groner v. Foster, supra, and Waverly, etc., Co. v. White, 97 Va. 176, 33 S. E. 534, 45 L. R. A. 227, did not require a decision as to the nature of the commonwealth's title. She was no party to those suits, which involved the rights of riparian owners inter se, and the manner in which those rights should be apportioned, and the boundary lines between coterminous owners determined and established. In this case, for the first time, this court has been called upon to deal with the conflicting rights of the riparian proprietor and the commonwealth, and we have endeavored in the solution of the questions presented to apply that beneficent maxim of the civil law, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas," believing that, exercised in obedience to that benignant principle, every right of the parties to this controversy may be preserved and enjoyed.

In conclusion we are of opinion that the plaintiff has no title as riparian owner to the water between low-water mark and the channel of the river, nor to the soil beneath it; that as riparian proprietor she has certain rights beyond low-water mark, as the right to build wharves and of access to the water, and a right of way over it to the channel, and others perhaps which need not now be considered, including a right to locate a half acre of land as an oyster planting ground; but that all these rights may be enjoyed by her to their fullest extent without let or hindrance, diminution or impairment, by reason of any right or privilege granted to and exercised by the Colonial Water Company, under the facts as disclosed in the record. We are therefore of opinion that there was no error in dismissing the plaintiff's bill, and the decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

April 22, 1904.)

TRUST DEED—CONSTRUCTION—REVOCATION.

I. B., the owner of a life estate in six farms in Maryland, and one farm in Berkeley county, W. Va., containing 191 acres, by reason of physical disability (more particularly the loss of speech, brought on by paralysis) having become incapacitated for managing his said farms, both in the interest of himself, as life tenant, and of his children, as remaindermen, conveyed his said life estate to A., as trustee, with full power and authority to manage and control the same as landlord to the same extent as B. could do if acting in person, but such management was to be under the advice of B.; the conveyance making no disposition of any of the property of said B. in the present or future to any third party; no provision for the accumulation of any fund in the hands of the trustee; and provided for the expenditure of all necessary sums from the moneys collected by the trustee for the benefit of B., which expenditures were only limited by the necessities of said B., for his comfort and maintenance, "without stint." The remaindermen afterwards, for valuable consideration, conveyed their interests in said 191 acres (the Berkeley county farm) to L., and L. conveyed the same to M. B. then conveyed for $1,700, cash consideration, his life estate in the last-named farm to L., and L., for a like consideration, conveyed the same to M. Held, that the conveyance of the life estate by B. revoked the powers and authority of A., and terminated the trust as to the farm so conveyed; and, further, held that, although the instrument made and executed by B. to A. was in form a trust deed, it could only operate as to said Berkeley farm as a power of attorney to manage and control the farm in the interest of B., and incidentally in the interest of the remaindermen, and, not being coupled with an interest, was revocable, notwithstanding it contained a provision of irrevocability.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Berkeley County; E. Boyd Faulkner, Judge.

Action by Samuel P. Angle against Mary L. Marshall and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Flick, Westenhaver & Noll, for appellant. Faulkner, Walker & Woods, for appellees.

McWHORTER, J. J. W. Brillhart had a life estate or was tenant by the curtesy in six farms in Washington county, Md., and one farm in Berkeley county, W. Va., of which his wife had died seised in fee. On the 18th day of November, 1899, said Brillhart executed to Samuel P. Angle, of Washington county, Md., a deed of trust conveying to him the life estate in said farms, together with all crops then growing, garnered, or in process of being garnered, together with all choses in action, all cash in bank, and all moneys owing to him from any source whatever, as well as every nature and description of estate, asset, chattel, or any other kind of property or interest whatever belonging to said Brillhart; assigning in said deed that "by reason of bodily infirmities, in particular the loss of speech brought on by paralysis, and by reason of other bodily infirmities has become incapable of managing his large financial interests as they should be managed both in the interest of himself as life tenant and of his children as remaindermen," and reposing great confidence in Samuel P. Angle, as a man of integrity, and knowledge of the management of farms and business affairs in general, and that they might be more properly managed under the direction and supervision of the court of chancery of Washington county, in Maryland. Said conveyance was in trust and confidence, authorizing the trustee to manage his farms, to make leases, collect rents, and do all things as fully as the said Brillhart could do, acting for himself; requiring him to settle his accounts on the 1st day of January in each year, or at least within 15 days thereafter, in the circuit court of Washington county; such settlement to be under oath, and subject to exceptions as other accounts formally stated by the auditor of the said court in chancery cases; provided that the trustee should pay to Brillhart such sums during the year as might be necessary for his own comfortable maintenance, and expend for the personal benefit and comfort of said Brillhart such other sums for medicine, medical advice, clothing, traveling expenses, etc., as Brillhart might require, said expenditure not to exceed, on the average, $30 per month; but, if a greater sum should be needed for the purposes stated, the trustee should allow it, but should not be called upon to pay the same until the end of the year, and until he had made his annual settlement, "it being the intent of this paragraph that all expenditures necessary for the comfortable maintenance and health of the said John W. Brillhart shall be made in reason and without stint"; providing that the trustee give bond, and fixing his compensation at 5 per cent. upon his receipts and 5 per cent. upon his expenditures; and providing also that the deed of trust should be irrevocable, and that it should supersede all powers of attorney theretofore executed by him; and revoked all such powers of attorney; and requiring all attorneys in fact under such authority so revoked to settle with the trustee. The said trustee to give the affairs of said Brillhart his personal attention; to look after his comfort and well-being; to consult with the said Brillhart and receive his advice about the management of the farms, and endeavor to the fullest extent possible to adopt the views of the said Brillhart, and have him co-operate with the said trustee; but that the judgment of the said Samuel P. Angle should always be paramount.

At the August rules, 1902, Samuel P. Angle, trustee, filed his bill in equity in the clerk's office of the circuit court of Berkeley county against Mary L. Marshall, P. R. Hoffman, and John W. Brillhart, defendant, exhibiting the deed of trust hereinbefore described; alleging that at the time of making of said deed of trust said Brillhart was, and had been continuously since that time, by reason of bodily infirmities (more particularly, loss of speech brought on by paralysis), incapable of managing his financial interests, both in the interests of himself, as life tenant, and his children, as remaindermen, and which condition, instead of improving, had grown very much worse; that the deed was recorded in the proper office in Washington county, Md., on the 24th of November, 1899, and afterwards, on the — day of February, 1901, in the clerk's office of the county court of Berkeley county; that said Brillhart filed his petition in the circuit court of Washington county, Md., praying the court to assume jurisdiction according to the terms of the deed of trust, and supervise the actions of Angle, the trustee, according to the interests and meaning of said deed, and according to the law and practice applicable in such cases. A suit in equity in the matter of the trust estate of John W. Brillhart was docketed in the said court, and was known as No. 5,616, in equity. That said court made an order assuming jurisdiction of the said trust. Copies of said trust deed and order were filed as exhibits with the bill. That plaintiff executed bond as required by the trust, and assumed charge of the property conveyed to him, and had continued from that time forward until the present to discharge his duty as such trustee. That he had not been discharged or removed by any order of the court, or in any other manner, as trustee, and that said suit was still pending. That said trust estate had been administered by the court of equity from that time forward until the present. That plaintiff had stated and settled his accounts annually, and had received and acted from time to time on the directions and orders made by the said court in said cause. That the farm referred to in the deed of trust, situated in Falling Waters district, Berkeley county, contained 191 acres. That during the year 1901 the same was occupied by the defendant P. R. Hoffman under a lease made and entered into between him and the trustee. That when the lease expired, on the 1st of April, 1902, the lessee held over, by consent and acquiescence of plaintiff, on the same terms. That plaintiff had recently learned that Hoffman had been interfered with in his farming operations and in his occupancy by the defendant Mary L. Marshall. That she had represented to Hoffman that she was the sole owner of the farm, and plaintiff had nothing further to do with the farm; had no right to the control and management thereof. That she had directed and required said tenant to change and alter the condition of said farm, by making lanes through the same from places different from where the same formerly had been, and at places not desired by plaintiff; had required tenant to put up new fences and to make other repairs to the farm, and by these means had prevailed on the tenant recently to take a lease from her, and to recognize her as the landlord, and rendered him unwilling to comply with the directions of plaintiff. That said Marshall bases her right to the ownership and control of said farm upon the following facts: That on the 29th of March, 1901, George William Brillhart, one of the two remaindermen in said tract of 191 acres, executed a deed conveying all his right, title, and interest therein to Samuel A. La Fevre, and that on the 23d day of March, 1901, Mary C. Resh and Franklin D. Resh, her husband, the other of said remaindermen, conveyed all their right, title, and interest in said land to said La Fevre, and that afterwards, on the 23d day of April, 1901, La Fevre conveyed all his right, title, and interest which he had acquired by virtue of said two deeds in said tract of land to the defendant Mary L. Marshall; exhibiting a copy of each of said deeds. That, in addition to the deed of trust made by said Brillhart to plaintiff, the order of the circuit court of Washington county, sitting as a court of equity, assuming jurisdiction of the said trust estate, said La Fevre prevailed upon the said Brillhart to execute a paper writing bearing date the 17th day of July, 1901, whereby he attempted to convey to the said La Fevre all his right, title, and interest at law and in equity in and to the said 191 acres of land, and that afterwards, on the 18th day of December, 1901, the said La Fevre made a deed purporting to convey all his right, title, and interest thus acquired from said John W. Brillhart in said land to the said Mary L. Marshall; exhibiting a copy of said deed with his bill.

Plaintiff alleged that the deed of trust made by Brillhart to plaintiff was irrevocable; that, after making the same, and especially after the order of the circuit court of Washington county assuming jurisdiction of said property as a tract, to be managed by it, the said John W. Brillhart had no power or authority to execute the paper writing aforesaid, or in any manner to transfer the title to, or the control and management of, the life estate to said Marshall, and the act of said Brillhart, even if made voluntarily and without any undue influence, and had been the act of a person capable of managing his financial affairs, would confer no power upon the grantees, nor any right upon it to the ownership and control of the said estate; that the conveyance from Brillhart to La Fevre was made without any order of the court authorizing or permitting the same to be made; that it was made without the consent or authority of plaintiff, and was accepted by the said La Fevre and Marshall with full knowledge of the deed of trust to the plaintiff; that the trust vested in him, and of which the court had assumed jurisdiction, was of such a nature that the plaintiff, as trustee, under his obligation, was required to continue in the actual management and control of the life estate of Brillhart in said real estate, and that he was not authorized or permitted, under the law, to allow the said Brillhart, or any grantee of his, to assume any control over said estate, or to receive the rents and profits therefrom, but that the plaintiff himself continue in the actual and exclusive control of the same so long as said Brillhart should continue to live, or until he should be discharged by order of the court, or the said deed of trust appointing the plaintiff should have been canceled in some suit instituted for that purpose, and that he may ask for advice and direction from the court; and praying that an injunction be awarded, enjoining and restraining the said Hoffman from attorning to the said Marshall as the owner of the life estate of Brillhart in said 191 acres of land, and from delivering to her the landlord's share of wheat, hay, and corn, or other crops grown thereon, or from paying to her the proceeds in such crops, and that the said Marshall be enjoined from interfering in any manner with plaintiff's control and management of said farm, and with the tenant in possession thereof, and that he be advised and directed as to his duties in the premises and in the performance and execution of the trust; and for general relief.

The bill was presented to Hon. R. W. Dailley, Jr., judge of the Twelfth Judicial Circuit, who granted an injunction as prayed for in the bill, enjoining the defendant P. R. Hoffman from attorning to the defendant Mary L. Marshall as the owner of the life estate of John W. Brillhart in the 191 acres of land, and from delivering to her the landlord's share of wheat, hay, corn, and other crops grown on said tract, and from paying to her the proceeds of such crops, and the defendant Marshall from interfering in any manner with plaintiff's control and management of said farm, and with the tenant in possession. On the 1st day of August, 1902, the defendant Marshall, by her counsel, moved the court to dissolve the injunction, to which motion plaintiff appeared; and, after same was argued, the court took time to consider thereof, and on the 23d of September, 1902, the cause was heard by the court upon the demurrer filed by defendant Marshall to plaintiff's bill, and upon her motion to dissolve the injunction, upon which hearing the court dissolved the injunction and sustained the demurrer to the bill. At the November rules, 1902, the plaintiff filed his amended bill, making Samuel A. La Fevre a party thereto; and otherwise it is substantially the same as the original bill, but alleges that the deeds from Brillhart to La Fevre and from La Fevre to Marshall, conveying the life estate of Brillhart, are invalid, and alleging that it has the effect of creating a cloud on plaintiff's title, disturbing his possession and estate, and should be removed; and, in addition to the prayer in the original bill, prays that a receiver for said tract of land be appointed, if necessary, to preserve the same, and the rents and profits therefrom, pending this litigation, and that the cloud on plaintiff's title to said land created by the deed from John W. Brillhart to La Fevre and from La Fevre to Marshall be canceled and removed by the court, and that plaintiff be advised and directed as to his duties in the premises, and in the performance and execution of the trust set forth in the bill.

It does not appear from the record that any further injunction was granted upon the amended bill, but on the 5th day of May, 1903, the cause came on to be heard upon plaintiff's amended bill and exhibits, process duly served upon all the defendants, rules duly taken, and cause set for hearing, and the demurrer to said amended bill of Mary L. Marshall, and the plaintiff's joinder therein, "and, the court being of opinion that the demurrer filed by the defendant to the amended bill of complaint in this cause shows that the defendant is not entitled to relief prayed for in his bill, it is therefore considered by the court that the said demurrer be, and the same is, sustained, and the plaintiff's bill is dismissed at his costs." From which decree, plaintiff appealed.

The question is, what estate was vested in the trustee, if any, and the extent of his powers under the deed of trust? The deed is in the form of a conveyance in trust to the said Angle by which the equitable estate of the said Brillhart in the farm is conveyed to the trustee, not coupled with any interest, but solely for the purpose of managing the farm and transacting the business of the said Brillhart in the same manner as the said Brillhart might do if acting for himself; and the instrument confers no greater rights or powers upon the said Angle than could have been conferred by the ordinary power of attorney. It makes no disposition of the grantor's property in the present or future to any third party. It provides no accumulation of any fund in the hands of the trustee. It simply authorizes the trustee to manage the property and affairs of the said Brillhart. By its terms, the partial disbursement, and, it may be, the entire disbursement, of the fund is provided for. Under the fifth clause of the deed, provision is made for the expenditure of the fund by the payment to the grantor of such sums as may be necessary for his own comfortable maintenance, and shall expend for the personal benefit and comfort of the grantor such other sums for medicine, medical advice, clothing, traveling expenses, etc., as the said grantor may require. The expenditure for the last-mentioned purpose being limited, however, to $30 per month, but, if more than that should be needed, the trustee was required to allow it, but should not be called upon to pay such excess until the end of the year, and until he had made his annual settlement, "it being the intent of this paragraph that all expenditures necessary for the comfortable maintenance and health of the said John W. Brillhart shall be made in reason and without stint." Thus opening the door for the expenditure of an indefinite portion or all of the funds that might come into the hands of the trustee. The trustee had no power over the property, except to manage it. He had no discretion as to the specific expenditures provided for, and under none of its provisions does it contemplate the accumulation of income from the properties in the hands of the trustee, or prohibit the use of any part of the property; and there is nothing contained in the trust deed to show any intention of the grantor that he had at the time of its execution in contemplation of the interest of any person other than himself, except that, in the preamble expressing his reason for making the deed, he says, by reason of bodily infirmities (more particularly, the loss of speech, brought on by paralysis, and other bodily infirmities), he had become incapable of managing his large financial interests as they should be managed, "both in the interest of himself, as life tenant, and of his children, as remaindermen." In this he clearly had reference to the management of the farms, and the condition in which they should be kept and left for the benefit of the remaindermen. He makes no reference to his heirs, or as to anything that should be vested in him, and go to his children at the time of his death. He refers to them simply as remaindermen taking from their mother at the termination of his life estate therein.

It is insisted by counsel for appellant that the deed is irrevocable; that Brillhart had no right or power to revoke it. It is true, the deed, upon its face, says that it is irrevocable. In 1 A. & E. E. L. (2d Ed.) 1217: "The power of revocation exists, even though it be expressly stipulated that the agency is irrevocable or exclusive." Citing Blackstone v. Buttermore, 53 Pa. 266, where it is held: "(1) It is only when a power of attorney constituting a mere agency is coupled with an interest in the thing itself, or the estate which is its subject, that it is irrevocable. (2) A mere power is in its nature revocable, when it concerns the interest of the principal alone, even if there be an express declaration of irrevocability. (3) An interest in the proceeds to arise as compensation for executing the power will not make it irrevocable. (4) To make an agreement for irrevocability in a power to transact business binding, there must be a consideration independent of the compensation to be rendered for the services to be performed." Also Renan v. Hull (W. Va.) 47 S. E. 92, decided at this term. And in MacGregor v. Gardner, 14 Iowa, 826, it is held: "A power of attorney may be revoked by the principal, notwithstanding it is in terms irrevocable, unless it is coupled with an interest in the agent, or is supported by a consideration; and the use of the word 'irrevocable' in a power, when not thus coupled or supported, confers no greater authority upon the agent than an ordinary power of attorney." And in Walker v. Denison, 86 Ill. 142; "The principal may revoke the authority of his agent at his mere pleasure, although, in its terms, the authority may be expressly declared to be irrevocable. There are exceptions to the rule when the authority or power is coupled with an interest, or where it is given for a valuable consideration, or where it is part of a security. In these cases it is irrevocable, whether so expressed or not. A power coupled with an interest is when the power or authority is coupled with an interest in the thing itself actually vested in the agent. It must not be merely an interest in that which is produced by the exercise of the power. The former is irrevocable, while the latter is revocable, though expressed to be irrevocable." It is there further held: "When the principal, who has given a power of attorney to sell, himself sells and disposes of the thing before a sale by the agent, this will be a revocation of the power by operation of law." In 27 A. & E. L. 113, it is said: "It matters little what form of words has been employed to create the trust, particularly in instruments of a testamentary character, the doctrine just stated being universal; that is to say, that, despite the language of the instrument, whatever estate is necessary for the full execution of the trust vests in the trustee, and no more. 'The court is always reluctant,' says a standard author, 'to enlarge an estate in trustees beyond the terms of the gift, and it will not be done unless it is necessary for the execution of the trust.' * * * In point of duration, likewise, the trustee's estate is measured by the terms of the trust. It will stand so long as any legitimate purpose contemplated by the settlor remains unfulfilled. But so soon as the objects for which the trust was created shall have been accomplished, or the need for their attainment shall have failed, the trust estate ceases, and the estate vests in the beneficiary, without the formality of a conveyance; the statute of uses conveying the title by an arbitrary presumption of a conveyance, or by a deed formally executed." And in Bryan v. Weems, 29 Ala. 423, 65 Am. Dec. 407, it is held: "The estate of the trustee will not be enlarged beyond the actual demands of the trust, even though the language employed might justify it. The purpose is to give no greater powers than it was the evident intent of the settlor to create." See, also, Greenwood v. Coleman, 34 Ala. 150; West v. Fitz, 109 Ill. 425; McElroy v. McElroy, 113 Mass. 509; Ware v. Richardson, 3 Md. 505, 56 Am. Dec. 762; Coulter v. Robertson, 24 Miss. 273, 57 Am. Dec. 168. In Doe, Lessee of Poor, v. Condsline, 6 Wall. 453, 18 L. Ed. 869, Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion of the court, at page 471, 6 Wall., and page 873, 18 L. Ed., says it is "well settled that, where no intention to the contrary appears, the language used in creating the estate will be limited and restrained to the purposes of its creation. And when they are satisfied, the estate of the trustee ceases to exist, and his title becomes extinct. The extent and duration of the estate are measured by the objects of its creation." This is quoted with approval in Young v. Bradley, 101 U. S. 782, 25 L. Ed. 1044. It clearly appears from the deed itself, in case at bar, that the sole object of Brillhart was to confer upon Angle authority to manage and direct his business, and especially to control and manage the farms, and to collect and pay the rents to Brillhart, because of his physical inability to move about and personally supervise their management; and, whenever he sold and disposed of his life estate in said farm, the object and purpose of the execution of the deed of trust was satisfied, as far as that particular farm was concerned, and the title of the trustee became extinct, there being no further active trust as to said farm, unless it would be to take charge of the proceeds of the sale of the life estate therein, and there would be no responsibility on that account, unless it was passed to the hands of the trustee by the said Brillhart.

The authorities cited by the appellant are based, for the most part, on spendthrift trusts and trusts created for the benefit of third parties. It is clear that Brillhart was intending to empower Angle to manage his farms and attend to his business generally because of his own physical disability, and solely for his own benefit. It is not alleged there was any mental incapacity, nor that he was overreached in any manner by La Fevre in making the purchase from him of his life estate in the farm.

There is no error in the decree of the circuit court, and it is therefore affirmed.

(55 W. Va. 656)

MATHENY et al. v. FERGUSON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 22, 1904.)

DEED — CONSTRUCTION—LIABILITIES OF GRANTEE—CHARGE ON LAND—CLAIMS DUE ESTATE.

1. F. and his wife, I., conveyed 211 acres of land to W., their son, in consideration of love and affection, and the further consideration that he pay to R. J. M. $300, to A. M. $100, and to I. M. $100, and that he pay off and discharge all debts remaining against the grantors at the time of their death, or either of them, which deed W. accepted, and took possession of, and held the land thereunder. Held:

First, W. is personally liable for the debts of the grantors, and, second, the land so conveyed to W. whilst held by him will be subjected by a court of equity to pay the debts of the grantors.

2. While claims due an estate should ordinarily be prosecuted by the personal representative thereof, yet it may be done by the beneficiaries thereof in a special case, as where it appears that the personal representative cannot or will not act.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Mason County; Warren Miller, Judge.

Bill by Anna Matheny and others against W. V. Ferguson. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Chas. E. Hogg and J. E. Beller, for plaintiff in error. H. R. Howard, for defendants in error.

McWHORTER, J. William Ferguson and Isabella, his wife, by deed dated October 1, 1901, conveyed to William V. Ferguson a tract of 211 acres of land in consideration of love and affection, and the further consideration that he pay to Rebecca Jane McDermott, wife of John McDermott, $300, to Anna Matheny, wife of Henry Matheny, $100, to Isabella Matheny $100, and that he pay off and discharge all debts remaining against the parties of the first part at the time of their death, or either of them. Anna Matheny, in her own right, and as next friend of the infant children and heirs at law of W. H. Matheny, brought their suit in chancery to enforce the collection of a note for $140 against William V. Ferguson. The note was made by William Ferguson, the father of the defendant, and who had died intestate, and no one had qualified as his personal representative. Said note was dated the 8th of February, 1892, and payable 12 months after date. The bill alleged that plaintiffs had a right to charge said note as a lien upon the land conveyed to the defendant. The demurrer to said bill being sustained by the court, plaintiffs had leave of the court to file amendments to the bill, which they did, making J. W. McDermott, who qualified as administrator of W. H. Matheny, a party defendant, and alleged that said administrator refused to take charge of said note and to collect the same from the defendant William V. Ferguson, and alleging also that said McDermott and Ferguson, who were brothers-in-law, colluded and conspired together to prevent the collection of said note, and that the amount due on said note, after deducting charges against the estate of Matheny coming to said administrator for his official fees and costs, was payable to the plaintiffs, and further alleged that William V. Ferguson was sole surety on the bond of said McDermott as administrator. Ferguson demurred to the amended bill, which demurrer was overruled, and process awarded against McDermott, administrator. Ferguson answered the bill as amended, denying that the debts of the deceased, W. H. Matheny, had been paid, and averring that at the time of his death Matheny owed respondent on account $150, which still remained due and wholly unpaid, and that at the time of his death said Matheny owed divers other debts, which still remained unpaid, and denying that his father had made the note sued upon, and denying the signature to the note, or that his father owed the debt at the time of his death, but admitted that the deed to him required him to discharge all debts remaining against his father at the time of his death. The defendant William V. Ferguson also filed a plea verified by his affidavit, denying that William Ferguson, his father, had made or signed said note, and averring that the signature to said note was not in the handwriting of said William Ferguson. The said William V. Ferguson further made an affidavit "that the said William Ferguson did not in his lifetime make or sign the said note, and that the said note is not in the handwriting of the said William Ferguson, and that the said signature of the said note is not written in the handwriting of the said William Ferguson." Depositions were taken and filed in the cause by plaintiffs and defendant William V. Ferguson. The cause was heard on the 19th of November, 1901, on the bill and amendments thereto, the exhibits, the answer, and plea with replications thereto, and the amount of the note sued upon, with its interest, amounting at date of decree to $213.78, and costs of the suit, decreed to be a valid and subsisting lien upon the 211 acres of land so conveyed by William Ferguson to William V. Ferguson, prior to any and all liens suffered, made, or incurred by the said defendant William V. Ferguson since he became the owner of said land under the said deed of October 1, 1890, and referred the cause to a commissioner of the court to take, state, and report an account showing what indebtedness, their priorities and amounts, and to whom due, was owing by the said William Ferguson at the time of his death, and that in his report the commissioner should hold and take the said sum of $213.78, with interest from November 19, 1901, together with the costs of the suit, to be a valid lien on said land prior to any lien put on said land by the defendant, William V. Ferguson; from which decree the defendant, William V. Ferguson, appealed, assigning as error the overruling of the demurrer to the bill and amended bill, and in not dismissing the plaintiffs' bill upon the proofs, and in not finding for the defendants upon the defendant Ferguson's verified plea that the note sued upon is not the note of William Ferguson, claiming that the preponderance of the evidence was in favor of the defendants, and also in not finding for the defendants upon the defendant Ferguson's answer and averment that the note was without consideration. The court having sustained the demurrer to the original bill, plaintiffs filed amendments thereto. In addition to the allegations of the original bill, the amendments allege that W. H. Matheny left no debts of any consequence at his death, and that what he did leave had long since been settled and paid; that J. W. McDermott had qualified as administrator of said W. H. Matheny, and that said McDermott, as such administrator, refused to take charge of the $140 note sued upon or to collect the same, and refused to proceed against the defendant William V. Ferguson to compel him to pay the note, and averred that said McDermott and William V. Ferguson colluded together in regard to the said note against the rights of the plaintiffs; that said McDermott and Ferguson were brothers-in-law, and that Ferguson was surety on the administration bond of said McDermott, and also his only surety on said bond; and prayed that said McDermott, administrator, be made a party defendant to said suit. The amendments to the bill were filed by order of the court, and process awarded against the said administrator, who failed to answer the bill and amendments thereto.

It is contended by appellant that the right to maintain this suit belongs solely to the personal representative of Matheny. Ordinarily this is true. In Morgan v. Woods, 69 Ga. 599, it is held: "To allow creditors or heirs to sue third persons otherwise than through the representative of the estate, there must be collusion, insolvency, unwillingness to collect the assets, or some other like special circumstance." And in Tabb's Curator v. Cabell, 17 Grat. 160 (Syl., point 6), it is held: "If, upon the death of the life tenant of slaves, the executor declines or neglects to recover the slaves, and sell them for division, as the will authorized him to do, the remainderman may sue in equity to recover and divide them among the parties entitled." And in Burroughs v. Elton, 11 Ves. 29: "Suit by a creditor against persons accountable to the estate allowed in a special case, as when the representative cannot or will not act." So in the case of Richardson v. Donehoo, 16 W. Va. 685 (Syl., point 10), where it is said: "The executor or administrator is the proper representative of the personal estate, and, generally, all suits should be brought by and against him in relation thereto. In some special cases this rule seems to have been relaxed." The rule was so relaxed in case of Wilson v. Straight, 46 W. Va. 651, 33 S. E. 758. So in the case of Foling v. Huffman, 39 W. Va. 320, 19 S. E. 421, where the plaintiffs, creditors of the decedent, filed their bill against Anthony Huffman, the sole heir, and James A. Williamson, administrator, it was held that the bill was not demurrable because filed within six months of the date of the appointment of the personal representative of the estate. J. W. McDermott, the administrator, was examined as a witness in the case, and testified that he would not sue upon the note if he had had the same in his possession, for the reason that he was related to both parties and did not want to make any trouble. The allegations of the bill in the case at bar were sufficient to give the court equity jurisdiction in the case, and the demurrer was properly overruled. There can be no question about the liability of the defendant William V. Ferguson to the creditors of his father, William Ferguson, for the debts remaining unpaid at his death, said defendant having accepted the deed from his father with its conditions to pay such debts. It is insisted by appellant that, no lien having been reserved by the elder Ferguson to secure the debts to be paid as a condition of the conveyance, the land could not be held subject to the payment thereof. The debt sued upon, while not, strictly speaking, a lien upon the land, was a charge thereon which a court of equity should enforce; that it was called a lien by the court is immaterial. In Vanmeter's Ex'rs v. Vanmeter, 3 Grat. 148, V. had by deed conveyed to A. & I. his lands, in consideration that they should pay his debts and pay him $500 a year during his life. A. & I. did not execute the deed, but they took possession and held the lands, and it is there held that they were personally liable for the debts of V., and it is further held that the land so conveyed to them whilst held by A. & I. would be subjected by a court of equity to pay the debts of V.

The evidence is conflicting as to the making of the note by the decedent, William Ferguson, but is sufficient to sustain the court's finding, and is of such a character that different judges might reasonably disagree as to the facts proved or the conclusion to be deduced from them, and there is certainly not a preponderance of evidence against the execution of the note by the decedent. In such case this court has many times held that it will not disturb a decree based upon such testimony. Smith v. Yoke, 27 W. Va. 639; Doonan v. Glynn, 28 W. Va. 715; Prichard v. Evans, 31 W. Va. 137, 5 S. E. 461; Frederick v. Frederick, 31 W. Va. 556, 8 S. E. 295, and many others later. The decree complained of simply settled the status of the claim sued upon as a debt against the estate, but gave it no priority over other debts against the estate of the decedent, Ferguson, and provided for convening the creditors by referring the cause to a commissioner for that purpose, who was to ascertain and report the indebtedness of the estate, to whom due, the amounts and priorities of the debts, and to show what was due, if anything, to the parties named in the deed, to be paid by the grantee, William V. Ferguson.

There is no reversible error in the decree, and it must be affirmed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings to be therein had.

BRANNON, J. (concurring). Counsel for the defense would defend this case by saying that there is no lien on the land under the deed from William Ferguson to William V. Ferguson, because section 1, c. 75, of the Code of 1899, says that if any person convey land, and the purchase money remain unpaid, there is no lien therefor, unless it is expressly reserved on the face of the conveyance. I hold that that statute has no application to this case. It is true that the purchase money was not paid, and was thereafter to be paid, and at first thought it occurred to me that the point stated was plausible, but on further thought I have come to the conclusion stated. The statute referred to had an obvious purpose. Prior to its enactment, where the legal title was conveyed and the purchase money remained unpaid, there was what was called the vendor's implied lien. It existed by implication for the purchase money, though no lien or charge was spoken in the conveyance. It was very dangerous to creditors and purchasers, because it was a hidden, secret lien that might arise at any moment, by oral evidence, to afflict the purchaser or creditor. The statute was intended to abolish that particular lien. It was made to defend creditors and purchasers. Lough v. Michael, 37 W. Va. 686, 17 S. E. 181, 470. But in this case William Ferguson conveyed the land and created a trust spoken on the very face of the deed, which gave notice to purchasers and creditors of its existence. It is only the case, known long before that statute, in equity law, of a man conveying land to another in trust to hold it for the benefit of some one else or pay him money. It is simply a trust, not secret, but open, not tested by that statute. The only question is whether the words of the deed do create a trust. They certainly do plainly manifest an intent by the grantor to devote the land to answer certain ends, and that is the trust. Very much authority could be cited to support this position. Roberts v. Coleman, 37 W. Va. 143, 16 S. E. 482; Willard v. Worsham, 76 Va. 392; Hooper v. Hooper, 32 W. Va. 526, 9 S. E. 937; Story's Eq. § 1246; Plondexter's Ex'rs v. Green's Ex'rs, 6 Leigh, 504; Hogg v. Browning, 47 W. Va. 22, 34 S. E. 754.

On the question of the execution of the note the evidence is oral and circumstantial, and so conflicting that different men could readily differ in opinion as to its effect, and on principle well established, unless we feel convinced of error in the circuit court, we cannot reverse it. Fitzgerald v. Phelps, 42 W. Va. 570, 26 S. E. 315; Shaffer v. Shaffer, 51 W. Va. 126, 41 S. E. 166.

Recurring to the question of lien, I find a case [Roanoke Brick & Lime Co. v. Simmons, 20 S. E. 955] reported in 2 Va. Dec. 70, a book of decisions in Virginia not officially reported, holding in just such a case as this the very opposite of our holding; but I think it unsound. Why was the case not officially reported? It holds that "all vendors' liens for the purchase of property, unless reserved on the face of the instrument, are abolished by Code 1849, c. 119, § 1."

Vanmeter's Ex'rs v. Vanmeter, 3 Grat. 148, cited by Judge McWHORTER, was before the statute requiring a vendor's lien to be reserved in the deed, and, if that statute applied to this case, the Vanmeter Case would have no force in our decision; but, as the statute does not enter into the case, the Vanmeter Case is good authority. The deed created a trust to pay debts, and is a clear charge on the land. The trust could not be enforced otherwise than by holding the debts a charge.

BUCK v. NEWBERRY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 22, 1904.)

TRESPASS — EVIDENCE — LIMITATIONS — APPEAL — REVIEW — WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

1. In an action of trespass for cutting trees, and the deed of the plaintiff excepts certain tracts within the outside boundary of the land, the plaintiff must show that the trees cut were not on the excepted land.

2. In an action of trespass for cutting trees, under a plea of the statute of limitations, the defendant must show the date of such trespass, and, where part of the cutting of trees was more, and part less, than five years before suit, he must show what part is barred by the statute.

3. Rarely can the Supreme Court set aside a verdict dependent on weight of evidence, and approved by the circuit judge. The Code of 1899, c. 131, § 9, does not, even if it could do so, under the Constitution, direct the courts as to what effect they shall give evidence upon a motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Wyoming County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Action by Frank Buck against Harman Newberry. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Campbell, Holt & Campbell, H. K. Shumate, and J. W. McCreery, for plaintiff in error. Douglas & McGrath, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. Frank Buck brought an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against Harman Newberry, in the circuit court of Wyoming county, for breaking and entering and cutting trees upon a close of Buck containing 63,000 acres, part of a tract of 480,000 acres of land granted by Virginia to Robert Morris, 23d March, 1795. A deed from Phillip A. Trimble to Buck, under which Buck claimed, reserves from the 63,000-acre boundary four different tracts, which had been previously conveyed to other persons, aggregating 14,000 acres. Newberry pleaded the general issue of not guilty and the statute of limitations. A jury having found for the defendant, the court overruled a motion of Buck for a new trial based on the claim that the finding was contrary to the evidence, and gave judgment for the defendant, and Buck brought the case here.

The case involves only questions of fact, under a large amount of oral evidence. Is the place where the trees were cut within the Morris grant? Is that place within or without the four tracts excepted in the deed from Trimble to Buck? Did the defendant cut the timber? Was the cutting within five years before the suit? These are the questions. No actual possession being shown, it is admitted that, to recover, Buck had to show title to the ground on which the timber was cut, and, to do this, he had to show that the Morris grant covered it. This was a jury question. It depended on oral evidence of surveys, corner trees, and other corners, water courses, ridges, and other circumstances. The evidence to locate the survey, and especially as to a certain line on which the controversy hinged, was not clear, but easily admitted of two opinions. We cannot overrule the jury and the circuit court under this head.

There was no adequate evidence to show that the timber cut was not upon the land excepted in the deed from Trimble to Buck.

The burden was on Buck to show that the cutting was on his land, and, as thousands of acres within the bounds of his deed were never conveyed to him, he must show that the timber was not on those excepted lands. Stockton v. Morris, 39 W. Va. 432, 19 S. E. 531. The cases given on the two hearings of that case will sustain this position.

As to limitation: The evidence shows that some of the cutting was barred, some not. The burden was on the defendant to prove the time of the trespass under this plea, and it was on him to show what part was barred. But this, except as a legal proposition arising on the record, is immaterial, as the verdict is beyond our reach for reasons above stated. We cannot act as a jury. Again and again has this court said that where the case turns on questions of fact, on oral evidence, the jury being the judges, almost uncontrollably, of its weight and effect, we should scarcely ever reverse a verdict. In State v. Sullivan, 47 S. E. 267, decided at this term, this subject is discussed; and it is held that where there is some evidence—evidence worthy to be considered—fairly bearing with some weight upon the matter involved, appreciably operative to sustain a verdict, so as to make the case turn on its weight and effect, the verdict rightly ought to stand. Why does the Constitution give the jury trial, if this be not so? It gives it to both sides. When the Supreme Court interferes simply because its judges, if of the jury, would have found the fact otherwise, it is only an act of arbitrary power against the plain meaning of the Constitution. I insist that when there has been a fair trial of fact by a jury, and the verdict is approved by the judge presiding, the opinion of that judge, who witnesses the trial, ought to be highly regarded, is almost conclusive and final, and rarely can be reversed. Smith v. Parkersburg Association, 48 W. Va. 232, 37 S. E. 645; Sigler v. Beebe, 44 W. Va. 587, 30 S. E. 76. As stated in Johnson v. Burns, 39 W. Va. 669, 20 S. E. 686, Code 1899, c. 131, § 9, only causes the evidence, not the ultimate facts, merely, to be certified, so that the appellate court may see the evidence, and that its effect to prove facts shall not be left finally to the trial judge; but the Legislature did not design a subversion and revolution as to the time-honored rules upon the treatment of verdicts and evidence in appellate courts; did not design to give the evidence a new force or effect; did not design to overthrow the weight of verdicts. As is said in the Johnson Case, the Legislature could not add new force to evidence, or affect verdicts under it, for that would be the exercise of judicial function, militating against the Constitution, which vests that function in the judiciary. The Legislature cannot trench upon the effect of a verdict. We must not give the statute such a construction. Before it came, the rule was that the trial court certified only the facts which it thought were proven by the evidence, and not the evidence in detail; but the statute was intended to dispense with the absoluteness of the judge's opinion, and bring before the appellate court the whole evidence, not merely the facts proven by the evidence according to the circuit judge's opinion, and thus present the whole evidence for the consideration of the appellate court.

For these reasons, we affirm the judgment.

McCREERY v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF BLUEFIELD.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 22, 1904.)

PRESUMPTIONS — FIDUCIARIES — EXECUTORS—NOTE—COLLATERAL.

1. Fiduciaries are presumed to have acted in good faith and performed their duty, and not to have committed breaches of trust.

2. Certificates of bank stock in the name of P., taken up by the bank, and reissued to B. P., executor of P., and by B. P. pledged as collateral security for notes made by B. P., the executor, in due course of the administration of the estate of P., cannot be recovered from the bank so holding such certificates by an administrator de bonis non, with the will annexed, of P.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Bill by J. W. McCreery, administrator, against the First National Bank of Bluefield. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. C. & B. McLaugherty, for appellant.
A. W. Reynolds, for appellee.

McWHORTER, J. Edwin Prince died testate in the year 1894. His will was admitted to probate on the 10th day of December of that year. By his will he appointed his wife, Lockey F. Prince, Burke Prince, his son, and James H. McGinnis, as executors. Burke Prince alone qualified as executor. The others declined to serve as such. Among the assets of the estate which came to the hands of the said executor were $10,000, par value, of Bank of Hinton stock. Burke Prince, the executor, had the bank take up said stock, and issue certificates thereof to him as executor of Edwin Prince. On the 21st day of November, 1896, Burke Prince made a negotiable note to his brother Ash M. Prince, which was indorsed by the said Ash M. Prince and J. O. Darst & Co., which he had discounted at the First National Bank of Bluefield, and deposited with the bank as collateral security for the note certificates of the said Bank of Hinton stock—15 shares, of the par value of $100 per share. He also made three other notes to said bank, aggregating the sum of $619.69, and delivered 10 shares of the said Bank of Hinton stock, amounting to $1,000, as collateral therefor. Burke Prince, the executor, died in February or March, 1899, and John W. McCreery was appointed on the 28th of March, 1899, as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of the estate of said Edwin Prince. Said McCreery filed his bill in the circuit court of Mercer county against the First National Bank of Bluefield to recover from said bank the said Bank of Hinton stock, as belonging to the estate of said Edwin Prince; claiming that Burke Prince, who had possession of them as executor of the will of said Edwin Prince, had disposed of them for his own purposes and individual benefit, and that the same was an illegal and unwarranted use and conversion of said stocks, and an abuse of the trust confided to him by the will of his testator, and, being such, was ineffectual to transfer any interest therein or title thereto to the defendant, and that the said defendant bank had knowledge that said Burke was not the true owner of said stocks, and that he was using and pledging them and obtaining money thereon from the defendant for his own personal individual use and purposes, and to secure the payment of loans of money made to him personally by said defendant bank, and that the said bank occupied no other or higher grounds than said Burke Prince, and that the said bank held said certificates of stock as trustee for the estate of Edwin Prince, deceased, and that a court of equity would compel it to deliver the same to plaintiff, to be disposed of in due course of administration by him as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of said estate; and prayed that said bank be held to be a trustee of said stock for the use of said estate, and that it be compelled to deliver up the same to plaintiff, and for general relief.

The defendant bank filed its demurrer and answer, averring that the title to the Bank of Hinton stock was not in plaintiff as administrator de bonis non of said Edwin Prince, and that he was not entitled to the possession thereof, and that the said stocks were administered by said Burke Prince, executor of Edwin Prince, and converted, changed, and reduced to possession by him in due course of administration of said estate, so as to completely invest him with the title thereto, and that the title thereto was now invested in the personal representative of said Burke Prince; subject to the pledge thereof as collateral security to the defendant, and subject to all defendant's rights and interest therein, admitting that the said Burke Prince had caused the original certificates to be taken up and to be issued to him in his name as executor of Edwin Prince, deceased, and that, as executor, the said Edwin Prince had made his negotiable note to said Ash M. Prince, payable at said bank, which note was made for the purpose of obtaining money from said bank by Burke Prince, executor, indorsed by said Ash M. Prince, and delivered to the bank, together with 15 shares of the said stock as collateral, contemporaneous with the loan and payment to said Burke Prince of said

$1,000; that the bank still held the said shares of stock as collateral security, which $1,000 note was renewed from time to time, the said loan being made on the 21st of November, 1896. Respondent denied that said note was executed and stocks deposited as collateral for the purpose of obtaining said $1,000, or any part thereof, for the individual and personal use and benefit of said Burke Prince, and, if there was any intention on said Burke's part to use said money for his own purposes in any manner inconsistent with his duties as executor, respondent had no knowledge or notice of it; that respondent's understanding was that Burke Prince was acting in perfect good faith and in lawful manner with said stocks, and it had no notice whatever that said Prince was diverting the effects of said estate from the proper course of administration, and denied that he was doing so; and that it held two other negotiable notes made by said Burke Prince, as "B. Prince," payable at the said bank, one dated February 2, 1899, for $250, and the other dated February 11, 1899, for $219.69, both of which were due and unpaid, and for each of which said bank was holding five shares of the said Bank of Hinton stock transferred and pledged to said bank as collateral security for the respective amounts of said notes by said Burke Prince, executor, according to the terms and conditions stipulated in said notes; and denied that said Burke Prince was making any improper use of said stocks, and denied that he obtained said money for his own private benefit, and denied that he did not have the right to so deposit them as such collateral security; that it had no notice when it received the assignment of said original note, and the accompanying transfer of said stock as collateral security therewith, that said Prince obtained said money for his own private use and benefit, or that he was making an improper use of said stocks when he deposited and transferred them as collateral security; and averred that said stocks had been administered upon by said Burke Prince as executor; that their nature had been changed in due course of administration, and that they no longer stood in the name of Edwin Prince, but that they had been transferred, and were then in the name of Burke Prince as executor; and denied that the stocks belonged to the estate of Edwin Prince at the time they were transferred as collateral security, and denied that the transfer by said Burke Prince was improper, and denied all allegations charging it with notice of any and all improper use of said stocks, and the money for which they were deposited as security, and denied that it stood on no higher ground than Burke Prince, or that it held said stock as trustee for the estate of Edwin Prince, deceased, and denied the right of plaintiff to any relief prayed for in his bill.

Depositions were taken and filed in the cause, and the cause heard on the 11th of February, 1903, on the bill and exhibits, the defendant's demurrer and answer, and exhibits therewith, and general replication, and the depositions of witnesses, and exhibits filed with the same, and upon the copy of the bond of Burke Prince as executor of Edwin Prince, deceased, filed in the cause; and, upon argument of counsel, the court was of opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief prayed for in the cause, and entered a decree dismissing his bill, and with costs to the defendant.

It is insisted by appellant that the defendant bank could not make loans to the executor, and receive the stocks as collateral, unless it had been made to appear affirmatively that it was for the benefit of the estate. In 7 A. & E. E. L. (1st Ed.) 288, the law is thus stated: "The executor or administrator, having absolute power of disposition over the personal effects, may sell, pledge, or mortgage the assets; and, in the absence of collusion, they cannot be followed by creditors or legatees, either general or specific, into the hands of the alienee, nor is it incumbent upon the purchaser or mortgagee to see the money obtained properly applied, although he may know that he is dealing with an executor. To establish collusion, it must appear that the purchaser or mortgagee participated in the devastavit, or that the sale or mortgage was made by the personal representative as security for, or in payment of, his individual debt. In the latter case the transaction itself gives the purchaser or mortgagee notice of the misapplication, and necessarily involves his participation in the devastavit." Citing McCloud v. Drummond, 17 Ves. 154. And in Scott v. Tyler, 2 Dickens, 712, at page 725, Lord Thurlow says: "It is of great consequence that no rule should be laid down here which may impede executors in their administration, or render their disposition of their testator's effects unsafe or uncertain to the purchaser. His title is complete by sale and delivery. What becomes of the price is no concern to the purchaser. This observation applies equally to mortgages and pledges, and even to the present instance, where assignable bonds were merely pledged without assignment. It applies also where the transaction is with one of many executors, for each is competent." The only evidence tending to bring to the knowledge of the officers of the bank that the money, or any part of it, was to be used by Burke Prince for his individual purposes and benefit, is that of Ash M. Prince, and his testimony is excepted to as being incompetent. It is sought to prove by said Ash M. Prince that the loans of the $1,000 and the $219.69 were borrowed for Burke's individual benefit, and that the bank knew it. This was a transaction with Burke Prince. Although Ash M. Prince claims to have negotiated the loans, Burke signed the notes, received the loans, and deposited the Bank of Hinton stock as collateral security therefor. He was a party to the transactions, and since deceased. In Fouse v. Gillilan, 45 W. Va. 213, 32 S. E. 178 (Syl., point 7), it is held: "In such a case the test of the admissibility of the testimony is, does it tend to prove what the transaction was?" Owens v. Owens, 14 W. Va. 88; Strong v. Dean, 55 Barb. 337; Stanley v. Whitney, 47 Barb. 586; Anderson v. Jarrett, 43 W. Va. 246, 27 S. E. 348. Even if the testimony of Ash M. Prince were admissible, his testimony on cross-examination shows that at the time of the negotiation of the $1,000 note, which was in November, 1896, Burke Prince was in condition to rightfully appropriate to his own use, as one of the heirs of Edwin Prince, more of the assets of the estate than the amounts involved in the transaction in question. When he was asked: "Do you mean to say that, in the transaction in which the $1,000 was borrowed from the First National Bank, B. Prince and yourself, acting in that transaction for him, were knowingly diverting these Bank of Hinton stocks from the due course of administration of the estate of Edwin Prince?" he answered: "I do not. At that time I supposed that B. Prince had a sufficient interest in the estate, as one of the heirs, to make good the stock that he put up as collateral." And the exhibit filed with the deposition of plaintiff as a witness shows this supposition to be true. Ash M. Prince and Burke Prince were brothers and heirs at law of Edwin Prince, deceased. With the deposition of plaintiff himself, he filed copies of settlements of the executorial accounts of the said Burke Prince, from which it appears that at the beginning of the second settlement, marked "Exhibit No. 3," with said deposition of plaintiff, the account starts out with a balance due, June 2, 1896, from executor, "on last settlement, $1,192.15"; and, starting with this as a basis, the debits and credits up to the 26th of November, 1896, the date of the negotiation of the $1,000 note, show there was a difference of between $5,000 and $6,000 in favor of the executor, from which it would appear that Ash was right in supposing that his brother had a sufficient interest in the estate, as one of the heirs, to make good the stock he put up as collateral. If the brother, who must have been familiar with the affairs of the estate of his father, being himself an heir, and also one of the sureties on the executor's large bond, of $100,000, was satisfied with the administration of the estate, knowing that it was at that time largely indebted to the executor, surely the circumstances were not sufficiently suspicious to cause the bank to institute an inquiry into the official conduct of the executor. The presumption is that his acts are legal and all done in good faith. "Administrators and trustees are presumed to have performed their duty, and not to have committed breaches of trust." Jones on Evidence, § 12. All knowledge or notice is denied on his part by the testimony of Edwin Mann, president of the defendant bank; and W. C. Pollock, cashier of the same, who states that he was the officer in charge (Mr. Mann, the president, being away at the time) who received the 15 shares of Bank of Hinton stock as collateral, denied positively all knowledge or notice that the money was being received by said Burke Prince for his individual benefit. "Executors and administrators have authority, unless restricted by statute, to mortgage or pledge the personal property of their decedents for the purpose of raising money or securing debts; and this authority rests on the same principles, is governed by the same rules, and is subject to the same limitations, in general, as apply to sales." 11 A. & E. E. L. (2d Ed.) 1031. And Id. 1325: "At common law an administrator de bonis non, as the phrase designating his office implies, succeeds only to such of the assets of the estate as have not been administered by the executor or administrator who preceded him at the time of his death, or are capable of being identified as the property of the decedent, and such of the debts due to the decedent as remain unpaid. With respect to such assets, his powers, duties, and liabilities are the same as those of his predecessor, and he may recover them from the original executor or administrator, or from any one in whose possession they may be found, but he cannot require a settlement of the accounts of the former executor or administrator." In Gottberg v. Bank, 28 Abb. N. C. 50, 13 N. Y. Supp. 841, it is said: "There must be direct evidence that the executor or administrator was acting for a purpose not in connection with the administration of the estate, and such evidence is not furnished by the fact that the transaction was in the executor's individual name, and that the pledgee could have ascertained by inquiry that the securities pledged were held by the executor as such." In Jones v. Clark, 25 Grat. 642, in speaking for the court, Judge Moncure says: "There can be no doubt but that an executor is invested with the legal title to the assets of his testator which come to his hands for administration, whether they arise from personal estate, or from real estate directed by the will to be sold for the payment of debts and legacies, and sold accordingly by the executor. Nor can there be any doubt but that a bona fide purchaser, for value, and without notice of a portion of such assets, either directly or indirectly, from the executor, will acquire a good title thereto, even though the executor commit a devastavit by making the sale for the purpose of converting the proceeds to his own use, and by actually so converting them." Fleld v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch. 150, 11 Am. Dec. 441. In U. S., for Wilson v. Walker, 109 U. S. 258, 8 Sup. Ct. 277, 27 L. Ed. 927, it is held that an administrator de bonis non, appointed in place of an administrator removed, is not entitled to demand of the administrator so removed the proceeds of a claim against the United States due the intestate, and collected by the former administrator, nor can he maintain suit against the surety of the former administrator to recover damages for failure by the former administrator to pay such sum to the administrator de bonis non; and it was further held that a decree directing such former administrator to pay over to the administrator de bonis non appointed in his place a sum collected by the former from the United States for a claim due to the intestate was void for want of jurisdiction. Wilson v. Arrick, 112 U. S. 83, 5 Sup. Ct. 75, 28 L. Ed. 617. In Sibbs v. Philadelphia Savings Fund Society (Pa.) 25 Atl. 1119, it is held: "An administrator having reduced a deposit of intestate in a bank to his possession, by having it transferred to his credit as administrator, his personal representatives are, on his death, entitled to receive it from the bank, so that, it having been paid them, the bank cannot be held liable by intestate's administrator de bonis non." Hartson v. Elden (N. J., Ch.) 44 Atl. 156.

There is no error in the decree, and the same is affirmed.

SMATHERS et al. v. WESTERN CAROLINA BANK et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 17, 1904.)

CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—STATUTORY LIABILITY—ENFORCEMENT—ACTIONS BY RECEIVER—CREDITORS' BILLS—TIME OF ENFORCEMENT—COMPLAINT—NECESSARY ALLEGATIONS—STATUTES IMPOSING LIABILITY—CONSTRUCTION.

1. Under Code, § 688, providing that, when a corporation is insolvent, the judge of the superior court having jurisdiction may appoint a receiver to take charge of the estate and effects thereof, and to prosecute all necessary actions either in his own name or in the name of the corporation, and extending the life of the corporation for three years after dissolution for the purpose of winding up its affairs, the receiver of an insolvent corporation may, either in his own name or in that of the corporation, sue to collect the assets of the corporation, and have adjudicated in such suit all legal and equitable matters touching the rights of the corporation, its creditors and debtors.

2. The capital stock of a corporation constitutes a trust fund for the payment of its debts.

3. Unpaid subscriptions to stock in a corporation constitute a part of its assets, and are to be sued for and recovered in the same manner as other assets—at least to the extent that they are necessary for the payment of its debts.

4. The double liability imposed on stockholders in banks by Pub. Laws 1897, p. 473, c. 298, is an obligation to the corporation in trust for the security of its creditors; and while unpaid subscriptions on stock should be first resorted to, before enforcing the double liability, which is a secondary one, such liability cannot, as against creditors or other stockholders, be released by the corporation, and in case of its insolvency it may be enforced by the receiver of the corporation for the benefit of creditors.

5. While there is no necessity for joining creditors of a bank as parties plaintiff in a suit brought by the receiver to enforce the stockholders' double liability imposed by Pub. Laws 1897, p. 473, c. 298, such joinder is not prejudicial to defendants.

6. The usual and better practice to enforce the double liability imposed on stockholders in banks by Pub. Laws 1897, p. 473, c. 298, where a creditors' bill has been previously brought and a receiver appointed, is to seek such relief in the creditors' bill, instead of instituting a separate and subsequent action by the receiver; and in such creditors' bill the court, on the report of the receiver, may ascertain the amount for which each stockholder should be held liable, and assess him accordingly, and issue a notice to each stockholder to show cause why the assessment should not be enforced.

7. In an action by the receiver to enforce the double liability imposed on bank stockholders by Pub. Laws 1897, p. 473, c. 298, the complaint should state the time when the several defendants became stockholders, and the dates when the debts were contracted.

8. The double statutory liability imposed on stockholders in banks by Pub. Laws 1897, p. 473, c. 298, may be enforced by the receiver whenever it appears that the other assets of the bank will be insufficient, and he need not wait until other assets are completely exhausted.

9. Statutes such as Pub. Laws 1897, p. 473, c. 298, imposing on stockholders in banks a double liability, are in derogation of the common law, and should be strictly construed.

10. Pub. Laws 1897, p. 473, c. 298, which imposes on bank stockholders an additional personal liability to the extent of the amount of their stock, and repeals all exemptions from personal liability contained in charters, should be construed to effect only a prospective charge in charters, and not so as to fix such liability on stockholders for debts contracted prior to the enactment of the statute, and, when so construed, is not constitutionally objectionable.

Appeal from Superior Court. Buncombe County; Long, Judge.

Action by George H. Smathers, receiver, and others, against the Western Carolina Bank and others. From a judgment overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Merrimon & Merrimon and Moore & Rollins, for appellants. Jones & Jones, for appellees.

CONNOR, J. This action, in the nature of bill in equity, was brought by Geo. H. Smathers, receiver of the Western Carolina Bank, in which a number of creditors, in behalf of themselves and all other creditors of said bank, joined, against the bank and certain stockholders thereof, for the purpose of enforcing the statutory liability imposed upon the stockholders for the indebtedness of the bank by chapter 298, p. 473, Pub. Laws 1897. The complaint sets forth the incorporation and organization of the bank, the names and number of shares held by each stockholder, and date of becoming such stockholder, and the failure of the bank. It further sets forth the institution in the superior court of an action by certain creditors in the nature of a creditors' bill, and the appointment of the plaintiff as receiver. The order of the court is attached to, and made a part of, the complaint. It is in the usual form, and contains the following provision: "It is further ordered that the said receivers take into their charge all the property and assets of the said defendant corporation, and that they shall proceed at once to the collection of all debts due to the said corporation defendant, and take all such necessary and legal steps for the purpose of such collection; hereby giving to the said receivers full power and authority, in their names as such, to institute and prosecute to final judgment all such suits and actions at law and equity as may be necessary for the purpose of reducing the choses in action and other evidences of debt into possession, and collecting the same," etc. The original order appointed two receivers. One of them resigned, leaving said Smathers sole receiver. Thereafter an order was made in said cause substituting W. W. Jones, Esq., receiver in place of said Smathers. He was made party plaintiff, and an amended complaint was filed, setting forth the order of substitution and adopting the original complaint. It is alleged that the total assets of the bank will not pay to exceed 50 per cent. of its indebtedness. The defendants demurred to the complaint, and assigned as grounds of demurrer (1) that the action should have been brought by the creditors of the bank in their own right, and that the receiver has no cause of action, etc.; (2) that the action should have been brought by the creditors against each individual stockholder; (3) that there is a misjoinder of plaintiffs and defendants; (4) that relief should have been sought in the original action; (5) that it does not appear upon the face of the complaint whether the defendants became stockholders before or after the passage of the act of 1897, p. 473, c. 298, nor when the alleged debts were created or contracted; (6) that it does not appear that the assets of the bank have been exhausted, or that any liability has arisen against the defendants under said act of 1897; (7) that the act is unconstitutional, for that it is ex post facto and retroactive, impairs the obligation of contracts, etc.; (8) that no power is conferred upon the receiver to bring the action. His honor overruled the demurrer, and allowed the defendants time to answer. Defendants appealed.

The act of 1897, by which it is sought to attach the liability of the defendants, was ratified March 6, 1897. It provides that the stockholders of every bank or banking association now operating by virtue of any charter or law of this state, or that may hereafter operate, "shall be held individually responsible equally and ratably and not one for another, for all contracts, debts and agreements of such association to the extent of the amounts of their stock therein at the par value thereof in addition to the amount invested in such share." By section 2, any exemption from personal liability contained in any charter is repealed. The Code (section 668) provides that, when any corporation is insolvent, the judge of the superior court having jurisdiction as fixed by the Code (chapter 10) may appoint a receiver to take charge of the estate and effects thereof, and to prosecute all such actions, either in his own name or the name of the corporation, as may be necessary or proper, etc. Whatever may have been the law in respect to the right of the receiver to prosecute actions for the recovery of the assets, debts, and property of the corporation prior to the change in our judicial system, blending the legal and equitable jurisdiction and power into one tribunal and form of action, it is well settled now, as said by Burwell, J., in Davis v. Mfg. Co., 114 N. C. 321, 19 S. E. 871, 23 L. R. A. 322: "In Gray v. Lewis, 94 N. C. 392, it was decided that, as well because of the change in the system of our courts as because of the Statute, the receiver might sue either in his own name or that of the corporation. In whichever name he may elect to bring the action, it is essentially a suit by the corporation, prosecuted by order of the court, for the collection of the assets. * * * In it may be adjudicated all the rights of the bank, its creditors, and the defendant debtor, both legal and equitable, pertaining to the matters set out in the pleadings; and such judgment may be entered as will enforce the rights of the general creditors, and also protect any equities that the defendant may be entitled to," etc. The statute (Code, § 668) expressly extends the life of the corporation for three years after dissolution for the purpose of winding up its affairs. The doctrine that the capital stock of a corporation constitutes a trust fund has been accepted and acted upon by this court. Marshall Foundry Co. v. Killian, 99 N. C. 501, 6 S. E. 680, 6 Am. St. Rep. 539; Cotton Mills v. Cotton Mills, 115 N. C. 475, 20 S. E. 770; Bank v. Cotton Mills, 115 N. C. 507, 20 S. E. 765.

"It is a favorite doctrine of the American courts that the capital stock and other property of a corporation are to be deemed a trust fund for the payment of the debts of the corporation," etc. 10 Cyc. 553. The same authorities conclusively settle the doctrine that unpaid subscriptions to stock constitute a part of the assets of the corporations, and are to be sued for and recovered in the same manner as other assets—certainly to the extent that they are necessary for the payment of its debts. Judge Thompson, in his very able and exhaustive article on "Corporations," vol. 10, Cyc., says that the remedy for the recovery of such unpaid subscriptions is, in the absence of any statutory provision, in equity; that when, for any reason, it becomes necessary to afford an effective remedy, a court of equity will direct suit to be brought by the directors or by "its own proper officers." Pages 655, 656. Does the liability of the stockholders imposed by the act of 1897 come within the same principle as unpaid subscriptions? It certainly does in respect to the purpose for which it is imposed, and to give the securities to creditors which it designs. It simply incorporates into the contract of subscription the additional obligation that, if necessary to pay the debts of the corporation, the subscriber will pay an amount in addition to his subscription equal to the par value of his stock. This obligation is to the corporation in trust for the security of its creditors. It is difficult to see in what respect it differs from the promise to pay the amount of his stock, so far as the right of the creditor is concerned, except in the order of liability. The corporation may not, as against creditors or other stockholders, relieve him from the obligation. Marshall Foundry Co. v. Killian, supra. The corporation, or those representing or succeeding to its rights and remedies, should collect all unpaid subscriptions before resorting to the additional statutory liability which is secondary to the right to demand payment of the subscription. The receiver represents, and, in a certain sense, succeeds to the rights of, the corporation. We can see no valid reason why he may not, representing the corporation and its creditors, bring any and all actions in respect to its assets or rights of action which it or its creditors could have brought. The exact question raised by the demurrer is presented and decided in Wilson v. Book, 13 Wash. 676, 43 Pac. 839. The constitutional provision in that state is the same as the act of 1897. The opinion by Hoyt, C. J., discusses and settles the question. We have no hesitation, after careful examination, in adopting his reasoning and conclusion. He says: "But if this fund is secondary, and for the benefit of all the creditors of the corporation, it can be reached only by a proceeding in equity for the benefit of such creditors; and since, under our statute, the receiver of an insolvent corporation represents its creditors as well as the corporation itself, and can reach all the assets of the corporation for the purpose of satisfying the claims of creditors, there is no reason why the additional liability of stockholders should not, under the direction of the court, be enforced by such receiver for the benefit of such creditors, and the expense and annoyance incident to the prosecution of another action avoided. All the other property of an insolvent corporation is a trust fund for the same purpose, and there is no reason why trust funds for a single purpose, though derived from different sources, should not be collected and administered in the same proceeding. * * * The receiver, when appointed, takes possession of all the property of the corporation for the benefit of all its creditors; and it should be held that he has the right, under the direction of the court, to enforce every liability, of whatever nature, which the court may find it necessary to fully protect the rights of creditors. In this way all creditors share alike, and the entire affairs of the corporation, including the adjustment of the liabilities of its stockholders, will be subject to the control of the court in a single action, and unnecessary delay and expense prevented." The case was approved in Watterson v. Masterson, 15 Wash. 511, 48 Pac. 1041, in which it was held that, after the appointment of a receiver of an insolvent corporation, an action could not be maintained by the creditors to enforce the statutory liability of the stockholders. While there is some divergence of opinion in the different courts in respect to the right of creditors to maintain separate actions upon the statutory liability, we are of the opinion that it is more consonant with principle and convenience of procedure to recognize the right of the receiver to bring the suit wherein all parties in interest are represented, and complete relief afforded.

This view disposes of the first and second grounds of demurrer. In respect to the third ground of demurrer, while we see no necessity for joining the creditors as parties plaintiff, no harm can come to the defendants therefrom.

The fourth ground of demurrer is based upon the suggestion that relief should have been sought in the original action or creditors' bill. There is much force in the contention, and we can see no good reason why, upon motion, the cause should not be consolidated with the original action. In winding up the affairs of an insolvent corporation, it is best that, as nearly as may be, the court having original jurisdiction bring all parties interested in the final decree before it, to the end that their rights and equities be adjusted and administered. The usual and better practice is to have an assessment upon the stockholders made by the court, upon an ascertainment from the report of the receiver, and notice issued to each stockholder to show cause why such assessment should not be enforced. The act of 1891, p. 141, c. 155, in regard to winding up the affairs of insolvent banks, as amended by the Laws of 1899, p. 291, c. 164, transferring to the Corporation Commission the power and duties conferred upon the Treasurer, contemplates this procedure. While, as we have seen, the receiver may recover the amount due from the stockholder, he should be permitted to do so only upon its appearing that there is a deficit in the other assets of the bank, and he should recover only such amount as may be necessary to cover such deficit. It is within the power of the court to make such assessment. Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 56, 23 L. Ed. 220; Hawkins v. Glenn, 131 U. S. 319, 9 Sup. Ct. 739, 33 L. Ed. 184. It may be that it would be wise to confer upon the Corporation Commission, having charge of the management of banks, the power to make such assessments after the manner provided in the national banking act, by which the Comptroller does so. The plaintiff will probably encounter practical difficulties in working out a final judgment in this case, many of which would be avoided if the action is consolidated with the original action, wherein he may make his report to the court, showing the amount necessary to collect from the stockholders, and have an assessment based thereupon. Von Glahn v. Harris, 73 N. C. 323.

The fifth ground of demurrer should be sustained. The complaint should be so amended that the defendants will be advised in respect to the time when the several defendants became stockholders, if the list attached to the complaint does not do so, and the dates when the debts were contracted.

The sixth ground of demurrer cannot be sustained. The act of 1897 expressly fixes the liability, unless, for the reasons herein-after stated, the name of the defendants comes within the provisions of the statute. The sixth ground is based upon the theory that no action against the stockholders can be maintained until the assets are "completely exhausted." This cannot be sustained. Whenever it appears that the assets will be insufficient, we see no reason why the receiver may not proceed to enforce the liability. The extent of it cannot be absolutely fixed until the status of the assets and debts has been ascertained.

The seventh ground of demurrer presents the question, for the first time in this court, whether, under the power reserved by article 8, § 1, of the Constitution, to amend or repeal charters, the stockholder can be made individually liable for the debts of a corporation by an amendment to the charter, or a general statute passed subsequent to the charter and subscription to the stock. This is a question of very great importance to the holders of stock in banking and other business corporations in this state. The facts stated in the complaint in respect to the status of the defendant stockholders and date of the contraction of the debts are so meager that we prefer to decide the question only to the extent clearly presented. While the Legislature has not seen fit to attach such personal liability to stockholders in other than banking corporations, the power conferred by the Constitution is not confined to them. It is well settled that statutes attaching such liability are in derogation of the common law, and should be strictly construed. 10 Cyc. 665, citing Gray v. Coffin, 9 Cush. 192; Brunswick Ter. Co. v. Bank, 192 U. S. 396, 24 Sup. Ct. 314, 48 L. Ed. —. We hold that the statute should not be so construed as to fix such liability upon stockholders for debts or contract, contracted or made prior to the amendment to the charter or the statute. The subscription of stockholders constitutes the contract, and the extent of the liability as to debts already incurred is fixed by the terms of the charter as they then exist. Any change in the charter in this respect must be construed to operate prospectively only. It is well settled that such liability as the stockholder assumes is contractual. Whitman v. Oxford Bank, 176 U. S. 559, 20 Sup. Ct. 477, 44 L. Ed. 587. Thus construed, we find no constitutional objection to the act of 1897.

His honor's ruling upon the demurrer, as modified and limited herein, is affirmed.

HILL v. GEORGIA STATE BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 10, 1904.)

TAXATION—COLLECTION—TRANSFER OF EXECUTION—APPEAL—CROSS-BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. An execution issued by a tax collector for state and county taxes cannot be lawfully transferred by the tax collector in a county having a population of less than 75,000.

2. When a cross-bill of exceptions presents a question which is controlling upon the case as a whole, the Supreme Court will first consider and dispose of that question; and, if the judgment of the trial court with respect thereto is reversed, the main bill of exceptions will be dismissed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action by the Georgia State Building & Loan Association against H. D. Hill. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Judgment on cross-bill of exceptions reversed. Writ of error on main bill of exceptions dismissed.

Denny & Harris, for plaintiff in error. Seaborn & Barry Wright, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Prior to 1872 there was no law authorizing any officer to transfer a tax execution. Smith v. Mason, 48 Ga. 177; State v. Wingfield, 59 Ga. 202. In that year an act was passed which authorized "the officer whose duty it is to enforce" such an execution to transfer it to the party paying the same, and giving such transferee all the rights as to enforcing the execution and priority of payment as might have been exercised before the transfer. This act, with its various amendments, is now embraced in Pol. Code 1895, § 888. Upon what officer is imposed the duty of enforcing a tax execution? Is it upon the officer who issues the execution, or upon the officer who levies it? Executions are enforced by levy, and it would seem that the officer upon whom the duty devolved of enforcing an execution would be the officer who is authorized and required to levy the same. As a general rule, the tax collector has no authority to levy a tax execution. The exception is in counties which contain a population of 75,000 or more. Pol. Code 1895, § 958. Therefore, except in those counties, the authority to transfer a tax execution rests, not with the tax collector, but with the sheriff or other officer who may be authorized by law to levy the same. In 1879, in the case of Johnson v. Christie, 64 Ga. 117, it was held by two justices that the Comptroller General had no authority to transfer a tax execution issued by him against wild land. In 1890, in Scott v. Stewart, 84 Ga. 772, 11 S. E. 897, the decision in John- son v. Christie was declared to be unsound by two of the justices, but was nevertheless followed in a decision concurred in by the three justices, upon the ground that the decision had been made nearly 11 years before; the bench, the bar, and the people had acted upon it during all that time; property rights had been acquired; and it was not deemed wise to overrule the decision, and bring about the confusion and litigation incident to a change in the decision. The later decision was followed in Horn v. Johnson, 87 Ga. 448, 13 S. E. 633. These decisions are controlling in principle where the right of the tax collector to transfer a tax execution is involved. We have not been able to find any direct ruling by this court to the effect that a tax collector cannot transfer a tax execution, but this seems to have been tacitly recognized as the law since the ruling was made that the Comptroller General did not have this authority. See, in this connection, Freeman v. Holcombe, 67 Ga. 337; Fuller v. Dowdell, 85 Ga. 463, 11 S. E. 773; Willson v. Herrington, 86 Ga. 777, 13 S. E. 129; Blalock v. Buchanan, 114 Ga. 564, 40 S. E. 717. The prevailing opinion among the bar and the people since the decision in Johnson v. Christie, which was rendered nearly 25 years ago, has been that no officer is authorized to transfer a tax execution except the officer who is clothed with the power to levy it. And even if the reasoning at the beginning of this opinion may not be to every legal mind altogether satisfactory, the reason for allowing the principle of the decision in Johnson v. Christie to now be operative bears upon us at this time with greater force than it did upon the court as constituted in 1890, when the decision in Scott v. Stewart was rendered. In the case now before us—an action for the recovery of land—the evidence demanded a finding in favor of the plaintiff on the question of title, unless the defendant had succeeded in establishing a title derived through a tax sale. The validity of the tax sale depended upon the question of whether a tax execution could be lawfully transferred by the tax collector of Floyd county—a county having a population of less than 75,000. Having reached the conclusion that this cannot be done, the only legal result that could have been reached was a verdict for the plaintiff on the question of title. While the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff on another theory of the case, and the defendant complains that the court erred in so doing, the plaintiff also by cross-bill complains that the court erred in admitting in evidence the sheriff's deed and the tax execution under which the levy was made, upon the ground that the tax execution had been illegally transferred; and in this ruling we think the court erred. The execution and the deed should have been excluded from evidence. As the point thus raised in the cross-bill is controlling upon the case, we have decided the question in the cross-bill first. Monroe v. Lippman, 115 Ga. 164, 41 S. E. 717, and citations. When a case is absolutely controlled by the decision of the assignments of error in the cross-bill, as will be seen from the case just cited, the usual practice has been to dismiss the writ of error on the main bill; the effect of the dismissal being to allow the judgment complained of in that bill to stand affirmed. We see no reason for departing from this practice in the present case.

All of the assignments of error except one refer to matters which are entirely immaterial, under the view we have taken of the case. In the one assignment of error just referred to, the defendant complains that the court, after having directed the jury to find in favor of the plaintiff on the question of title and mesne profits at the lowest proved amount, instructed them to find, in addition, that the defendant be subrogated to the rights of the transferee under the tax execution; the complaint being that there were no pleadings to authorize such a direction, nor were there proper parties before the court. This direction, as is apparent, was in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff is not complaining, and, if the pleadings are not sufficient, and the court did not have before it proper parties to authorize the direction, we would not reverse the judgment for this reason at the instance of the defendant. If this part of the verdict confers upon the defendant no rights, no harm has been done. If it has the effect to confer upon him any rights of which he does not desire to avail himself, he is at liberty to enter upon the records of the court a written renunciation of all rights under the verdict.

Judgment on the cross-bill of exceptions reversed. Writ of error on the main bill of exceptions dismissed. All the Justices concurring.

GRIER v. NORTH & SOUTH MACON ST. RY. CO.

TROVER—NONSUIT—EVIDENCE OF TITLE.

1. This being an action of trover, and the evidence introduced in behalf of the plaintiff showing that title to the property sued for was not in the plaintiff at the time the suit was filed, there was no error in granting a nonsuit, or in refusing to strike the defendant's answer, which set forth substantially the facts disclosed by the evidence for the plaintiff.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by Clark Grier against the North & South Macon Street Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error.

This was an action of trover to recover 30 electric railway poles. In 1901 Sparks, the president of the defendant company, wrote to plaintiff a letter, stating that: "You can ship me 125 poles at the prices named in your favor of the 25th. I want black cypress. Get me good ones." What these prices were does not distinctly appear. 125 poles were shipped by plaintiff to defendant in compliance with this order. On March 4, 1902, Sparks wrote plaintiff, inclosing a check for $100, and stating that he would use as many of the poles as possible, and the balance of the purchase price would be sent later. The defendant afterwards declined to pay for 30 of the poles on the ground that they were not of the character ordered. The present action is brought to recover these poles. On September 20th plaintiff wrote to Sparks inquiring as to the number of poles used, and asking for a statement, and for payment of any balance which might be due him. Sparks answered this letter, stating that there was no balance due plaintiff. On November 27th Sparks wrote plaintiff, inclosing a statement showing a balance in favor of plaintiff of $19.25, a check for which amount was inclosed. This statement charged plaintiff with the $100 previously paid; freight, $33; "30 poles condemned at $1.50, $45"; draft inclosed, $19.25. Nothing further was done by plaintiff until in December, 1902, when he employed counsel to recover the 30 poles for which the defendant had not paid him. His counsel wrote to Sparks, making demand on him for the 30 poles. Sparks replied to this letter, stating that he could not return the poles because he had used them for fence posts, and that he was willing to pay whatever they were worth for that purpose. On the trial the plaintiff testified that the 125 poles were shipped defendant "on approval." The court overruled a demurrer to defendant's answer, and granted a nonsuit. To both of these judgments the plaintiff excepted.

Akerman & Akerman, for plaintiff in error. W. C. Nottingham and Bacon, Miller & Brunson, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). The theory of the plaintiff's case was that the contract between the parties was one of bailment; that the 125 poles were shipped to the defendant under an understanding that it was to accept such as were satisfactory, and reject those which were unsuited to the purpose for which they were ordered; that those rejected remained the property of the plaintiff, no title having passed until after acceptance; and that, the 30 poles having been rejected, defendant never acquired title to them, and its use of them for fence posts was a conversion. The defendant's theory was that the contract was a sale with a warranty of fitness, that title passed to all of the poles, and that there had been a breach of the warranty as to 30 of the poles. If the defendant's theory was correct, it had a perfect right to keep all of the poles, notwithstanding there might have been a breach of the warranty as to some of them, and claim a deduction from the purchase price for whatever amount was represented by the difference in value between the poles as contracted for and as actually furnished. See Cook v. Finch, 117 Ga. 541, 44 S. E. 95. When the evidence is taken as a whole, this seems to be the truth of the case. The plaintiff testified that the poles were shipped to the defendant "on approval," and the correspondence seems to indicate an ordinary sale with a warranty as to fitness. If there is any conflict between the oral testimony and the correspondence, the latter ought to control. Taking this correspondence in its entirety, we think the trial judge reached the right conclusion, and that there was no error in granting a nonsuit or in refusing to strike the defendant's answer, which set forth substantially the facts as they appeared in evidence.

NEW TRIAL—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

1. The general rule is that, in order for the exclusion of oral evidence to be considered as a ground for a new trial, it must appear that a pertinent question was asked, that the court refused to allow the answer, and that a statement was made to the court at the time showing what the answer would be, and that such testimony was material and would have benefited the complaining party. Griffin v. Henderson, 43 S. E. 712, 117 Ga. 382, and citations. In view of this rule, neither of the grounds of the amended motion for a new trial properly presents any question for determination.

Error from Superior Court, Warren County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by W. M. Hawes against Austin Dotson. Judgment of justice court for plaintiff. From an order dismissing the petition for certiorari, defendant brings error. Reversed.

L. D. McGregor and S. H. Sibley, for plaintiff in error. Wm. M. Hawes, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. The plaintiff in error excepts to the dismissal by the superior court of his petition for certiorari from the judgment of a justice of the peace. It appears from the record that the sole ground for dismissing the petition was that it sought to review questions of both law and fact, and that therefore certiorari was not available as a remedy. Our consideration of the case will therefore not include a decision of the points sought to be raised by the petition, for they have not yet been passed upon by the lower court; but will be confined to a determination of whether, under the petition, disputed issues of fact were brought up for review.

The case in the justice's court arose on an affidavit of illegality filed to arrest the foreclosure of a bill of sale. The defendant in that court was the plaintiff in certiorari, and is the plaintiff in error in this court. In his petition for certiorari he recites the introduction by the plaintiff in fi. fa. of numerous documents to which objection was made for alleged defects apparent on the face of the record, and upon the admission of which in evidence he assigns error. He also recites the introduction of certain documentary evidence in his own behalf, and the rulings of the magistrate as to the probative value thereof, to which he likewise excepted. We are unable to find anything in the petition for certiorari which raises what could properly be termed a disputed issue of fact. The nearest approach to such an issue is the point made as to the effect of certain of the papers introduced in evidence, and, as nothing more than a construction of those papers is involved, it cannot be said that an issue of fact is raised. The case falls squarely within the test prescribed by Mr. Justice Cobb in Toole v. Edmondson, 104 Ga. 784, 31 S. E. 29, to determine whether a case involves a question of law or one of fact: "If, upon considering the entire evidence, whether it be derived from an agreed statement of facts, oral testimony, documents, or other source, it would be proper, if the case were on trial in the superior court, for the judge to direct a verdict, a question of law only would be involved." Such a case is presented by the present record, and it was therefore error for the court below to dismiss the petition for certiorari.

SHARP v. JONES.

APPEAL—REVIEW—NEW TRIAL.

1. The sole issue was the location of a line between coterminous landowners deriving title from a common grantor. There was evidence tending to support the contentions of both parties. The verdict was approved by the trial judge, and, as no error of law is complained of, the judgment overruling the motion for new trial is affirmed.

FROST v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

GAMING—EVIDENCE.

1. The defendant was indicted for the offense of playing and betting at cards. The evidence disclosed that in a certain house one of the persons named in the indictment was lying on the floor, supported on his elbows, with his head from under the bed, shuffling a deck of cards. The others were arranged around in a circle, in the center of which was 30 or 40 cents in nickels. The defendant was included among those who were in the circle, and was on his knees. This was the tableau which met the gaze of the police officer and another person who was with him, when, without warning, they entered the house. The jury could infer from this evidence the defendant's guilt, and their finding, approved by the trial judge, will not be disturbed.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. CLARIDAY.

NEW TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—ISSUES.

1. Where, on the trial of an action for damages for personal injuries, counsel for the plaintiff announced to the court and jury that he claimed nothing for permanent injuries, a charge of the court, which, fairly construed, authorized a recovery for permanent injuries, was erroneous, and, when the verdict for the plaintiff was, under the evidence, extremely liberal, cause for a new trial.

Action by Henry Clariday against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Shumate & Maddox and Harkins & Dodd, for plaintiff in error. W. R. Rankin, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. Clariday sued the Southern Railway Company for damages for personal injuries. There was a verdict for the plaintiff. To the overruling of its motion for a new trial the defendant excepted. On the trial plaintiff's counsel announced to the court and jury that the plaintiff claimed nothing for permanent injuries. The court instructed the jury as follows: "In the event you should find that he [the plaintiff] has not entirely recovered, and is still unable to do as much manual labor as he would had he not been injured, you would allow him something for that, from now up to the time he would entirely recover, and would get the present value of that at seven per cent." Error is assigned upon this charge in the motion for a new trial, one of the grounds of alleged error being that it in effect authorized a recovery of damages for permanent injuries in the face of the fact that plaintiff's counsel had announced to the court and jury that none were claimed. We think the point well taken. While the words "permanent injuries" were not in the charge excepted to, the language used plainly authorized a recovery for the plaintiff's diminished physical capacity to work from the time of the trial to some indefinite period in the future when he might entirely recover. Such a recovery would certainly be for future disability to labor, and might possibly cover permanent disability. The amount of the verdict was extremely liberal, and the error in the charge requires the grant of a new trial.

KNOWLES et ux. v. STEGALL.

TROVER—FORECLOSURE OF LANDLORD'S LIEN—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where a tenant brought trover for a portion of a crop made by him and levied on under execution against him in favor of his landlord, issued upon proceedings to foreclose a landlord's lien for supplies furnished to make the crop, which, after the levy, was sold at private sale by the landlord, it was erroneous to give in charge to the jury an instruction which could be fairly construed to mean that the failure of the tenant to file a counter affidavit in the foreclosure proceedings would prevent a recovery by him in the trover suit.

Action by James Knowles and wife against J. P. Stegall. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

J. B. Conyers, for plaintiffs in error. G. H. Aubrey and T. O. Milner, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. Knowles and wife brought trover against Stegall for certain corn. There was a verdict for defendant. Plaintiffs moved for a new trial, which was refused, and they excepted.

On the trial it appeared that the corn had been levied on under an execution issued upon proceedings, brought by Stegall against Knowles, to foreclose a lien which the former claimed, as landlord, for supplies furnished to the latter, as his tenant, to make the crop of which the corn was a part. After the levy, Stegall sold the corn at private sale, and the case turned largely upon his right to so dispose of it. He contended that he had express authority from Knowles to do so. Knowles denied this, and he and his wife contended that the corn was not subject to the execution. In the motion for a new trial, complaint was made, in general terms, of several excerpts from the charge of the court to the jury. These instructions, with one exception, we think, state correct abstract principles of law; so they require no further consideration. Anderson v. Southern Railway Co., 107 Ga. 500, 33 S. E. 644. The court charged the jury as follows: "I charge you further that where a lien fi. fa., such as the one in evidence here, is levied upon property of the defendant in fi. fa., that a counter affidavit is the proper remedy for the defendant. You look to the evidence and see if any counter affidavit was filed by the defendant in this case." While the assignment of error upon this charge was general, we think it meritorious, as the charge was not a correct or accurate statement of the law, and an examination of the record discloses that the complaining parties were injured thereby. Anderson v. Southern Railway Co., supra. The jury might well have understood from this charge that the only proper remedy Knowles had, when his crop was levied on, was to file a counter affidavit, and, if he had failed to do this, he and his wife could not recover in trover, though the corn sued for had been illegally seized under the execution, and subsequently sold by Stegall without authority. It did not appear that a counter affidavit had been filed. A new trial should have been granted.

BLACKSTOCK v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)

NUISANCE—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the erection and maintenance of a nuisance by the defendant, it is not erroneous to refuse to allow the plaintiff to amend his petition by striking therefrom the allegation as to the erection of the nuisance, and by alleging that prior to the time the damages sued for are alleged to have accrued he gave notice to the defendant of the existence of the nuisance, and requested an abatement of the same, and that the defendant failed to comply with such request.

2. Where, in such an action, the defendant denies the allegations as to the erection and maintenance of the nuisance, and the evidence for the plaintiff fails to show that the nuisance was erected by the defendant, a nonsuit is proper.

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by J. R. Blackstock against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

H. H. Dean, for plaintiff in error. John J. Strickland, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. The plaintiff brought his action for damages against the Southern Railway Company. The petition alleges that the track of the defendant company runs through and over the lands of the plaintiff and over Mud creek on such lands; "that the culvert or opening constructed by said Southern Railway Company over said Mud creek" where the creek "runs over said road of said defendant company is too small to allow the free passage of water in times of rain, and is improperly constructed, and has been allowed by the Southern Railway Company to remain partially filled with mud, sand, and debris, and for the past four years has backed the water of said Mud creek over and upon petitioner's land, and caused said land to sour, and become unfit for cultivation"; that "some twenty-five or thirty acres of said land has been injured by the backwater from said embankment of said Southern Railway Company; and by reason of the defective culvert, and by reason of said culvert being too small to allow the free passage of water, and by reason of said culvert being allowed to fill up with said mud, sand, and debris," he has been unable to make his usual crop on the land, and the land has been too wet for cultivation; and that he has, in consequence thereof, been damaged in a stated amount. The trial resulted in a nonsuit. In the bill of exceptions error is assigned upon the grant of the nonsuit, and also upon the refusal of the court, pending the argument upon the motion for a nonsuit, to allow the plaintiff to amend his petition by striking therefrom the allegation as to the construction of the culvert by the defendant company, and the further refusal to allow him to amend the petition by alleging that he gave notice to the defendant company, before suit was brought, for some six or eight years continuously, of the existence of the nuisance, and requested the abatement of the same. Another assignment of error is that the court erred in overruling the plaintiff's motion to rule out certain testimony of one of his witnesses, brought out on cross-examination, tending to show that at the time the culvert was constructed a different railroad company was operating the road.

1. It is very clear that the cause of action set forth in the petition was the erection of a nuisance by the defendant company, from which the plaintiff suffered damage. In setting forth such a cause of action it was not necessary to allege notice to the defendant company to abate the nuisance. Consequently, if the purpose of the proposed amendments was not to change the action from one for the erection and maintenance of a nuisance to one for continuing a nuisance erected by another, after notice to abate the same, the disallowance of the amendments worked no injury to the plaintiff. But if, as it appears to us was evidently the case, the purpose of the amendments was to so change the action, the court very properly refused to allow them. That this was the purpose of these offered amendments appears clear from the fact that one of them proposed to strike the allegation as to the erection of the nuisance by the defendant, and the other to lay the foundation for an action for continuing the nuisance after notice to abate it. Such being the apparent purpose of the amendments, if they had been allowed a new cause of action would have been set up. Where a person has purchased land upon which a nuisance, erected by a former owner, exists, no cause of action in favor of one injured by the nuisance arises against such alienee until he has received and disregarded a notice to abate it. Although the courts are not harmonious in holding that notice to abate is necessary in order to lay the foundation for an action against the alienee of the erector of a nuisance for a continuance of the same, there is an abundance of authority to this effect, following Penruddock's Case, 5 Coke, 100, 101. So far as this state is concerned, our Civil Code of 1895 is conclusive of the matter. Section 8862 provides: "The alienee of a person owning the property injured may sue for a continuance of the nuisance; so the alienee of the property causing the nuisance is responsible for a continuance of the same. In the latter case there must be a request to abate, before action is brought." If, before an action can be brought against the alienee of the property causing the nuisance, there must be a request to abate the nuisance, then it is evident that no cause of action arises against such alienee until such request is made. The cause of action against him is continuing a nuisance after having been notified of its existence and requested to abate it. The remarks of Mr. Justice Cobb in Southern Railway Company v. Cook, 106 Ga. 453, 32 S. E. 585, are very appropriate here, as showing the difference between the cause of action set forth in the original petition in the present case and the cause of action which would have been set forth if the amendments had been allowed. He said: "One who erects a nuisance and also maintains the same is liable to any one who is injured thereby, and no notice of the harmful effects resulting from the nuisance or request to abate the same is necessary to maintain an action against such person. If, however, a person come into possession of property upon which there is an existing nuisance, before an action can be maintained against such person for continuing the nuisance it is essential that there should be a request to abate it before any liability for maintaining the same would arise"—citing Bonner v. Welborn, 7 Ga. 296, 314; W. & A. R. Co. v. Cox, 93 Ga. 561, 20 S. E. 68; Middlebrooks v. Mayne, 96 Ga. 449, 452, 23 S. E. 398. It follows that the ruling of the court in refusing to allow these amendments must be sustained.

2. As the plaintiff's cause of action was for damages alleged to have been sustained by him in consequence of the erection and maintenance of a nuisance by the defendant, he could not recover without showing that the nuisance was erected by the defendant, unless the defendant admitted this. The defendant expressly denied the whole of the paragraph of the petition wherein the erection and maintenance of the nuisance was alleged. This put the burden upon the plaintiff of proving his allegation that the nuisance was erected by the defendant. He failed to carry this burden, for, at most, his evidence merely showed that the nuisance was on the right of way of the defendant company. A nuisance caused by the improper construction of a railroad over a creek, whereby the waters of the creek are backed over the land of the plaintiff, may well exist on the right of way of a particular railroad company, without showing that such railroad company erected the nuisance. The railroad company may have acquired the road after its construction and the erection of the nuisance. Because a railroad company may own and operate a particular railroad, there is no presumption that it built the road, or constructed an old embankment and culvert forming a part of the same. Certainly there can be no such presumption when it expressly denies that it constructed the embankment and the culvert. The plaintiff having alleged that the defendant erected the nuisance, the defendant having denied this allegation, there being no evidence to sustain it, and the evidence showing that whatever damages the plaintiff suffered were caused by the defective construction of the culvert, a verdict for the plaintiff, if rendered, would have been without evidence to support it. Consequently the grant of a nonsuit was eminently proper. As will have been seen, we have reached this conclusion without considering the testimony tending to show that the nuisance was erected by a predecessor of the defendant company. So it matters not whether this testimony was rightly or wrongly admitted by the court.

GEORGIA SOUTHERN & F. RY. CO. v. PEARSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 10, 1904.)

VENUE—ACTION AGAINST RAILROAD COMPANY—EJECTION OF PASSENGER.

1. An action against a railway company for a tort may be brought in the county of the residence of the company, when it has no agent in the county where the cause of action arose.

2. Where a passenger purchased a ticket for his transportation over several connecting railroads, and, after using the same for his passage over the initial road, was ejected from a train on a connecting road because of the failure of the agent of the company from which he purchased the ticket to properly stamp the same, his alleged cause of action against the company that sold him the ticket, for such wrongful ejection, originated in the county where the ejection occurred, and not in the one where the ticket was purchased.

Error from City Court of Macon; Robert Hodges, Judge.

Action by B. H. Pearson against the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hall & Wimberly and E. O. Jordan, for plaintiff in error. Ross & Grace and R. L. Anderson, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. B. H. Pearson sued the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company in the city court of Macon. The allegations of his petition, so far as material to the question presented for our decision, were as follows: The defendant "is a corporation operating its business in the state of Georgia, and having its principal office and residence in said county of Bibb." On May 24, 1902, plaintiff purchased a ticket from the agent of the defendant at Cordele, Ga., for transportation from that point to Charleston, S. C., and return, via the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway, the Georgia Railroad, and the Southern Railway. He used the ticket to Macon, and there boarded a train on the Georgia Railroad for Augusta; and, when he tendered his ticket to the conductor on that train, it was refused because the selling agent of the defendant at Cordele had failed to properly stamp it. At Milledgeville he was ejected from the train of the Georgia Railroad Company, and had to purchase a ticket to Augusta, and at Augusta had to purchase one to Charleston, and at Charleston had to purchase one back to Cordele. He paid out for such tickets $3.97. He was ejected from the Georgia Railroad train because of the negligence of the defendant's agent at Cordele in failing to properly stamp his ticket. The ejection caused him great mortification and humiliation, and by reason thereof, and the additional expense to which he was put, he was injured and damaged in the sum of $1,000. It was further alleged "that defendant company has no agent in the county of Baldwin, where said cause of action originated." The petition was demurred to upon three grounds, the first of which was met by an appropriate amendment. The second was: "This defendant demurs generally to said petition because there are two separate and distinct actions therein contained—one action for breach of contract, and the other an action for damages in tort." The third ground of demurrer was that the petition "shows on its face that the county of Bibb, in which said suit is instituted, has not jurisdiction of the cause of action set out in said petition, as neither the contract was made in the county of Bibb, nor was the plaintiff ejected from the train in the county of Bibb, or ejected in any county through which the line of this defendant's road extends." The demurrer was overruled, and the case is here upon a bill of exceptions sued out by the defendant company assigning error upon such ruling.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error, both in their brief and in oral argument, stated that the second ground of demurrer was not relied on, but was abandoned. The sole question for our decision, therefore, is one of jurisdiction; that is, whether the suit could be properly brought in the county of Bibb. The action was not for a breach of contract, but was for a tort by breach of duty. In the language of Chief Justice Bleckley in Head v. Georgia Pacific Railway Co., 79 Ga. 360, 7 S. E. 218, 11 Am. St. Rep. 434: "It was an action upon the case for a wrong, not an action of assumpsit for a breach of the contract. It went upon the theory that the contract established the relation of carrier and passenger—a relation attended with a duty from the former to the latter—and that the duty was wrongfully violated. Where the plaintiff has a contract with the defendant which generates a relation attended with a public duty, he has his option to bring assumpsit for breach of the contract, or case for breach of the duty. Here the plaintiff brought a proper action; the contract being set out merely as inducement, with a view to raise the relation; the stress of the action being put upon his expulsion from the train, which, if wrongful, was not only a breach of the contract, but a violation of a public duty by a common carrier." In such a case, as was there held, "punitive as well as actual damages are recoverable if the circumstances of the particular case warrant such recovery." To the same effect, see City & Suburban Railway v. Brauss, 70 Ga. 368; Central Railroad Co. v. Pickett, 87 Ga. 784, 13 S. E. 750; Seals v. Augusta Southern R. Co., 102 Ga. 817, 29 S. E. 116. Indeed, counsel for plaintiff in error admitted, both in their brief and their oral argument, that the action was not on contract, but was for an alleged tort. Civ. Code 1895, § 2334, requires that "all railroad companies shall be sued in the county in which the cause of action originated, by any one whose person or property has been injured by such railroad company, * * * for the purpose of recovering damages for such injuries. * * * But if the cause of action arises in a county where the railroad company liable to suit has no agent, then the suit may be brought in the county of the residence of such company." What was the cause of action in the present case? It was the breach of the public duty which the defendant company owed to the plaintiff under the relation of carrier and passenger between them established by the contract. This cause of action must have originated where the breach of duty occurred. In our opinion, this was in Baldwin county. Whatever may be the law in other jurisdictions, in this state a railroad company which sells and issues to a passenger a ticket for his transportation over its own line of road and over the lines of other railroad companies is liable for his safe and sure transportation to the point of destination. Central Railroad v. Combs, 70 Ga. 533, 48 Am. Rep. 582. This is also the rule which obtains in England. Great Western Ry. Co. v. Blake, 7 H. & N. 987; Buxton v. Northeastern Ry. Co., L. R. 3 Q. B. 549. But in the great majority of the states of the Union the railroad company issuing such a through ticket is liable to the passenger for his safe transportation only as to its own lines of road. 2 Woods, Ry. Law, 1418, and cases cited in note. The law of Georgia being as above stated, when the defendant company sold and issued to the plaintiff a ticket for his transportation from Cordele, Ga., to Charleston, S. O., and back, it undertook, for the consideration which it had received, to safely transport him over its own and the connecting lines of railroad specified in the ticket from Cordele to Charleston and return; and the public duty which it thus assumed was never violated until the plaintiff was wrongfully ejected from the train of the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company, in the county of Baldwin, and it was then as much violated by the defendant company as it would have been if the ejection of the passenger had occurred on its own line of road. When, in the county of Dooly, it failed to stamp the ticket which it sold to the plaintiff, it violated no public duty which it owed him, for it was as much bound to transport him from Cordele to Charleston and return after it had given him an unstamped ticket, as a token of the contract into which it had entered with him, as it would have been if the ticket which it had issued to him had been properly stamped. Its public duty, relatively to the plaintiff, was to transport him in accordance with the contract, and, so long as it met and discharged this duty, no tort was committed. Suppose the plaintiff had purchased from the defendant company, at Cordele, in the county of Dooly, a ticket for his passage, over its own line of road alone, from that point to the city of Macon, in the county of Bibb, which ticket the selling agent of the defendant had failed to properly stamp, and in consequence of such failure a conductor in charge of the defendant's passenger train had ejected the plaintiff therefrom in the county of Houston; would his cause of action for the tort in such a case have originated in the county of Dooly, where he purchased the ticket and the failure of the defendant to properly stamp it occurred, or in the county of Houston, where he was ejected from the train? It seems to us to be very clear that it would have originated in the latter county, because in that county, and in that county alone, the violation of the public duty which it assumed when it sold him the ticket would have occurred. What difference can it make whether the ejection was from a train on the defendant's own road, or from a train on the connecting road of another company, if the duty of the defendant, under the contract, to safely transport the passenger to his destination, applied as much to the one road as to the other? None that we can see. In either case the cause of action for the tort growing out of the breach of the public duty to transport the passenger in accordance with the contract arises in the county where the tort is committed, and no tort is committed until such breach of duty occurs. The cause of action in the present case originated when and where the tort upon which the action was founded was committed, and this was when the plaintiff was ejected from the train on the Georgia Railroad, and in Baldwin county. This being the county in which the cause of action originated, and the defendant company having no agent therein, the suit was properly brought in Bibb county, in which its principal office and residence were alleged to be located.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error recognize that if the case of Central Railroad v. Combs, supra, does establish the principle that a railroad company selling a through ticket, over its own and connecting lines of railroad is liable for the safe and secure transportation of the passenger to his destination, it stands in the way of their contention as to the want of jurisdiction of the city court of Macon in the present case. Accordingly they ask that if that case "is regarded as having decided that a railway company is liable for the safe and sure passage of a person over connecting lines, to whom it sells a ticket," it shall be "overruled or modified." As above indicated, we do not see how this decision can be otherwise regarded, and it seems to have been uniformly so construed by courts and text-writers who have had occasion to mention or cite it. The effect of the request of counsel is that that case shall be reviewed and overruled. There is no request to review the case of Hawley v. Screven, 62 Ga. 347, 35 Am. Rep. 126, which established in this state the principle followed in that case, and, in our opinion, it would be useless to review the case in question without reviewing the older case, which, in principle, it followed. In Hawley v. Screven it was held that "a passenger who purchased a through ticket from Savannah, Georgia, to Jacksonville, Florida, of the agent of [one railroad company], and had his trunk checked accordingly, could recover of such [company] for its loss, although it showed that there were three connecting roads between the two places mentioned, that it was the first, and that it had safely delivered the trunk to the second." In Wolff v. Central Railroad Com- pany, 68 Ga. 653, 45 Am. Rep. 501, it was held: "Where a passenger with a through ticket over a connecting line of railroads checks his baggage at the starting point through to his destination, and, upon arriving, it has been damaged or has been broken open and robbed, he may sue the road which issued the check, or he may sue the road delivering the baggage in bad order." In that case the suit was against the railroad company delivering the baggage at its destination. In the opinion in the case which we are asked to review, Judge Blandford, referring to these two cases, said: "It may be very safely assumed from these decisions that the law of this state is that, when a railroad company issues and sells a ticket over its own lines of road and over the lines of other roads to a point designated, such company is liable to the passenger thus purchasing such ticket, who checks his baggage through on the line indicated in the ticket, for the safe and secure carriage and transportation of such baggage. And if the railroad company should be liable for the safe and secure transportation of the baggage of a passenger; which is but a convenience and incident of the passenger, it cannot be very readily perceived why such company should not be liable for the safe and secure carriage and transportation of the passenger himself." It seems to us that this is sound reasoning, and that, so long as these decisions in the Baggage Cases stand, the liability of a railroad company to a passenger, to whom it sells a through ticket over its own and connecting lines of road, for his safe transportation to his destination, logically follows. This is the view taken and forcibly presented by Wood in his valuable work on Railway Law. He says: "In some of the states, with an inconsistency which is certainly remarkable, it is held that the first carrier, selling a through ticket, is not liable for an injury to a passenger upon a connecting line, but it is liable for the loss of his baggage by a connecting line. This doctrine necessarily supposes that two contracts are made—one relating to the passenger's transportation, and another relative to his baggage—when in fact but one contract is entered into, which is entire and indivisible. The ticket issued to a passenger is evidence that he has paid for being carried between the termini named therein, and the check given for his baggage is merely evidence that his baggage has been received by the company, to be carried in the usual way to the point designated upon the check. But the real contract between the parties rests wholly in parol, except so far as it may be set forth upon the face of the ticket, and the real intention of the parties is to be determined by reference to the subject-matter of the contract. * * * Indeed, in the absence of any statute, the company is not, at the common law, bound to carry any baggage, except mere personal luggage, and may make any reasonable regulations relative thereto that it chooses to make; and it seems to us that there is no foundation whatever for the distinction that is made in the case last cited [a Tennessee case] between the liability of the carrier for the safety of the passenger, and the safe delivery of his baggage. The duty and the liability spring out of the same contract, and an inference of a limited liability as to one, and an absolute liability as to the other, cannot be drawn therefrom; and we believe that the reasoning of the court in this case will fail to commend it to the courts as expressing a sound, just, or reasonable doctrine." 2 Wood's Ry. Law, § 359, pp. 1419-1422.

It is contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that "the duty of the carrier was to have given Pearson a ticket according to his contract, which would have been good for passage from Cordele to Charleston and return, and, as it did not do so, there was a violation of the carrier's duty, which occurred in the county of Dooly—a tort growing out of a contract—and, while the tort may not have been completed until Pearson reached the county of Baldwin, on the line of a connecting road, yet the courts of Dooly alone have jurisdiction of this case." This might be a sound argument if the tort growing out of the violation of the carrier's duty consisted in the failure to stamp the ticket which the defendant company sold to the plaintiff, but as the duty of the defendant company, under the contract which it made with the plaintiff, was to safely transport him from Cordele to Charleston and back, notwithstanding its failure to stamp the ticket, it is obvious that no tort was committed until it violated this duty. It violated this duty in the county of Baldwin, and then and there the plaintiff's cause of action for the tort thus committed arose. The trial court did not err in holding that the suit could be properly brought in Bibb county.

HALL v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

1. Where, in a criminal case, the accused moved for a new trial on the day that he was convicted, and the motion was set for a hearing within 30 days from the date of the trial and before the end of the term, the accused had until the actual hearing of the motion to prepare, have approved, and file a brief of the evidence introduced on the trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Washington Hall was convicted of crime, and brings error. Reversed.

Herman Brasch, for plaintiff in error. Wm. Brunson, Sol. Gen., for the State.

CANDLER, J. At the March term, 1904, of the city court of Macon, Wash Hall was tried and convicted of the offense of carrying concealed weapons. The trial, conviction, and sentence took place on March 7th, and on the same day a motion for a new trial was made. The judge issued a rule nisi calling upon the solicitor to show cause on March 12th why the motion should not be granted. On the day last mentioned the motion came on to be heard, and the solicitor moved that it be dismissed on the ground that no brief of the evidence introduced on the trial had been filed with the motion. Counsel for the accused then asked leave to file a brief of the evidence, which had been agreed to as correct by the solicitor. This was refused, and the motion to dismiss was sustained. It appears from the bill of exceptions and the certificate of the clerk of the trial court that that court did not adjourn for the term until April 9, 1904. To the dismissal of his motion for a new trial the accused excepts.

The ruling complained of was erroneous. The accused had 30 days from March 7th within which to file his motion for a new trial. He filed it on the day of the trial, and on the day set for the hearing of the motion, which was within the 30 days allowed him, he tendered to the court a brief of the evidence which was admitted to be correct. If it was correct, the court should have approved it, and passed on the grounds of the motion. When the motion was filed, the court had the right to set it for a hearing at any time during the term, or he might have set it for a hearing in vacation. In the latter event it would have been necessary for the movant to take an order allowing him to file his brief of the evidence in vacation if for any reason he could not file it in term. But, inasmuch as he had 30 days within which to file his motion, if the term of court at which he was tried should last that long after the trial, we can see no reason why, in view of the fact that the hearing was set for a time within 30 days from the hearing and before the end of the term, he should not have until the hearing to prepare and file his brief of the evidence.

There is nothing in any of the decisions of this court cited on the brief of the solicitor that is contrary to the view herein announced. We do not think that Pen. Code 1895, § 1063, requires the filing of the motion and the brief of evidence together. The motion may be filed on one day, and the brief of evidence, under the approval of the court, on another, provided this is done within 30 days after the conclusion of the trial and before the end of the term. It then becomes the duty of the court to approve the brief, if it is correct, at any time before the actual hearing of the motion.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. MERRITT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)

CARRIERS—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRAIN—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. "A verbal inaccuracy in a charge, resulting from a palpable 'slip of the tongue,' and which clearly could not have misled the jury, is not cause for a new trial."

2. The evidence warranted the verdict, and no reason appears for reversing the judgment refusing to grant a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Gwinnett County; R. B. Russell, Judge.

Action by T. G. Merritt against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

John J. Strickland, N. L. Hutchins, Jr., and D. K. Johnson, for plaintiff in error. H. L. Patterson and N. L. Hutchins, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. The plaintiff alleged that he went upon a train of the defendant company for the purpose of assisting certain female passengers to get upon and obtain seats in the car; that he notified the conductor of his purpose; that immediately after he entered the car, and before the passengers could be seated, the train began to move off, no signal of its departure having been given; that he hastened to the door, and, finding the car moving too rapidly for him to safely alight, went in search of the conductor; that the conductor objected to stopping the train, but finally pulled the bell rope, telling plaintiff to come to the door of the car and prepare to alight; that he got upon a step of the car, the conductor and a negro train hand standing above him; that the conductor ordered him to jump from the car, but he refused to do so on account of the rapid rate of speed at which the train was moving; and that upon his refusal the conductor and train hand violently pushed and shoved him from the car, as a consequence of which he was severely injured. A verdict having been returned in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant made a motion for a new trial, and error is assigned upon a judgment refusing to grant this motion.

The plaintiff in error insists only upon the general grounds of the motion for a new trial, that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, and upon that ground which assigns error upon the following charge: "Then you will ascertain from the evidence, before you can find that the defendant is liable in damages to the plaintiff, either that the railroad was negligent and the plaintiff was not negligent, or that both were negligent, and by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence the defendant could not have avoided the injury, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover." The assignment of error is upon the concluding portion of the charge, which instructs the jury that if both were negligent they could find for the plaintiff, unless it appeared that the defendant could not have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care. The use of the word "defendant" in the charge quoted was so palpably a mere slip of the tongue that, before a new trial would be granted on account of it, it should be made clearly to appear that it was probably prejudicial to the company. An examination of the charge of the judge, which is embodied in the record, shows that, in two places just preceding the extract complained of, the judge clearly and distinctly gave the correct rule upon the subject; stating in one place that the plaintiff could not recover if he could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, if it was negligent; and in another, that, even though the defendant was negligent, the party injured could not recover if he could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence. It is not to be presumed that the jury paid more attention to the incorrect charge than to the others; and if they paid equal attention to all, and understood all, they must have understood that the use of the word "defendant" in the charge complained of was a mere slip of the tongue, and the defendant could not have been prejudiced by the incorrect charge. Hoxie v. State, 114 Ga. 19, 39 S. E. 944 (6), and cit.; Berry v. Clark, 117 Ga. 964, 44 S. E. 824 (2).

There was evidence for the plaintiff which established the material allegations of his petition, and hence there is no merit in the complaint that the verdict is without evidence to support it.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

BOOZER et al. v. NASH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)

WIDOW'S ALLOWANCE—YEAR'S SUPPORT—SALE OF LAND—ACTION TO RECOVER—PARTIES.

1. Land was set apart as a year's support to a widow and her five minor children jointly. She sold the land, not for the support and maintenance of the family, and put the purchaser in possession. After three of the minor children attained their majority, they, and the two minors by next friend, brought an action, in the old form of "complaint for land," against the vendee of the purchaser from the widow, for the recovery of the land and mesne profits. Held, that it was not erroneous to dismiss the action on the ground that the plaintiffs could not recover the land during the life of the widow in an action to which she was not a party.

Error from Superior Court, Gwinnett County; R. B. Russell, Judge.

Action by J. W. Boozer and others against J. B. Nash. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

O. A. Nix and R. W. Peeples, for plaintiffs in error. T. M. Peeples, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. Certain land was set apart to Martha W. Boozer, widow of George W. Boozer, and her five minor children, jointly, as a year's support. Subsequently she sold and conveyed the land to Coggins, and she and the children moved away, and Coggins was put in possession. He, in turn, sold and conveyed to Nash, who paid full value for the same. The sale by the widow was not for the support and maintenance of herself and children, but the evidence in the case does not show that Coggins or Nash had knowledge of this fact. After three of the children had become of age, they, and the two remaining minors by next friend, brought an action against Nash to recover the land and for mesne profits. On the trial of the case the above facts appeared, and that the widow was in life at the time the action was brought. Upon the conclusion of the evidence, the court, on motion of the defendant, dismissed the case, upon the ground that the plaintiffs could not recover the land during the life of the widow, she not being a party to the case, either for herself or as guardian for her minor children. To this ruling the plaintiffs excepted.

Was the dismissal proper? Our opinion is that it was. Where a year's support is set aside to a widow and children jointly, the widow is entitled to use and control it as long as she lives and the property so set apart lasts, even though the children marry or become of age; and the children, in such a case, cannot force a division of the property so set apart. Miller v. Miller, 105 Ga. 305, 31 S. E. 186, and cases cited. The title to land so set apart for a widow and minor children vests in the widow and such children, but the widow has the exclusive control and management of the property. Howard v. Pope, 109 Ga. 259, 34 S. E. 301. In Ferris v. Van Ingen, 110 Ga. 102, 35 S. E. 347, it was held: "Where a year's support has been set aside jointly for a widow and her minor son out of the estate of the deceased husband and father, the widow represents the minor, and the latter cannot file an independent intervention for the purpose of securing the payment of the judgment for the year's support, without showing that the widow has failed or neglected to intervene, or that she is in collusion with other creditors or setting up some other equitable reason." In the opinion in that case Chief Justice Simmons said: "This year's support was set aside jointly to the minor and the widow, and in such a case the widow represents the minor, and has absolute control of the property set apart as the year's support. She can sell or dispose of it without consulting the child, and without any proceeding in any court of law or equity, and without making the child a party in such a proceeding.

She, in effect, becomes trustee for the child for his share in the amount set apart. If he should marry or become of age, he would not be entitled to withdraw from the widow his portion of the year's support." As the widow, under the facts of the present case, had the absolute and exclusive right to control and manage the land in question, it follows that the right of possession was in her, and she was the only party who could sue for its recovery, unless, as was suggested in Ferris v. Van Ingen, supra, she failed or neglected to sue, or was in collusion with the defendant, or there was some other equitable reason set up why the action was not brought by her. The present is not an equitable proceeding of any kind, but is simply an action, in the old statutory form, for the recovery of land and mesne profits. Plaintiffs in error rely upon the case of Vandigrift v. Potts, 72 Ga. 635. The soundness of the ruling there made seems to have been somewhat questioned in Howard v. Pope, supra. The facts in the Vandigrift Case, and the reasoning upon which the decision was based, do not require a reversal of the judgment in the case at bar. In that case the widow, after the year's support was set apart to her and her minor children, married again, and she and her husband sold the land which had been set apart, and with the proceeds of sale bought other land, to which they took title in their own names. The children, after becoming of age, brought suit for their interest in the land so set apart. It was held that the sale by the widow was void. In the opinion Chief Justice Jackson said: "We think the marriage of the mother made a complete change of the relation of the parties and the status of the case. Her eye was no longer single towards the children. Her affections were divided, and in a large measure another's. This court decided that she could sell for herself and her children, to feed and clothe them, when necessary to sell in order to support the household; but here that household is broken up, the mother is married, and another head, a stranger to the children, takes possession; and the home is sold, and another is bought, and title to that is not in the mother and children, but in the new husband and wife. Do not her letters of administration abate if she marry? Here there was no administration, except her administration of this year's support for herself and children; the title, the right to support out of it, being equally in her and in them, and she holding theirs in trust for their support, and, if the income support them and her, for them in fee. Do not her letters, her right to sell this property, abate? We think it would be dangerous to uphold the sale under these circumstances, and so rule." The question made in the case now in hand was not then before the court. The point raised there involved the validity of the sale, while the question in the present case is as to the right of the plaintiffs to bring the action. There the case was made to turn upon the marriage of the widow previous to the sale, and the consequent loss of her right to sell the property set apart as a year's support. But the reasoning in the opinion would seem to lead to the conclusion that she lost her right to control and manage the property by her marriage, for if her power of administration over the property was abated by her marriage, so that she lost her right to sell it even for the support and maintenance of herself and the minor beneficiaries, it would seem to naturally follow that she lost all right to control and manage it, and hence the right of possession would not be in her. It is obvious that this reasoning is not applicable in the present case, the widow not having married again.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. GLASCOCK & WARFIELD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

SECOND TRIAL—SET-OFF—COSTS ON FIRST APPEAL.

1. Where, in an action for damages, a verdict and judgment are rendered against the defendant; the case is brought to this court, where the judgment of the court below is reversed; and on another hearing the plaintiff again obtains a verdict—the defendant is entitled to set off against that verdict no other costs than those paid by him which were actually necessary to bring the case to this court and obtain a reversal of the erroneous judgment rendered at the first trial.

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by Glascock & Warfield against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hall & Wimberly, for plaintiff in error.
T. S. Felder, for defendants in error.

CANDLER, J. Glascock & Warfield obtained a verdict against the Central of Georgia Railway Company for $131. The case was brought to this court by bill of exceptions, and the judgment of the trial court was reversed. 43 S. E. 981. When the remittitur was transmitted to the court below, a fi. fa. for $77.30, accrued costs, was issued in favor of the railroad company against Glascock & Warfield. The case was tried a second time, and the plaintiffs again recovered a verdict. The railroad company then filed a motion to set off against the judgment of the plaintiffs its judgment for the costs which it had paid. Upon the hearing of this motion the court "ordered that the said verdict be credited with the costs paid by the company in carrying said cause to the Supreme Court, and that there be allowed as a set-off to said verdict" the items of cost for transcript of record for the Supreme Court, certificate and seal to same, costs in the Supreme Court, remittitur, judgment, final record of remittitur, and fi. fa.; the total of these items of cost amounting to $48.30. The railroad company contended that it was also entitled to credit against the verdict of the additional items of cost for entering verdict and judgment on the minutes at the first trial, docketing the motion for new trial, entering five orders upon said motion, sheriff's service before the jury, and recording motion and amended motion for new trial upon the docket of final records; these additional items amounting to $17.15. The court refused to set off these items against the verdict, and to this refusal the railroad company excepted.

We find no error in the judgment to which exception is taken. The party finally cast in a suit at common law is liable for the costs in the case. This does not include the actual cost incurred in carrying to the Supreme Court a bill of exceptions by which the reversal of an erroneous judgment is obtained, but it does include all other costs incurred in the progress of the litigation. This case is controlled, in principle, at least, by the decision of this court in McGuire v. Johnson, 25 Ga. 604, where it was held, in effect, that the only costs taxable against the defendant in error in a bill of exceptions to this court, who loses his case here, but finally gains it in the court below, are those costs which are necessary to bringing the case here, and that these do not include "the costs which have accrued in the court below, which the plaintiff in error may pay or not, as he chooses, but which he is not compelled to pay unless he wishes to obtain a supersedeas." Under this decision, the order passed by the court below was clearly correct.

J. B. WATTERS & SON v. RETAIL CLERKS' UNION NO. 479 et al.

LIBEL—WHAT CONSTITUTES—UNFAIR LIST—PLEADING.

1. The publication stated the facts and reasons why the defendants placed the plaintiffs on the "unfair list," and, taken as a whole, cast no imputation upon their character as individuals, or upon their solvency or standing as merchants.

2. The words were not actionable per se, and the petition set out no cause of action; failing, as it did, to allege any special damage, or loss of custom, trade, or profits, or any injury of any sort, to plaintiffs' business.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Action by J. B. Watters & Son against the Retail Clerks' Union No. 479 and others. Defendants demurred to the petition. From an adverse judgment, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

In May, 1903, the Retail Clerks' Union No. 479 and others published a communication in a Rome newspaper to the effect that for several years it had been the custom of the leading merchants of the city to close their various places of business at 6 o'clock p. m. during the hot summer months, believing that it was to the mutual interest of themselves and their clerks, and that both they and their employes deserved the small amount of rest and recreation that this movement enabled them to have. "As usual, this movement was started this spring, and was with one exception agreed to by all the fair-minded and leading merchants; the firm of J. B. Watters & Son alone refusing to sign the agreement, although every means was resorted to to get them to fall into line and make it unanimous. After they had been approached by a committee from the union and refused to enter into the closing movement, they were put on the unfair list by the union. * * * We ask the support of the public generally in the action that has been taken. We believe that the people of Rome are too broad-minded to patronize or indorse any firm in its efforts to hinder a movement that would give a short period of rest during the hot months to many working men and women." Then followed a list of those who had signed the agreement, and with a request that the public should patronize the signers. There were handbills in reference to the same matter, and containing similar requests. The plaintiffs, alleging themselves to be a partnership, one of whose members was dead, but whose interest was represented by his executor, brought an action against the unincorporated unions, and such members thereof as the plaintiffs had been able to learn were associated therewith. They alleged that they had agreed to sign the agreement to close if all merchants in their line did the same; that the publications were false and malicious, and had been made for the purpose of intimidating as well as damaging petitioners' reputation, and exposing them to public hatred or ridicule, and were so understood by those who read the same, to their damage $25,000. The defendants demurred on the grounds that there was a misjoinder of parties, and a misjoinder of causes of action, inasmuch as different publications signed by different individuals or officers were all joined in the same suit; that the executor of the deceased partner could not sue; and on other grounds which are immaterial, inasmuch as the judge of the trial court decided all the points in favor of the plaintiffs, except that ground of the demurrer which alleged that the petition set out no cause of action, because the words were not libelous per se, and not actionable without an averment of special damage. The plaintiffs excepted to this ruling.

Dean & Dean, for plaintiffs in error. McHenry & Maddox, for defendants in error.

LAMAR, J. Where it is necessary to allege special damages in order to set out a cause of action, the particular loss or injury must be distinctly stated; the ad damnum clause, "that the plaintiff had been damaged $25,000," not being the equivalent of such an averment. Pollard v. Lyon, 91 U. S. 225, 23 L. Ed. 308. In view of this well-recognized rule, and the assignment of error on the judge's order, the present case does not raise any question as to defendants' liability for a conspiracy. Brown v. Jacobs Co., 115 Ga. 433, 41 S. E. 553, 57 L. R. A. 547, 90 Am. St. Rep. 128; 3 Joyce on Damages, § 2231. Even after a special demurrer calling attention to the omission, there was no amendment. The petition set out no loss of trade, profits, or customers; no decreased ability to buy or sell; no violence; no intimidation of patrons; no interference with plaintiffs' business; and no injury of any sort, except that general damage alleged to flow from the use of the words claimed to be libelous per se. In fact, the plaintiffs treat this solely as an action for libel, and claim in their brief that "the record presents but two questions for determination: First. Are the publications libelous? Second. Are they actionable per se?" In cases of this sort the publication or conversation must be construed as a whole, and in the sense in which it is evident the language was intended to be used. Under this rule, words ordinarily harmless may from the context convey such a meaning as to give ground for an action. On the other hand, words which are sometimes actionable, when taken in connection with the entire article may be deprived of their usual sting and afford no ground for a recovery. So the word "unfair" may sometimes mean "dishonest," and, when by a colloquium or innuendo shown to have this meaning, might give rise to a cause of action. But it does not necessarily involve so serious a charge. It may convey the idea of "discrimination." It may mean that one is "prejudiced" or "partial." It may mean "il-liberal," "hard," "ungenerous," or "exact-ing." But whatever the sense in which it may on occasions be used, it is perfectly evident that in the present case it imputed nothing involving moral turpitude to the firm, or to the individuals composing it, and cast no imputation upon their credit, solvency, or conduct as merchants. Reading the publication as a whole, there was no suggestion of the use of short weights or measures; no accusation of fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation in the sale or purchase of goods. Nor did it charge anything against the honesty, integrity, solvency, or credit of the partnership. A state of facts was given. The words "unfair" and "unfair list" were coupled with these facts, and amounted to a characterization or statement of what defendants thought of plaintiffs' refusal to become a party to the early closing movement. Any one reading the communication must have seen that the plaintiffs were not charged with overstepping their rights or of doing anything unlawful. It was, in principle, analogous to a somewhat similar publication concerning a merchant who refused to contribute to a fund for keeping the streets sprinkled. People v. Jerome, 1 Mich. 142. A case even more in point was that of Donaghue v. Gaffy, 53 Conn. 43, 2 Atl. 397, where the defendant published that, because he had quit buying from plaintiffs, they privately overbid him, and by "base treachery" secured the property which he had leased, and ordered him immediately to vacate. After stating these facts, the defendant, in the article alleged to be libelous, added: "The firm is not worthy of our support, being guilty of foul and unfair dealings to 'get square,' as they say, with one who exercises the right to trade where he likes; and I request that those who believe in the fair thing as between man and man to give their support to some other house." It was there held (citing Homer v. Englehardt, 117 Mass. 539) that the words were not actionable per se, the whole publication showing that the transaction was perfectly lawful, and that, in the absence of an allegation of some special damage, the court could not legally presume that the plaintiffs were degraded in the estimation of the public, or that they suffered loss of character, profits, or business. See, also, Railroad v. Delaney, 102 Tenn. 289, 52 S. W. 151, 45 L. R. A. 600, where an employé sued for general damages alleged to have resulted from a false publication that he had gone on a strike. The blacklisting cases, like that of White v. Parks, 93 Ga. 633, 20 S. E. 78, cited by the plaintiff in error, do not apply, because there the words were actionable per se, as they tended to lessen the plaintiff's credit; charging, as they did, that he was a delinquent debtor, guilty of dishonest and fraudulent methods. Here the publication was not per se libelous, and no special damages are set out.

The judgment sustaining the demurrer is affirmed. All the Justices concur, except EVANS, J., disqualified.

COX v. STRICKLAND et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 14, 1904.)

PARTIES—JOINT TRESPASSERS—VENUE—LIMITATIONS—NONSUIT—NEW ACTION.

1. While the word "trespass" generally involves the idea of force, yet in its broadest sense it comprehends any misfeasance, transgression, or offense which damages another's person, health, reputation, or property.

2. At common law trespass on the case was the form of action to recover damages for a libel, and persons charged with a joint libel are "joint trespassers" within the meaning of the Constitution, and suable within the county of the residence of any one of such joint "trespassers."

3. The Constitution, in fixing the venue of suits against joint defendants, was intended to be exhaustive, and not to leave a hiatus in which the right to bring a single suit against joint defendants might be lost because of the want of jurisdiction to apply the remedy.

4. Civ. Code 1895, § 3783, in granting the right to renew within six months, forms an exception to the statute of limitations, and has no reference to the subject of venue. The new action may be brought "in any court having jurisdiction thereof in this state." Act 1847, p. 217 (Cobb's Dig. p. 589).

5. While the second suit must be for substantially the same cause of action, it does not have to be a literal copy of that dismissed. It must be by the same plaintiff, or his legal representative, and against all the defendants who were necessary parties to the first suit, or their legal representatives.

6. Where the liability of the defendants is joint and several, with no right of contribution, as in libel, a second action against all of the defendants to the first suit, served upon some of those jointly suable but severally liable, is within the saving provision of Civ. Code 1895, § 3786.

7. The filing of the petition is treated as the commencement of the suit only when followed by due and legal service. If there is no process and no service, and the plaintiff is guilty of laches, the writ becomes abortive, and the court loses jurisdiction to issue process or to have service perfected.

8. But if the plaintiff is active in his efforts to remedy the nonfeasance of officers, and endeavors to have process issue and service made, the jurisdiction of the court continues to cure the defective process, and to have service perfected, even after the first term.

9. A second original process to perfect service on joint defendants residing in another county may issue by way of amendment after the appearance term.

10. Where service is duly made under such order, the same relates to the date of the filing of the petition, which will be treated as the commencement of the suit, even though such service was not perfected until after the expiration of six months from the dismissal of the first suit. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Brooks County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by Horace Cox against J. B. Strickland and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

An action for libel was brought in 1894, in Clinch county, against 110 defendants, some of whom lived in adjoining counties. This suit was dismissed in February, 1898, and renewed in March, 1898, in Brooks county, against all of the defendants, only five of whom were served. The process was directed to the sheriff of Brooks county. The processes attached to the second originals for the defendants residing in Clinch and Lowndes counties were by the clerk also directed to the sheriff of Brooks county. At the May term, 1898, the four nonresident defendants served therewith moved to dismiss for want of legal service. Without any ruling on such motion, the judge at chambers ordered the clerk to amend the process attached to the second originals "by proper direction, and that the same be served in time for the next superior court of Brooks county." The amendment was made, but the second originals were lost. In January, 1899, during the November adjourned term, copies were established, but so changed as to require the defendants in Lowndes and Clinch to appear at the May term, 1899. Four of the nonresidents, defendants in error, were properly served April 2, 1899. 105 of the nonresident defendants were not served. The defendants in error residing in Lowndes and Clinch counties demurred on the grounds that they were not joint trespassers, and therefore not subject to the jurisdiction of Brooks superior court; that, the second original having been improperly directed to the sheriff of Brooks, the court could not cause the same to be amended; that service thereunder was void; that the service actually made, not being within six months from the dismissal of the first suit, the case was barred, although service was made in April, 1899, on a petition brought in March, 1898, in renewal of a suit dismissed in February, 1898; and that as 110 defendants were sued and served in the first suit and only 5 were served in the renewal, the case was not against the same defendants. The judge dismissed the case and Cox excepted.

E. H. Myers and S. W. & J. W. Hitch, for plaintiff in error. W. G. Brantley, W. S. Humphreys, and Denmark & Ashley, for defendants in error.

LAMAR, J. An action for libel was brought in Brooks county against King, a citizen thereof, and other joint defendants, who resided in Clinch and Lowndes counties. These latter insist that the superior court of Brooks county had no jurisdiction under that provision of the Constitution allowing suits to be brought in the county of the residence of either "joint trespasser" (Civ. Code 1895, § 5872). They claim that force is the gist of the action in trespass, and that, as there is no force in libel, they are not joint trespassers. In its last analysis, their contention amounts to the proposition that the Constitution refers only to those actions which at common law were known as trespass vi et armis, trespass quare clausum fregit, and trespass de bonis asportatis, and not to any other action for which trespass on the case might have been brought under the ancient forms of pleading.

Undoubtedly the word "trespass" frequently, even generally, conveys the idea of force. But it also includes in its largest sense any transgression or offense against the law of nature, of society, or of the country in which we live, whether it relates to a man's person or his property. Anderson's Law Dic. a. v. "Trespass." And this definition was involved in the carefully considered opinion by Justice Lumpkin in Johnson v. Bradstreet, 87 Ga. 79, 13 S. E. 250, where it was held that libel was "an injury to the person." In discussing the well-known origin of the "action on the case," Townshend, in his work on Libel and Slander (4th Ed.) 36, says, "Under this class was action for trespass on the case for words—the ancient form of the action." Among remedies at common law, Gould's Pleading, 22, includes "trespass and trespass on the case as actions to recover damages for the wrongful injury to one's person, health, reputation, or property." So that, for some purposes at least, a libel is a trespass. In Lee

v. West, 47 Ga. 313, where two were charged with having enticed the plaintiff's servant, they were treated as joint trespassers within the meaning of the section of the Constitution fixing jurisdiction. Under the Texas statute the defendant was entitled to be sued in the county of his residence, except "when the foundation of the suit was some crime or offense, or trespass for which a civil action in damages may lie, in which case the suit may be brought in the county where the crime or offense or trespass was committed." Rev. St. Tex. 1879, p. 193, art. 1198, subd. 8. An indirect injury was caused by the boisterous language and conduct of a defendant in the presence of a female. The court held that he might be sued out of the county of his residence, the section relating "not only to actions of trespass proper, as known to the common law, but also to actions of trespass on the case." Hill v. Kimball, 76 Tex. 210, 13 S. W. 59, 7 L. R. A. 618. In San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Graves (Tex. Civ. App.) 49 S. W. 1103, in a suit against two defendants, the court held that an action may be brought against several joint tortfeasors in the county of the residence of either, treating the word "trespass" as equivalent to "tort," and "joint trespassers" as equivalent to "joint tortfeasors." Under the New Jersey statute (Laws 1855, p. 340) it is provided that, "where any [person] * * * shall in his * * * lifetime, have committed any trespass," the injured party shall have an action therefor against the representative of such deceased. Under this statute an action was brought for backing water on the plaintiff's land, and in answer to the defendant's contention that this was not a "trespass" the court held that, regardless of the technical distinction as to the form of action, the word "trespass," as used in the statute, "must be received as equivalent in meaning to the word 'tort,' so that the effect of the provision is to give a right of suit against the personal representatives of a deceased wrongdoer for any injurious act of a suable nature, without reference to the form in which the remedy must be sought." In the opinion the court said that the synonym of trespass "in law Latin was 'transgressio,' a term which, in its comprehensive signification, embraced every infraction of a legal right. In this sense it comprehended not only forcible wrongs, where the damages were direct and immediate, but also acts the consequence of which made them tortious, * * * 'and in general any misfeasance or act of one man, whereby another is injuriously treated or damaged, is a transgression or tort in its largest sense.'" Ten Eyck v. Runk, 31 N. J. Law, 430. Reputation is as much a part of the real man as an arm or limb is of his body. Injury to the reputation is in many respects the legal equivalent of a battery upon a physical member. The fact that it can only be effected by the spoken word or written sign in no way destroys the legal complexion of the act. A man's body may be assailed with the fist, and it is a trespass. His character may be assailed by the tongue, and that, too, is a form of trespass, involving the use of that constructive violence which alone can reach so intangible an attribute of his personality. There are cases in which it has been held that words may inflict such pain as to amount to cruelty justifying a divorce. And that a libel is a trespass within the language of the Constitution is evident when it is considered that the organic law is to be construed liberally, and so as to accomplish the purpose of the people in convention assembled. There is a strong presumption that the words were not intended to be given any narrow or purely technical meaning in a chapter which was dealing with the general subject of venue, and defining where all suits against joint defendants could be instituted. The Constitution provided where all such suits should be brought in equity cases; where in common-law cases, if there was a joint liability under a contract; and evidently intended to declare what might be the venue in suits where persons were jointly liable for a tort; otherwise there would be a hiatus. If defendants' contention be correct, there would be a right to bring a joint action against those who are alleged to have been guilty of a joint libel, and yet there would be no way of enforcing this right if they resided in different counties. The scope and spirit of the constitutional provision demonstrates that this class of wrongs, this class of trespasses, was not intended to form an exception and stand as a case in which the right was nullified because the remedy failed. Right and remedy should harmonize unless the law forbids. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3076, 4929.

4. The defendants contend that, the original suit having been brought in Clinch county, and the renewal suit in Brooks county, the case is not saved from the bar of the statute. But the Civil Code of 1895, § 3786, does not require that the suit shall be renewed in the same court or in the same county. This section is but a codification of the act of 1847, p. 217 (Cobb's Dig. p. 569), which allowed the plaintiff to renew "in any court having jurisdiction thereof in this state." Constitution Pub. Co. v. De Laughter, 95 Ga. 18, 21 S. E. 1000. Whether the section be treated as a permit or as a requirement, it could not modify the constitutional provision as to where suits could be brought. The law relating to renewals of dismissed cases forms an exception to the statute of limitations, and has no reference to the law of venue.

5, 6. At common law suits frequently abated for matters of form. In such cases the plaintiff was allowed a reasonable time within which to sue out a new writ. This time was theoretically computed with reference to the number of days which the parties must spend in journeying to the court. Hence the name "journeys account." Such renewed suit was but a continuance of that which had abated, and of necessity was in the same court, against the same parties; and for the same cause of action. This ancient remedy was probably never recognized in this state. Mahon v. Justices, Ga. Dec. 201, pt. 2. In lieu thereof, the colonial act of 1767 (Cobb's Dig. 562) provided that in case of reversals or arrest of judgment the plaintiff, his heirs or representatives, might commence a new action within one year. See Harrison v. Walker, 1 Ga. 82. Later the act of 1847 (Cobb's Dig. p. 569) provided that whenever any case commenced within the time limited by law shall be discontinued, dismissed, or nonsuited, the plaintiff, notwithstanding the intervening bar of the statute, might at any time within six months of such termination of the case renew or recommence the same in any court having jurisdiction thereof in this state. The act of 1856 (Acts 1856, p. 237) was substantially the same as the act of 1847, except that it added the privilege to renew in case judgment for the plaintiff was arrested. These last two acts are held in Constitution Pub. Co. v. De Laughter, 95 Ga. 18, 21 S. E. 1000, to be codified in Civ. Code 1895, § 3786. This section does not contemplate a revival or continuance of the original suit as at common law under "journeys account," but that, the first having been discontinued, dismissed, or nonsuited, a new and distinct suit may be brought. Every citizen is interested in the policy of repose which prevents the enforcement of stale demands. Statutes of limitation are based partly on the theory that nonaction by a plaintiff tends to throw his adversary off guard, making him careless in the preservation of receipts, vouchers, documents, and other evidence needful for his defense. But when a suit is pending, whether it be brought with technical correctness, or not, the defendant is warned to preserve his evidence. The attempted assertion by judicial proceedings of a cause of action in which A. gives B. notice of his claim is sufficient to stop the running of the statute during the pendency of that suit, and for six months thereafter. In like manner, if B. in the same suit, by a set-off or cross-bill (Civ. Code 1895, § 3787; Crane v. Barry, 60 Ga. 362; Hunt v. Spaulding, 18 Pick. [Mass.] 521) or other appropriate proceeding, should attempt to enforce his cause of action against the plaintiff or other party to the proceedings, the statute would likewise be tolled as to this claim. Notice had been given. The opposite party was warned. If the suit was disposed of on any matter not concluding the merits of the cause of action, or any of the causes of action, asserted in the proceeding by one party against another, it might be thereafter seasonably renewed in the proper forum, in proper form, against any of the proper and all of the necessary parties therein. Some of the statutes on this subject are much more narrow than that contained in the Civil Code of 1895, §

3786. Some limit it to cases in which there has been an involuntary nonsuit; others, to dismissal by the court for some matter of form not involving the merits; others, to dismissals as the result of a reversal; others, to cases where the judgment in favor of the plaintiff has been arrested or set aside. But our statute, construed in the light of the acts from which it was codified, is very broad. It cannot mean that the form and parties to the new cause shall in all respects be identical with the former. The first case may have been dismissed because at law instead of at equity, and vice versa (Spear v. Newell, 13 Vt. 288, 295; East Tenn. Co. v. Ferguson [Tenn. Ch. App.] 85 S. W. 900; Crow v. State, 28 Ark. 685; Lamson v. Hutchings, 113 Fed. 321, 55 O. C. A. 245), or because it was defective in making or omitting an averment, or for a misjoinder of parties (Woodcock v. Bostic [N. C.] 88 S. E. 881 [6]). Certainly it could not be expected that the second suit would repeat the error of the first, either in parties or pleadings, forum, venue, form of action, or prayer for relief. If the cause of action is the same in both cases, if by the same party or his legal representative, and against a person from whom relief was prayed in the first suit, the second action may be renewed. Of course, the substantial rights of the plaintiff, or liability of the defendant to him or to one another, cannot be enlarged beyond that indicated by the pleadings in the first case. But to the second only those parties are needed who are necessary to enforce and preserve the rights of the respective litigants existing at the time the running of the statute was interrupted by the filing of the first suit. The second suit must be for substantially the same cause of action, though it need not be a literal copy of the petition dismissed. Hudgins v. Crow, 82 Ga. 372. It must be by the same plaintiff or his legal representative (Moody v. Threlkeld, 11 Ga. 55 [5]), and against all who were necessary parties defendant in the first suit. If they were parties to a joint contract, or entitled to rights, one against another, by way of contribution, in the event the plaintiff recovered, then they or their personal representatives must all be parties to the second suit. Ford v. Clark, 75 Ga. 612; White v. Moss, 92 Ga. 246, 18 S. E. 13. But it has been held that, even under Civ. Code 1895, § 3915, there is no right of contribution between joint libelers. McCalla v. Shaw, 72 Ga. 458; Hunter v. Wakefield, 97 Ga. 543, 25 S. E. 347, 54 Am. St. Rep. 438. Where, therefore, the first suit was against two or more such joint tort feors, each of whom was jointly suable, but severally liable, all of the defendants were not necessary parties to the first or the second suit. In the first action they might have been stricken by the plaintiff at any time over objection. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Griffith, 111 Ga. 559, 36 S. E. 859. The second suit might have been brought against all such former defendants, and might have been discontinued as to some after service, or the same result might have been accomplished by not pressing to have them served with process. The presence or absence of any of such defendants severally liable was a matter in which the codefendants had no legal interest. Fisher v. Cook, 23 Ill. App. 821 (3). They cannot escape because others were omitted as defendants, dismissed as defendants, or sued and not served as defendants. The liability of those served has not been increased, nor have they been deprived of any right or defense, by reason of the absence of the other tortfeasors. When they were served in the first suit, they were put on notice of plaintiff's intent to enforce by judicial proceeding his cause of action. By such notice they were warned that that case might be dismissed, and another brought against them severally, or with only a part of the other codefendants, if such could lawfully be done; and they must preserve their evidence, and act accordingly.

There are few cases relating to the question of parties defendant to the second suit, but all which we have found on this subject sustain the view above indicated. The statutes of the various states differ in detail, but all are equally silent on the question here involved. The authorities all agree in the proposition that the renewal statute is to be liberally construed. Gordon v. McCauley, 73 Ga. 669; Rountree v. Key, 71 Ga. 214; Coffin v. Cottle, 16 Pick. 385. And this applies to parties defendant, as will appear from Cox v. Berry, 13 Ga. 306. A. brought ejectment against B. as tenant in possession. C., the landlord, was made party defendant. Being unable to prove possession in B., the plaintiff dismissed after the bar of the statute had attached. Within six months he brought a suit for the same lot against D. as tenant, to which C. also was a party defendant. He pleaded the statute of limitations. In answer to the proposition that the second suit was not a renewal of the first, because against a different tenant, the court said that it was certainly the same as far as the landlord, C., was concerned. "It is for the same land, in favor of the same plaintiff, and C. was a party defendant in both actions. The act is remedial, and is to be literally [liberally] construed." In Anthony Investment Co. v. Law (Kan. Sup.) 61 Pac. 745, Law and his wife gave a note for $1,200, and coupon notes for the interest, securing the same by a mortgage. The note and coupons, as well as the mortgage, were sold to Watt, payment being guaranteed by the Farmers' Company. There were subsequent transfers, and finally a suit brought to foreclose the mortgage, and the assignee of the coupons prayed for judgment against Law. The foreclosure and cross-action were both dismissed after the bar of the statute on the coupons. Subsequently a renewal action was brought on the coupons against the Laws, who raised the point that the parties were not the same as in the first suit. The court said the plaintiff's right was not "affected by the fact that other parties were also defendants in the first action. The two actions, although not identical in form, were substantially alike, and in each case a personal judgment was sought upon the note, and upon similar grounds of liability, so far as the defendants are concerned." In Pittsburgh R. v. Bemis, 64 Ohio St. 28, 50 N. E. 745, the plaintiff brought an action for false imprisonment against the railroad and the Wagner Palace Car Company. The latter demurred, and was dismissed. Later the plaintiff's case against the railroad was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. He renewed within the statutory period against the railroad company alone, in another court; and, while no point was made as to the absence of one of the original defendants, the case was held to be saved by the renewal statute. In East Tenn. Co. v. Lawson (Tenn. Ch.) 35 S. W. 456 (3), an action to recover 100,000 acres of land was brought against 30 defendants, and dismissed after the bar of the statute, and again brought under the renewal statute against 1 defendant severally liable, and allowed to proceed without the presence of the other 29 defendants. Under the Arkansas statute the plaintiff may commence a new action after he has suffered a nonsuit or his judgment has been arrested or reversed. Under this statute suit was brought against the makers of a note, which was nonsuited after the bar had attached. A new suit within a year was brought against two of the makers of the note, but omitting other defendants who were parties to the first suit. The Supreme Court of Arkansas does not appear to have made any question as to whether the makers were entitled to rights one against another by way of contribution or otherwise, but held that the case was saved from the bar, notwithstanding the fact that all the makers of the note who were sued in the first action were not made parties to the second, saying that the first action was commenced against the other makers of the same note, who are not sued in the present action. Defendants in this suit were, however, parties to the first. The question is not whether a joint liability exists against the makers of the note, but whether a former suit was commenced against the defendants in this suit on the same cause of action. State Bank v. Roddy, 7 Eng. (Ark.) 767. See, also, Williams v. Council, 49 N. O. 206. It may possibly be argued that these authorities lead to the conclusion that, having sued 110 defendants in the first suit, the plaintiff might institute 110 separate and independent actions—one against each of the persons severally liable. That question is not involved in this case. Here the second suit was against all of the original defendants. The fact that some were not served does not bring about a result different from what might have been accomplished if all had been served, and during the progress of the case 105 had been voluntarily dismissed.

7-10. In a case against several defendants it is often impossible to serve each in time for the appearance term. The right to amend and to grant continuances reasonably necessary to bring in those who have not been served would seem to be one of the inherent powers of the court which had authority in the first instance to issue the process. Civ. Code 1895, § 4047 (6). Undoubtedly, on general principles, a process loses its vitality after the return day, unless by virtue of the statute, or of some act of the court itself, the right of the officer to serve the same is extended. Sections 4901 and 4902 of the Civil Code of 1895 have enlarged the power of the ministerial officer, and writs served too late for the first term are held good for the succeeding term. If the officer is unable to find the defendant, or any of the defendants, he is required to make return thereof for appropriate action by the court. But if there is no service the plaintiff cannot remain inactive, and, after having been guilty of laches, ultimately move in the cause, and then claim that a suit allowed to remain passive is to be treated as having been commenced as of the time of the filing of the petition. Such result follows only when the suit is kept alive by legal service. Civ. Code 1895, § 4973. But where the plaintiff, on discovery of the failure to serve, or of irregularity in the process, is active to have the fault cured, the court is not without jurisdiction to make the suit effective. Dobbins v. Jenkins, 51 Ga. 204; Peck v. La Roche, 86 Ga. 317, 12 S. E. 688; Brunswick Hardware Co. v. Bingham, 110 Ga. 526, 35 S. E. 772. Each of these cases recognizes that, where there had been no service, the plaintiff's diligence entitled him to orders after the first term requiring the sheriff to perfect service. And in White v. Hart, 35 Ga. 269, it was expressly ruled that "a second original process to perfect service on a joint defendant might issue by way of amendment after the appearance term." Here neither the original nor the second original processes were void. The plaintiff was diligent, and the court was authorized to establish lost second originals, to cause them to be properly directed, and to permit service thereof on the nonresident defendants, requiring them to appear at the May term, 1899, of Brooks superior court.

What has already been said as to perfecting service is an answer to the contention that service of the second suit must be perfected within six months. The date of the filing of the petition is to be treated as the commencement of every suit when it is followed up by legal service, and under this rule the present suit was begun within six months from the dismissal of the former, the service in 1899 being effective, by relation, to keep alive the suit filed on March 3, 1898.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. DU BOSE.
SAME v. HOLLIDAY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

CARRIERS—REFUSAL TO TAKE PASSENGERS.

1. A railroad company is not bound to receive and transport passengers on a train, consisting of an engine and a freight car, made up for the purpose of meeting an emergency caused by a wreck on its line; and one who, with knowledge of the circumstances, by permission merely of the conductor, takes passage on such a train, cannot recover damages from the railroad company on account of its refusal to give him return passage on the same train, it appearing that such refusal was not capricious or wanton, but was due entirely to the existence of the emergency referred to.

Error from Superior Court, Tallahassee County; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Actions by Rembert Du Bose and Robert Holliday against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Joseph B. & Bryan Cumming and J. B. Park, for plaintiff in error. Colley & Sims, Hawes Cloud, and I. T. Irvin, Jr., for defendants in error.

CANDLER, J. Du Bose and Holliday each brought suit against the railroad company for damages growing out of alleged injuries described in their respective petitions. Du Bose obtained a verdict for $200, and Holliday one for $60. The cases were tried separately in the court below, but were argued together here, as both grew out of the same transaction, and are controlled by the same principles of law. In each case the railroad company excepts to the overruling of its demurrer to the petition, and to the refusal of its motion for a new trial.

It appears that there had been a wreck on what is known as the "Washington Branch" of the defendant's road, several miles from the town of Washington, by reason of which regular traffic on that branch had been suspended. An engine and freight car were run from Washington to the scene of the wreck, and the plaintiffs and others requested permission of the conductor in charge of the train to ride thereon, which was granted. The plaintiffs offered to pay the conductor for the round trip, but he would accept fare only one way. He had previously told the plaintiffs that he would probably return to Washington in about an hour. This was about 7 o'clock in the evening. The train, however, did not leave the scene of the wreck until about midnight, and, when it did, the conductor, acting under instructions from the superintendent of the railroad, refused to transport the plaintiffs, who walked back to Washington; the present suits being based on the physical and mental suffering alleged to have been thereby occasioned.

These facts, which are made to appear from the undisputed evidence, do not, in our opinion, show any right on the part of the plaintiffs to recover damages. The train upon which the plaintiffs rode from Washington to the scene of the wreck was in no sense a regular passenger train. Indeed, it was neither regular nor passenger. Its sole purpose was to meet an emergency with which the employees of the defendant were confronted. This fact was well known to the plaintiffs. The defendant was under no obligation to transport them on this train at all. There is nothing in the evidence to show that they were on the train by the invitation of the conductor. On the contrary, they sought him out, and requested him to allow them to ride on the train; demonstrating that they recognized that he was under no obligation to do so. Nor can it be successfully contended that the defendant is liable to the plaintiffs for the violation of the verbal contract alleged to have been made with them by the conductor to allow them to return on the train when it should come back to Washington. It is true, as a general proposition, that a person on a train may rely on the undertakings of the conductor, within his implied authority; but in the present case the plaintiffs were well aware that an emergency existed which had deranged all regular business on this branch of the defendant's road, and which was liable to upset any plans that might be made by the conductor with reference to the running of this train. When they boarded the train, they took the chances of the happening of such a contingency. It is not made to appear that the refusal to bring them back to Washington was capricious or wanton, and in no view of the case, as disclosed by the evidence, can they recover damages for such refusal. See Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Spinks, 104 Ga. 692, 30 S. E. 968.

Regardless of the points raised by the defendant's demurrers, and the cases as made by the evidence only being argued here upon the cases as made by such evidence alone, we are satisfied that the evidence showed no right on the part of the plaintiffs to recover, and the judgment in both cases is therefore reversed. All the Justices concurring, except EVANS, J., disqualified.

MCDONALD v. McDONALD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)

DOWER—LANDS SUBJECT—RENTAL VALUE—EVIDENCE.

1. A widow is not entitled to dower out of land of which her husband did not die seised and possessed, and to which the husband did not obtain title in right of his wife.

2. Where, therefore, a husband borrowed money, and made to the lender an absolute deed under Civ. Code 1895, § 2771 et seq., receiving a bond for title from the lender, and at the time of his death none of the notes given by him for the borrowed money had been paid, he had no interest in the land except the equity of redemption, and it was error to hold that his widow was entitled to dower in such land.

3. It was also error, where the evidence was conflicting as to the value for rent of the land assigned as dower while such land was in the hands of the administrator, to direct the jury to find the highest amount proved.

Error from Superior Court, Jackson County; R. B. Russell, Judge.

Application of Dora McDonald against H. S. McDonald, administrator, for the setting aside of dower in her husband's estate. Judgment for applicant, and the administrator brings error. Reversed.

J. S. Ayers and Pike & Willis, for plaintiff in error. E. C. Armistead and H. H. Dean, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. In February, 1901, McDonald borrowed $2,000 from the British American Mortgage Company, Limited. To secure this loan he made an absolute conveyance of certain land under Civ. Code 1895, § 2771 et seq., giving his notes for different amounts, due at different times, with a stipulation that, if any note should not be paid at maturity, the whole amount should become due. In August, 1901, McDonald died without having repaid any of the money borrowed. An administrator was appointed. The widow of the deceased applied to the superior court for the appointment of commissioners to lay off and admeasure her dower in the lands embraced in the above-mentioned deed. These lands consisted of some 165 acres, and were the only lands in which McDonald had any interest at the time of his death. The commissioners set apart one-third in value of these lands as dower. The application was duly served upon the administrator, who filed a traverse on the ground that the husband had not been seised and possessed of these lands at the time of his death, and that, therefore, his widow was not entitled to dower in them. The mortgage company also filed a traverse to the return, upon what grounds does not appear in the record. The case came on for trial, and evidence was introduced by the applicant and by the administrator. Some time during the trial the mortgage company and the applicant entered into an agreement whereby the mortgage company agreed to withdraw its traverse and objections to the application, while the widow agreed that her dower, if assigned, should not affect the superior lien of the judgment which the mortgage company had obtained against the administrator upon the notes given by McDonald. This agreement was reduced to writing, made the judgment of the court, and ordered entered upon the minutes. The judge then directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the applicant for the land set apart to her, and also for the highest proved value of such land for rent during the time the administrator held it. Decree was entered upon this verdict. The administrator excepted to the direction of the verdict and to the decree.

1, 2. It will be seen from the above statement of the facts that McDonald had made an absolute deed to this land to the mortgage company. Although it was made for the purpose of securing a loan, and bond for title was made to McDonald by the mortgage company, conditioned to reconvey the land upon the repayment of the money borrowed, with interest, our Code and the decisions of this court declare that such a deed passes the title. It was an absolute conveyance, and the title passed from McDonald to the mortgage company. Under Civ. Code 1895, § 4687, the widow is entitled to dower in lands "of which the husband was seised and possessed at the time of his death, or to which the husband obtained title in right of his wife." There is no claim in the present case that McDonald obtained title to the lands involved in the right of his wife. He was residing upon the land at the time of his death, and it seems from the recitals in the deed that this was by permission or agreement of the mortgage company. But he had no seisin—no title—and his possession was not of the kind contemplated by the Code when it says "seised and possessed." Unless he was "seised" of the land—had title to it—his widow had no right to dower in it. See Ferris v. Van Ingen, 110 Ga. 115, 35 S. E. 347; Harman v. Stange, 62 Ga. 167; Kinnebrew v. McWhorter, 61 Ga. 33; Raley v. Ross, 59 Ga. 875. But it is argued that no one had the right to make this question except the mortgage company, and it had withdrawn its traverse. Certainly the administrator has a right to administer the entire assets of the estate for paying debts and for distribution. He also represents the decedent, and could make any objections to the deed of the mortgage company which the decedent could have made. The administrator is interested in the proper administration of every asset of the estate, and has a right to resist any effort improperly to reduce the estate. The case of Ashley v. Cook, 109 Ga. 653, 35 S. E. 89, is not in conflict with what has been said above. That was a case in ejectment, where the claim for borrowed money had been sued to judgment, and the execution levied, and the land sold without reconveyance to the borrower. Cook bought in the land at the sale, and the heirs of the grantor brought ejectment against him. Cook offered the deed of the borrower to the lender in evidence in order to show an outstanding title superior to that of the heirs at law. The latter objected to the deed on the ground that Cook could not connect himself with it, and therefore could not rely upon it in any way. Cobb, J., in discussing this feature of the case, remarked: "As to all the world except the grantee, the grantor in the security deed is the owner of the property. * * * It would therefore seem right and proper that no person should be allowed to use this title in any way to interfere with the rights of the grantor in the deed, whatever they may be, unless the person relying thereon connects himself in some way with the deed." He simply meant to say that Cook, the purchaser at the sale, could not use the deed against the grantor or his heirs unless he connected himself with the deed. In another part of the opinion it is shown that Cook did connect himself with the deed, and was therefore entitled to introduce it in evidence and use it. The case now before us is entirely different. Here the grantor, or his personal representative, the administrator, attempted to use the deed of McDonald to the mortgage company for the purpose of protecting the heirs and creditors of the estate; not to use it "in any way to interfere with the rights of the grantor in the deed," but to use it in the interest of his estate. If Mrs. McDonald has no right to dower in this land, the objections of the administrator would benefit the other heirs and the creditors of the estate. None of the borrowed money having been paid to the mortgage company, and there being no offer to redeem by the widow, the title still remained in the company. The widow had no right to dower in the land, and it was error for the trial judge to direct a verdict in her favor and enter decree thereon.

3. The above being true, the error of the trial judge in directing a verdict for the highest amount proved for rent, when the evidence was conflicting upon the subject, will not necessarily or probably be involved in the next trial, but as matter of practice we deem it best to reassert this principle. In no case where the evidence is conflicting on a material issue has a judge the right to direct a verdict thereon.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

HARDEMAN v. BELL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—SALE—ACTION FOR PRICE.

1. A request to charge the legal effect of a portion of the testimony of the sole witness for the plaintiff is properly refused where the same witness on cross-examination contradicts the matters to which the request relates.

2. The evidence demanded the verdict for the defendant.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; A. W. Flite, Judge.

Action by J. W. Hardeman against B. A. Bell. Judgment for plaintiff before a justice, and for defendant on appeal, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Griffin & Attaway, for plaintiff in error. J. Z. Foster, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. Hardeman sued Bell in a justice's court, alleging an indebtedness of $66.72 upon an open account, a copy of which was attached to the summons. An appeal was taken from the judgment of the justice court to the superior court, and on the trial of the appeal case the plaintiff testified on direct examination that the account sued on was just, true, due, and correct as stated. On cross-examination he testified that the defendant did not personally get any of the goods embraced in the bill of particulars; that Walraven got all of the goods, a portion of which he sold himself, and that the remainder were sold by his clerks. He was unable to identify the goods sold by himself. He knew that the amount sold by his clerks was correct, because they were honest. At the trial in the justice court Walraven admitted in the presence of the defendant that he got all of the goods set out in the account. This was all the evidence that was offered by the plaintiff. No evidence was offered by the defendant. The judge refused a written request of the plaintiff to charge the following: "I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that when the plaintiff testified that the account sued upon was just, due, unpaid, and correct as stated, a prima facie case is made, and, stopping there, it would be your duty to find for the plaintiff." Even if the request presented a correct legal principle as to the effect of the testimony of the plaintiff that the account was just, due, unpaid, and correct as stated, the court properly refused to give the same in charge because on cross-examination the plaintiff wholly failed to make out his case, or to show that any of the goods were either purchased by or delivered to the defendant, or on his order. Plaintiff admitted that all of the goods were purchased by one Walraven. What connection Walraven had with the defendant does not appear in the testimony. Before the defendant could be made liable for any account contracted by Walraven, the authority of Walraven should be made to appear. The verdict for the defendant was demanded by the testimony, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

MC CALL v. MILLER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

JUDGMENT—VACATING—ABSENCE OF DEFENDANT—AMOUNT.

1. To authorize the setting aside, in an equitable proceeding, of a verdict and judgment, on the ground that the defendant therein had, by reason of his sickness, been prevented from being present at the trial, it must appear, not only that his absence was from such cause, but that, had he been present, there would probably have been a different result and one more favorable to him. A verdict was directed against a defendant, and judgment entered thereon, for the failure of his counsel to comply with a peremptory order of court, duly granted, directing such counsel to produce on the trial a certain written instrument, which the order recited was then in his possession and contained evidence material in the case, the defendant being absent, on account of his sickness, when such verdict and judgment were rendered. Held, that the facts recited did not make a case, within the above-stated rule, for setting aside the verdict and judgment.

2. The amount of the verdict and judgment sought to be set aside was not more than was authorized under the facts of the case in which they were rendered.

Error from Superior Court, Brooks County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by E. J. Miller against J. H. McCall. From a judgment overruling a demurrer, defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. G. & J. F. McCall and Z. D. Harrison, for plaintiff in error. Bennet & Bennet and J. D. Kilpatrick, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. The record in this case is somewhat confused. We gather, however, from the original petition of E. J. Miller, the exhibits attached thereto, and amendments to the same, the following facts: On January 24, 1900, during the November, 1899, adjourned term of the superior court of Brooks county, verdict and judgment were rendered in favor of J. H. McCall against E. J. Miller and the sureties on his bond given to dissolve a garnishment, in the case of J. H. McCall v. A. P. Ashurst, defendant, M. Brice, garnishee, and E. J. Miller, claimant, who had traversed the answer of the garnishee, and upon which traverse an issue had been formed, judgment having been previously rendered against the defendant, Ashurst, in the main case. In 1898, during the pendency of the garnishment and claim case, counsel for Miller had been served, at the instance of the plaintiff, with written notice to produce, upon the trial of that case, a certain letter from the plaintiff to Miller, dated August 25, 1895, alleged to contain evidence pertinent to the issue in the case, and to be used as evidence in behalf of the plaintiff. Upon the call of the garnishment and claim case on January 23, 1900, during the said November adjourned term, counsel for Miller, in response to the notice to produce such letter, stated to the court that he had the letter in his possession, but was unable to produce it, for the reason that it was then in Moultrie. The court thereupon passed a peremptory order requiring counsel for Miller to produce such letter on the trial, to be used as evidence for the plaintiff. On the next day, January 24th, upon the call of the case for trial, verdict and judgment were rendered against Miller and the sureties on his bond to dissolve the garnishment, for the failure of his counsel to produce such letter in accordance with the peremptory order of the court. (Counsel for Miller, in their brief, say: "The court directed a verdict in favor of plaintiff in error on account of this failure to produce said letter.") Miller's equitable petition, brought January 27, 1900, against J. H. McCall and the clerk of the court, sought to set aside this judgment. The grounds upon which it was sought to set it aside were: (1) Because petitioner did not know that an adjourned term of Brooks superior court would be held on January 22, 1900, and if he had known it he could not possibly have attended, as he was seriously sick at that time; that his counsel wired him on Monday, January 22d, that the case would be reached, and that he immediately wired his counsel that it would be impossible, on account of his sickness, to attend court; that he would have been present but for his sickness; that the presence and testimony of petitioner was necessary for a successful presentation of his case to the jury, and "that his attorney could not have presented said case before the court without petitioner being there in person." (2) Because his counsel had leave of absence from the November, 1899, term of the court, and, having removed from Quitman to Atlanta about December 1, 1899, did not know that an adjourned term of the court would be held on January 22, 1900, until he saw a notice of it in a newspaper on Saturday, January 20th; that on January 18th his counsel, having heard a rumor to the effect that the adjourned term would be held, wrote to plaintiff's attorney requesting him to wire petitioner's counsel if a trial of the case would be insisted on, and suggesting that the case be referred to an auditor, and that, as no reply to his letter was received, his counsel thought that his suggestion of a reference to an auditor was satisfactory; that petitioner's counsel arrived at Quitman on January —, but did not succeed in seeing plaintiff's counsel until 10 o'clock a. m. on January 22d, when he first learned that the trial of the case would be urged; that his counsel immediately wired petitioner to come, and petitioner replied by telegram that his serious sickness prevented, as stated above, and petitioner also wrote to his counsel on the same day that he was too ill to attend court then, and to have the case postponed until the latter part of the week, when he could be present, but his counsel did not receive this letter until January 24th; that when his counsel removed from Quitman to Atlanta he left the letter, which he had been notified to produce, among the papers in his office at Quitman, and expected to find it there, but when he went to get it he found that his former law partner had carried this letter, with other papers, to Moultrie, and it was impossible for him to get the letter before the case was called for trial, and petitioner, on account of his serious illness, could not furnish his counsel with proper evidence for a legal showing for a continuance, and judgment was given against petitioner. (3) Because the amount for which the judgment sought to be set aside was rendered exceeded the amount which McCall, the plaintiff in that case, was entitled to recover, for the reason that McCall's contention in that case was that Ashurst, his agent, had taken an order for a monument from Brice, which McCall was to furnish him, which order McCall contended Ashurst had transferred to petitioner, with notice on his part of McCall's interest in such order, and that if McCall was entitled to recover anything from petitioner it would only be the profit which McCall would have made by furnishing the monument, which would not have exceeded $150. The petition as amended was demurred to on the following grounds: (1) Want of equity; (2) that it appeared from the petition that petitioner was represented by his counsel, who was present in the court when the judgment was rendered; and (3) that it also appeared from the petition that the petitioner was seeking to take advantage of his own laches. The demurrer being overruled, exceptions pendente lite to such ruling were filed by the defendant. Upon the trial a verdict was rendered in favor of the petitioner, setting aside the judgment. Plaintiff moved for a new trial upon various grounds, which being overruled, he excepted, also assigning error upon his exceptions pendente lite.

1. The view we take of the case renders it unnecessary to pass on the motion for a new trial. In our opinion, the general ground of the demurrer to the petition as amended should have been sustained. Considering the facts alleged in the petition, and ignoring the mere conclusions of the pleader, the petitioner was not entitled to the relief for which he prayed. When a regular term of court is adjourned over to a subsequent time, all parties and their attorneys having business in the court are bound at their peril to take notice of such adjourned term. Rawson v. Powell, 36 Ga. 255. "The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction may be set aside, by a decree, for fraud, accident, or mistake, or the acts of the adverse party unmixed with the negligence or fault of the petitioner." Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3987, 5370. In Clifton v. Livor, 24 Ga. 91, it was held: "If a party is prevented by sickness from appearing at the proper court, at the proper time, to make his defense at law, he is entitled to relief in a court of equity." There a bill was filed to set aside a sheriff's sale made under a mortgage execution, and to enjoin the execution of the fi. fa. The bill alleged that the complainant was too sick to attend the term of the court at which the rule absolute was granted until late in the evening of the second day of the term, and that when he arrived the rule had been made absolute, although he was informed by his counsel that he, in complainant's behalf, had urged the court to allow complainant until the last day of the term to file his affidavit in terms of the law, which the court refused to do. The bill set out a valid defense which the complainant would have set up if he had been present. Chief Justice Lumpkin, in delivering the opinion, said, "It is against just such accidents [as the sickness of the complainant] that a court of chancery will grant relief." It seems, however, that a different rule was applied in Woodward v. Dromgoole, 71 Ga. 523. There a bill was brought to set aside a verdict in ejectment, and for injunction, etc. The bill alleged that the complainant was notified by his attorney that the ejectment case against him stood for trial, but that some 8 or 10 days before that time he was taken ill in Louisville, and could not attend the court; that, when the case was put on the calendar for trial, his attorney telegraphed to him; he wired back that he was too sick to attend; he did not know that more was required, and he was unable to do more; he also instructed his attorney to consult with another named attorney, whom he desired to represent him, but had been unable to see; that these two attorneys consulted together, and failing to obtain a continuance, and in good faith, deeming it the best thing to be done, filed an equitable plea, alleging that complainant had paid to the plaintiff a large part of the purchase money, and praying that the property be sold, the purchase money paid, and the balance turned over to complainant; that an agreed verdict was rendered accordingly, and that the property had been advertised for sale; that this was without the approval of complainant, and his attorneys did not know fully the facts of his defense; and that, as soon as complainant learned what had been done, he expressed his disapproval and filed the bill. This court reversed the grant of an injunction by the trial judge. Justice Blandford, in delivering the opinion, said that, applying the principles contained in Code, § 3129 (now Civ. Code, § 3988), to the allegations in the bill, it was apparent that there was no equity in it; "that if any harm [had] come to defendant it was by his own negligence and laches. 'Vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt,' which is a maxim of our law taken from the ancients. 'He that asks help from the gods must first help himself.' (Æsop.)" Again, in Phillips v. Taber, 83 Ga. 565 (4), 10 S. E. 270, it was held that, to set aside a judgment for defendant's absence from providential cause, he must show, not only that he was absent from such cause, but unable to notify the court of his condition.

Whatever may be the correct rule as to when equity will grant relief against a judgment at law rendered in the absence of the defendant by reason of his serious illness (and there seems to be some diversity of judicial opinion on the subject—1 Black on Judgments, § 334 et seq.), it appears from the petition in the case under consideration that, even if the petitioner had been present when the verdict and judgment which he seeks to set aside were rendered against him, the result would not have been different. His counsel had been duly notified to produce a certain letter, alleged to contain evidence pertinent to the issue, and to be used on the trial in that case as evidence for the plaintiff. It appeared that, when called upon to produce this letter, the counsel representing the petitioner admitted that it was in his possession, but stated that he was unable to produce it, because it had been carried to Moultrie by his former partner. It does not appear that any request was made that the case be postponed until the letter could be procured, or that any objection was made to the production of the letter because it was not material evidence, or for any other reason; nor does it appear that any objection was made to the granting of the peremptory order requiring petitioner's counsel in that case to produce the letter; nor is there any suggestion in the petition as to what petitioner could or would have done, had he been present, to prevent the granting of the peremptory order to produce this letter, or to prevent the rendition of the judgment against him and his sureties for the failure of his counsel to comply with such order. It has been held that, "to authorize the setting aside of a verdict on account of the defendant having been providentially prevented from being present at the trial, it must be shown that he was injured by such absence" (Peacock v. Ury, 52 Ga. 353 [8]); and that, when it did not appear in a motion for a new trial that a different result would have been reached had the movant been present at the trial, the motion was properly overruled (Ferrill v. Marks, 76 Ga. 21).

2. From the petition and the exhibits attached thereto, it appeared that J. H. McCall had obtained a judgment against Ashurst for $405 principal, and that Brice, the garnishee, had answered that he had in his hands the sum of $461.27, which Miller had claimed and obtained by giving bond to dissolve the garnishment. The judgment rendered against Miller and his sureties was for $405 principal, and interest on the same at 7 per cent. per annum from the date he dissolved the garnishment and took the fund to the date of the judgment against him and his sureties. The issue in the case was whether the garnishee owed Ashurst or Miller, and the question as to whether Miller had damaged McCall by purchasing from Ashurst, McCall's agent, an order for a monument, which Brice, the garnishee, had given the agent, was not in the case. It is clear, therefore, that there was no merit in the ground of the petition which alleged that the amount for which the judgment sought to be set aside was rendered exceeded the amount which the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

The judgment of the court overruling the demurrer must be reversed. All the Justices concurring.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. BANDY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 10, 1904.)

CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGERS—ALIGHTING FROM TRAIN—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. Where a carrier accepts fare to a particular station, it is not sufficient that the speed of the train be slackened, but the company is bound to stop the train so as to afford the passenger an opportunity safely to alight.

2. A passenger cannot rely on the conductor's instructions as a sufficient excuse or justification for doing an act obviously dangerous.

3. It is not a want of ordinary care if a passenger prudently uses the means which the company affords him for disembarking.

4. If, under the direction of the conductor, a passenger gets off of a slowly moving train, the company is liable for the consequent injuries.

5. The evidence was conflicting, but sufficient to sustain the verdict for the plaintiff.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by A. L. Bandy, by his next friend, against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

In the case of Bandy against the Southern Railway Company the plaintiff, a minor, testified that on the night of November 10, 1901, he bought a ticket from Dalton to Miller's Station, and boarded the train, which was then about an hour and a half late; that just before reaching the station the conductor told him that as they were behind time he would not stop, but would only slow up, called him to the platform, and, as the train continued to slacken its speed, punched him, saying, "Now is the time to get off;" that the speed appeared to the plaintiff sufficiently slow to make it reasonably safe to get off; that he obeyed the command, but in doing so stepped upon a rolling stone, which threw him violently to the ground, occasioning serious injuries, the character of which was testified to by the plaintiff and the attending physician. The testimony of the conductor was in direct conflict with all the material facts stated by the plaintiff. His testimony was confirmed by that of the brakeman and two passengers. All the witnesses showed that the train did actually come to a stop about a car length beyond the point at which the plaintiff got off. There was a verdict for the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial on the general grounds was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

Shumate & Maddox and Harkins & Dodd, for plaintiff in error. W. C. Martin, W. M. Jones, and R. J. & J. McCamy, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. The evidence was directly in conflict, but the testimony for the plaintiff brought the case within the decision in Georgia Railroad Co. v. McCurdy, 45 Ga. 288, 12 Am. Rep. 577, where it was held that, if the company accepts the fare to a particular station, it is bound to stop, and it is not sufficient that the speed is slackened. If, under the direction of the conductor, a passenger gets off of a slowly moving train, the company is liable for consequent injuries, it not being a want of ordinary care if the passenger prudently uses the means which the company affords him for disembarking. Western R. Co. v. Young, 51 Ga. 490; Central R. Co. v. Smith, 60 Ga. 278; Jones v. Ry. Co., 108 Ga. 570, 29 S. E. 927. In such a case it is immaterial whether the direction to alight from the moving train was given while the passenger was in the coach or on the steps, the length of time between the order and the alighting being unimportant. Of course, the passenger could not rely on the conductor's instruction if it was obviously dangerous to conform thereto; but the evidence here was that the train was moving slowly, and the jury had the right to believe this statement and the further testimony of the plaintiff that he thought it reasonably safe to obey the conductor's command.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except CANDLER, J., disqualified.

CHRISTIAN v. MACON RY. & LIGHT CO.

COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE—PLEADINGS AS EVIDENCE—NONSUIT.

1. Under the evidence the jury might fairly infer that the defendant was negligent in running its cars. If the plaintiff and the defendant were both negligent, the former can recover, unless his negligence was equal to or greater than the negligence of the defendant, or unless he could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence. The latter question is, under the plaintiff's evidence, unexplained, a close one, and should have been submitted to the jury.

2. Where the plaintiff introduces in evidence a paragraph of the defendant's answer, part of which is in his favor and part against him, the plaintiff is not estopped to rebut the parts which are against him, nor is the jury bound to take them as true. In such case the jury may, for sufficient reasons, believe a part of the admissions and disbelieve the other part; this being a question purely for the jury.

3. It was error to grant a nonsuit.

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by R. G. Christian against the Macon Railway & Light Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

M. Felton Hatcher and Crump & Travis, for plaintiff in error. Dessau, Harris & Harris and Bacon, Miller & Brunson, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, O. J. The first headnote is sufficient without elaboration. The second gave us more trouble. It seemed to some of us, when the question was argued, that, where the plaintiff put in evidence the admissions and declarations of the defendant by introducing a paragraph of the answer, and these declarations fully exonerated the defendant from all blame, the plaintiff was estopped to deny or contradict them. It was on this theory, we suppose, that the learned judge below granted the nonsuit. After a thorough and careful examination of the authorities, we find that this is not the rule as to such declarations. The rule seems to be well settled, not only in this state, but elsewhere, as evidenced by decisions and textbooks, that where a party introduces statements of his adversary which are partly in his favor and partly against him, he is not concluded by the self-serving portions of such statements, nor estopped to contradict them. It is also well settled in this state that a party may contradict his own witness by showing the truth to be different from what the witness testified. Skipper v. State, 59 Ga. 63; Cronan v. Roberts, 65 Ga. 678; McElmurray v. Turner, 86 Ga. 217, 12 S. E. 359. Some of the plaintiff's evidence did in terms contradict the self-serving declarations of the defendant set out in the paragraph of the answer introduced in evidence by the plaintiff. These cases show that a party who introduces a witness is not absolutely bound by his testimony, but may contradict him, and show the real facts of the case. Nor are the jury bound to believe that part of the declarations which is in favor of the party making them. They may believe or reject the whole, or, for sufficient reasons, they may believe part and reject the remainder. The whole paragraph introduced was made the evidence of the plaintiff, to be used or relied upon by either party as evidence; but it was for the jury at last to determine under all the evidence what part of the paragraph they would believe. Upon this subject, see Sims v. Ferrill, 45 Ga. 585 (3). In Hickson v. Bryan, 75 Ga. 397, Hall, J., said: "Though an answer was waived, this did not deprive the complainant of the privilege of availing herself of admissions made in it; and, although the whole answer is before the jury, and the admissions are qualified by other parts of it, they are not bound to believe such qualifications." Going outside of this state, we find the same doctrine announced. In Chamberlayne's Best on Evid. (Inter. Ed.) § 520, it is said: "Where part of a document or statement is used as self-harming evidence against a party, he has a right to have the whole of it laid before the jury, who may consider, and attach what weight they see fit to any self-serving statements it contains. * * * While the whole statement must be received, the credit due to each part must be determined by the jury, who may believe the self-serving and disbelieve the self-harming portion of it, or vice versa." In 1 Greenl. Evid. (16th Ed.) § 201, the same principle is announced. In

Mott v. Consumers' Ice Co., 73 N. Y. 543, similar to the present case in that the answer of the defendant was "put in evidence for some unexplained and incomprehensible purpose by the plaintiff," it was said by the New York Court of Appeals: "Ordinarily, a party is not bound by the admission of his adversary, of which he gives evidence, but is at liberty to use it so far as it makes in his favor, and to disprove the residue; that is, he is not estopped by it. The fact that an admission is in a pleading does not change its character or create an estoppel." In another case decided by the same court it was said: "The referee was also right in denying the motion for a nonsuit. The plaintiff had given evidence tending to establish his employment and the length of time that he had labored for the defendant. He then showed, by the declarations of the defendant, his dismissal, and the amount of his salary. In the course of the same conversation the defendant said that the plaintiff got drunk, was absent, and neglected his business. The defendant insists that the admission must be taken together, and in this he is correct; but, as there was other evidence, the referee was not obliged to give equal credit to every part of the declaration. He might, and it seems he did, believe the discharge of the plaintiff established by the admission, as a fact peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant, and reject the excuse offered at the same time, not only as inconsistent with the other evidence, but as probably suggested upon information obtained from others." Bearss v. Copley, 10 N. Y. 93. See, also, Algase v. Indemnity Ass'n, 84 Hun, 474, 475, 29 N. Y. Supp. 101; Schmidt v. Pfau, 114 Ill. 494 (5), 504, 2 N. E. 522; Wilson v. Calvert, 8 Ala. 757; *Pearson v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. POTTER.

CERTIORARI TO JUSTICE—ANSWER—STIPULATION.

1. Where a petition for certiorari attacks a judgment on the ground that it is contrary to evidence, it is necessary that the record shall clearly and definitely state the facts on which the judgment was based.

2. If the answer is not satisfactory, the law provides a method by which either party may test its sufficiency and correct any errors therein. Civ. Code 1895, § 4647.

3. The court cannot act upon an agreement that the answer, where not in conflict with the petition, shall be taken as true, and the petition, where not in conflict with the answer, shall be taken as true, since this involves a comparison of two different statements, and tends to create confusion and conflict, where the statute requires clearness and certainty.

4. In the present case the court cannot say that there was any abuse of discretion in refusing to sustain the certiorari. The evidence for the defendant tended to establish that the company was in the exercise of ordinary care. In addition to the statutory presumption of negligence, there was evidence tending to show that the injury might have been avoided, and the judgment is affirmed.

TEASLEY et al. v. BRADLEY et al.

REFERENCE — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIONS — INSTRUCTIONS — EXCESSIVE JUDGMENT.

1. The reference of a case to an auditor rests largely in the discretion of the court, and, unless this discretion is abused, a refusal to appoint an auditor will not be held erroneous.

2. Evidence which admits liability on a subsisting debt is not rendered inadmissible because the admission is accompanied with an offer to pay a less sum than admitted to be due.

3. A charge adjusted to a plea is not rendered erroneous because it conflicts with a theory of the defendant which is not pleaded.

4. Irrelevant evidence was properly excluded.

5. If a charge as a whole correctly applies the law, a specified portion on a particular subject will not be deemed erroneous, which, if taken in connection with the whole charge, does not tend to confuse or mislead the jury upon any issue in the case.

6. The amount of interest seems to be excessive, and, if the defendants in error will write off the interest to $566.57 within 10 days after the filing of the remittitur, a new trial will be refused; otherwise the verdict will be set aside, and a new trial granted.

Error from Superior Court, Hart County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Action by Laura M. Sadler against Isham A. Teasley and others. On death of plaintiff, her administrators, P. Bradley and others, were made parties plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed on conditions.

T. W. Teasley and A. G. & Julian McCurry, for plaintiffs in error. O. C. Brown, W. L. Hodges, J. N. Worley, and James H. Skelton, for defendants in error.

EVANS, J. Laura M. Sadler instituted a suit against Isham A. Teasley to recover certain funds which she alleged had been intrusted to him as a confidential steward or factor for the purpose of collecting, investing, and taking care of the same for her benefit, and for which she had made demand upon him, but which he had refused to pay over to her. The defendant pleaded that the funds were not delivered to him as a steward or confidential agent, but were given to him as a loan; that the statute of limitations had attached; and that he was not indebted. Pending the suit the plaintiff died, and her administrators were made parties to the case. The jury returned a verdict in their favor, and Teasley made a motion for a new trial, to the overruling of which exception is taken. After the motion for a new trial was made, the defendant died, and his executors were made parties in his stead. The case has been tried twice, resulting each time in a verdict against the defendant. A brief of the pleadings appears in the case in 110 Ga. 497, 35 S. E. 782, 78 Am. St. Rep. 113, and reference to that case will disclose the contentions of the parties as made by the pleadings.

1. Upon the call of the case the defendant moved that, inasmuch as matters of account were involved, the case should be referred to an auditor. The court refused to appoint an auditor, and to this ruling exception is taken. The appointment of an auditor is a matter vested largely in the discretion of the court, and, unless this discretion has been abused, the refusal to appoint an auditor will not be held erroneous. Most of the items upon which the plaintiffs were seeking a recovery were not disputed by Teasley. He contended that the money received by him was loaned, and that he had accounted for it; and, further, that more than four years had elapsed since the loan was made, and that the plaintiffs were barred by the statute of limitations from a recovery. The judge, having previously tried the case, was thoroughly familiar with the contentions of the parties, and he did not deem it necessary to refer the case to an auditor. It not appearing that the judge abused his discretion, we cannot say that he erred in refusing to refer the case to an auditor. Civ. Code 1895, § 4582.

2. Complaint is made that the court allowed certain testimony which the plaintiffs in error insist was inadmissible because it was in the nature of an offer of compromise. The evidence objected to tended to show that Teasley had admitted the existence of the debt, and had offered to settle the same for a less amount. This evidence was in support of the allegation in the petition that Teasley offered to settle with Laura M. Sadler "by paying her in land and sundry accounts or obligations he held against various parties, the same aggregating $3,268, but that [she] refused to accept said offer, for the reason that [she] considered said amount inadequate, and not right; all of which was an acknowledgment on the part of the defendant that he held said funds of plaintiff in trust, as aforesaid, and thereby acknowledged that he held said money, rents and profits as a continuing and subsisting trust." This paragraph of the petition was demurred to on the ground that the admission therein referred to was a part of a negotiation for a compromise. This specific objection was passed upon when the case was here before, and it was then ruled that evidence offered in support of the allegations made in regard to Teasley's admissions did not amount to an offer or proposition to settle a doubtful or disputed claim, but was more in the nature of an offer to settle an admitted liability. 110 Ga. 507, 35 S. E. 782, 78 Am. St. Rep. 113. There is a clear distinction between an offer to settle an unquestioned claim, or one about which there is no pending difference as to the question of liability, by the payment of a sum less than the amount admitted, and an offer to compromise a claim where the liability is disputed. If the evidence amounts to an admission of the liability, this evidence is not rendered inadmissible because the party admitting the liability offers to settle or compromise the claim by payment of a less sum. If the offer to pay a certain sum is for the settlement of a disputed liability, then it is in the nature of an offer to compromise, and evidence in regard thereto is inadmissible. Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 875, 48 S. E. 280 (12).

3. Error is assigned upon the following charge of the court: "I charge you further, if Laura Sadler and defendant's wife and Mrs. Bradley agreed with the defendant that out of the estate of James Sadler payment was to be made for the expense and trouble of waiting on James Sadler, if defendant had any such expense or trouble, then defendant had the right to take out of their part of the estate of James Sadler payment for such trouble and expense in waiting on him, if he incurred any trouble and expense in waiting on him. If you believe these sisters agreed with defendant that out of the estate payment was to be made for any trouble and expense in waiting on James Sadler, then you will determine whether or not defendant incurred any expense and trouble in waiting on said James Sadler; and, if so, what said trouble and expense was reasonably worth. I charge you that if these sisters agreed that out of the estate of James Sadler payment was to be made if defendant incurred any expense and trouble, then you will deduct from the estate of James Sadler what said trouble was reasonably worth, and what said expenses were, and then determine, under the rules of law given you in charge by the court, whether or not defendant is liable to plaintiff for one-third of said balance of said estate, if he received any part of it belonging to Miss Laura Sadler. I charge you further, if these sisters did not agree with defendant that out of the estate of James Sadler payment was to be made for such expenses and troubles, or if such agreement was made, but defendant did not incur any trouble and expense in waiting on James Sadler, and if defendant reserved any part of said estate belonging to Laura Sadler, then you will determine, under the rules given you in charge by the court, whether or not defendant is liable for such part, without deducting anything for such trouble and expense, if it was incurred by defendant." Plaintiffs in error insist that this charge was erroneous, for the reason that it made the assent of Mrs. Bradley necessary to the contract between Teasley and her sisters, in order to entitle him to be paid Laura Sadler's part of the expenses incurred by him in taking care of James R. Sadler. This charge was adjusted to the pleadings in the case. In the amendment to his plea Teasley alleged that prior to the death of James R. Sadler, and when he returned to defendant's home to be taken care of in 1873, there was an agreement between defendant and the children of James R. Sadler that, in consideration of defendant taking care of said James R. Sadler and nursing him while he lived, they would wind up James R. Sadler's estate without administration, and that defendant was to be fully paid for his services and the expenses incurred by him in pursuance of the contract, which amounted to the sum of $1,000, one-third of which sum was properly chargeable to Laura M. Sadler. The amendment did not state the names of the children of James R. Sadler. The evidence disclosed that at that time there were three in life, and the judge in his charge gave the names of these children, one of whom was Mrs. Bradley, and in effect instructed the jury that, if the contract set up in the amended plea was sustained by proof, then Laura Sadler would be chargeable with her share of the expenses incurred in pursuance of that contract. There was nothing in the pleadings which set up a contract between Laura Sadler and Teasley's wife. The allegation was that all of the children should pay the defendant for his trouble and expenses, and the charge of the court was adjusted to the pleadings, and was free from error.

4. The court excluded the testimony of Mrs. Lizzie J. Teasley, offered by the defendant, to prove that Cynthia Sadler lived at the defendant's a good many years before her death; that she was sick several weeks before she died; and that during her sickness she was waited on by the defendant, and at his expense. The plaintiffs in error insist that, inasmuch as a part of the money alleged to be due was derived by Laura Sadler from the estate of Cynthia Sadler, the defendant, Teasley, was entitled to a deduction from her distributive share of her proportionate part of the indebtedness of Cynthia Sadler which he had paid. The record does not disclose any items of expense which were paid by the defendant. It appears that after the death of Cynthia Sadler her sole estate consisted of a tract of land known as the "Crawford Place"; that it was sold for $1,500; and that the money was equally divided amongst her three heirs at law, the defendant receiving Laura Sadler's share of her sister's estate. Teasley's contention was that the money he received was delivered to him as a loan. The plaintiffs denied that Laura Sadler loaned the money to him, and contended that, on the contrary, she gave it to him to be invested for her benefit. If Teasley had a demand against the estate of Cynthia Sadler, he should have asserted his claim in 1874, when the estate was divided. It is now too late, after acknowledging that Laura Sadler was entitled to a one-third interest in that estate, and receiving her share, to set up that it should be reduced by certain expenses chargeable to the estate. The evidence was properly excluded.

5. Error is assigned upon the following charge of the court: "If the defendant received from Laura Sadler, or from other sources for her, money or property with the understanding that he was to invest and collect the principal or interest, or both, and reinvest the same from time to time for the benefit of Laura Sadler; and if it was contemplated by the parties that the defendant, Teasley, should use the money for the benefit of Laura Sadler; and if there was no time agreed on between the defendant, Teasley, and Laura Sadler when the money received by the defendant should be returned to Laura Sadler; and if the defendant rendered no account to Laura Sadler, accompanied by an offer to settle, more than four years prior to the institution of this suit; and if he had not notified Laura Sadler that he no longer held such money as hers, but that it belonged to him, more than four years prior to the bringing of this suit; and if Laura Sadler did not make a demand on the defendant, Teasley, for a return of the money, more than four years prior to the institution of this suit; and if defendant did not repudiate the agency more than four years before this suit was commenced—the plaintiff in this case would be entitled to recover against the defendant." The plaintiffs in error insist that the court committed error in giving this charge, because the right of the plaintiffs below to recover did not depend solely upon whether the debt was barred by the statute of limitations, but whether the money received by Teasley was given to him as a trust fund or delivered to him as a loan. This charge of the court was given in connection with instructions on the subject of the statute of limitations. The court had previously instructed the jury that, before the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover, it must appear that Teasley received the money from Laura Sadler as a trustee; and was simply instructing the jury, in this connection, when the bar of the statute would attach. Construed together with the context, there was no error in this charge.

6. Plaintiffs in error contend that the verdict was contrary to designated portions of the charge, and also contrary to law and the evidence. The verdict was for $1,385 principal and $2,983 interest. The amount of principal can be definitely arrived at from the evidence, and the finding of the jury as to the amount of principal due was fully warranted by the evidence. We are unable to ascertain from the record by what process the jury arrived at the amount allowed for interest. It seems to be excessive. The evidence showed that Laura Sadler lived with Teasley, and that during the time he had her money he made certain payments; but the amount of each, and the time when these payments were made, do not clearly appear. There is no data upon which the exact amount of interest can be arrived at. Inasmuch as the evidence does not furnish any definite basis for the calculation of interest prior to demand, the right of the plaintiffs to an allowance of interest should be limited to a recovery of the interest accruing between the date of the demand and the date of the verdict. Accordingly, the judgment is affirmed on condition that the defendants in error will, within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Hart county, write off all interest in excess of $566.57. This amount is the interest upon the principal found by the jury from the date of the demand up to the time the verdict was returned, calculated at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. If the defendants in error decline to write off the excess of interest in accordance with this judgment, then a new trial is granted.

JARRETT V. CITY ELECTRIC RY. CO.

WRIT OF ERROR—DISMISSAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—PROCESS—AMENDMENT—SERVICE.

1. Where it clearly appears that in the trial of the questions brought up by a bill of exceptions, no evidence was introduced before the trial judge, the writ of error will not be dismissed because the bill of exceptions does not expressly state that no evidence was introduced.

2. Where Jarrett brought suit against a street railway company, and the plaintiff's name was properly stated in the body of the original petition, but was written "Jarvitt" in the "backing" of the petition and in the caption of the process annexed by the clerk, and was also written "Jarvitt" in the copy petition and in the caption of the copy process served upon the defendant, and on the trial the court allowed the name of the plaintiff to be corrected in the caption of the process, in the "backing" of the petition, and on the docket, prior to which time the defendant had answered to the merits, it was not necessary that the process as amended should be served upon the defendant. If, in consequence of the amendment, the defendant was unprepared to go to trial, the court would doubtless have granted it time for preparation.

3. In such case it was therefore error for the court to dismiss the case because the plaintiff refused to have the defendant served with the process as amended.

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. Regardless of whether the answer to the petition was good as a plea of payment, evidence in support of such a defense was admitted without objection, and it was therefore not error for the court to charge the law on that subject. Howard v. Barrett, 52 Ga. 15; Rattee v. Chapman, 4 S. E. 684, 79 Ga. 574; Savannah Ry. v. Grogan, 43 S. E. 701, 117 Ga. 464.

2. While part of the charge excepted to was more or less confusing, it was not made to appear in the motion for a new trial that the complaining party was injuriously affected thereby. The contentions of the parties were fairly submitted to the jury.

3. The evidence leaves much room for doubt on the controlling issues of the case, but there was some evidence from which the jury might fairly have inferred that the settlement shown to have been effected between the plaintiff and the defendant's intestate covered the matters in controversy in the present action. The trial judge was satisfied with the verdict, and his refusal to grant a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of evidence will not be held error.

E. B. HUNTING & CO. v. QUARTERMAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE.

1. There was sufficient evidence to support a finding that the plaintiff's decedent used the staging, the collapse of which caused his death, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the defendants. In such a case it was their duty to exercise ordinary care and diligence for his safety.

2. The evidence objected to was not shown to have been of sufficient materiality, even if inadmissible, to injuriously affect the rights of the defendants; the charge of the court fully and fairly presented to the jury the issues involved; and the evidence warranted the verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; Pope Barrow, Judge.

Action by Hattie Quarterman against E. B. Hunting & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

O'Connor, O'Byrne & Hartridge, for plaintiffs in error. Adams & Adams, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. Hunting & Co. were in the lumber business in Savannah, and, in connection with their business, loaded vessels at their docks on the Savannah river. Quarterman was employed by them as foreman of a gang of workmen. His home was in Savannah. While Quarterman was engaged in work for his employers on the northern side of the Savannah river, or the side furthest from the city of Savannah, other employes of Hunting & Co. were loading a vessel on the southern side. To aid in this work, staging had been erected, supported by a rope suspended from the vessel. While Quarterman and the men under him were at work on the northern side of the river, the tide began to ebb, making it impracticable for them to continue their work until several hours had elapsed, and they proceeded to cross the river in a small boat. In landing, they rowed to the vessel which was being loaded, with the intention of crossing the staging before mentioned, and thus getting out on the dock. Quarterman remained in the boat while several of the workmen got out on the staging, when the rope supporting the staging broke, precipitating the staging upon Quarterman, inflicting injuries upon him from which he subsequently died. His widow brought suit against Hunting & Co., alleging that the staging, rope, and tackle were insecure and defective; that this was, or should have been, known by the defendants; and that Quarterman could not, in the exercise of ordinary care, have known that such was the case. On the trial the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $3,000. The defendants made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and they excepted.

1. The point upon which this case mainly turns, and upon which most stress is placed by counsel for both the plaintiff and the defendants, is whether, under the evidence, Quarterman had the right to use this staging as a landing place, or, in other words, to quote from the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, "the pressure of the case * * * is on the question whether Quarterman, in using the staging as a landing place, was accepting an invitation of the plaintiffs in error, or was merely a licensee or trespasser." It seems clear that the staging was not designed for use as a landing place, but it seems equally clear that, as a matter of convenience, similar staging on other vessels being loaded by the defendants was so used by their employes; that this was well known to the representatives of the defendants; and that no objection was made by them to the use of the staging for this purpose. There was also evidence which, if believed by the jury, would lead them to find that on the occasion of Quarterman's injuries the regular and usual landing place for the workmen in the employment of the defendants was obstructed, and that it was necessary for them, in order to get on shore, to cross this staging. Quarterman, separated from the city of Savannah by the width of the Savannah river, was entitled, so far as it lay within the province of the defendants to provide him with the means of transit to and from his work, to rely on the reasonable safety of the means so provided; and if the ordinary landing places were obstructed, and it was necessary for him to cross the staging in order to reach the dock, ordinary care and diligence were required of the defendants to see that the staging and its appurtenances were reasonably safe for the purposes to which they were, with their knowledge and approval, put. The case is somewhat analogous to that of an employe of a factory, to whom is owed, as an incident of the duty of the master to provide a safe place to work, the duty to keep reasonably safe the means of ingress to and egress from the place where the work is done. A careful reading of the evidence leads inevitably to the conclusion that there was ample warrant for a finding that the use of the staging by Quarterman as a landing place was with the full knowledge and acquiescence of the defendants, if not that their own act rendered such use on this occasion necessary. Knowing that the staging was likely to be put to this use by their employes from time to time, it was incumbent upon the defendants to exercise ordinary care and diligence for the safety of those who might pass over it. Bullard v. Southern R. Co., 116 Ga. 644, 43 S. E. 39.

2. The motion for a new trial, as amended, contains numerous grounds, but none of them disclose any error of sufficient importance to require a reversal of the judgment of the court below. In one ground error is assigned on the admission of evidence as to a conversation between a witness and the mate of the vessel which was being loaded at the time Quarterman was injured, but, as the evidence objected to was not set out in the motion, this court cannot tell whether its admission was erroneous or not. Error is assigned on the admission of other evidence on the ground of irrelevancy, but it is not made to appear from the motion that the evidence, even if not material, was of sufficient importance to require the grant of a new trial; and, in view of the certificate of the trial judge as to these grounds of the motion, it cannot be said that they disclose any error. It is complained that the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If you find in this case for the plaintiff, the form of your verdict would be, 'We, the jury, find for the plaintiff,' and assess the damages at so much, naming a round sum." We cannot agree with the contention of counsel for the plaintiff in error that this was equivalent to instructing the jury that, in the event they should find for the plaintiff, their verdict should be for a substantial amount; and, while the expression "round sum" was not altogether happy, we cannot hold that it affords ground for a new trial. Complaint is made of numerous other extracts from the judge's charge, but most of these have, in effect, been disposed of in the ruling made in the first division of this opinion. The charge was, in the main, accurate, and fairly presented the issues involved to the consideration of the jury. There was abundant evidence that the rope which supported the staging, the fall of which caused the death of Quarterman, was defective when it was furnished to the employes of the defendants; that its defective condition was called to the attention of their representative, who refused to furnish any other; and that Quarterman had nothing to put him on notice of this defect, and was wholly without blame.

The verdict for the plaintiff was fully warranted, and the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial is affirmed. All the Justices concur.

1. Where the report of an auditor is filed after the time provided by the order of court referring the case to him, the remedy of the party objecting to the finding of the auditor is to file exceptions to the report in the court in which the case is being tried. *Peavy v. It is too late, after the auditor's report has been passed upon by the judge of the superior court, and the judgment of that court brought here by bill of exceptions and affirmed, to raise the question of the jurisdiction of the auditor to file his report after the time allowed by the order, by a petition for injunction seeking to restrain the enforcement of the judgment of the superior court. *Civ. WESTERN & A. R. CO. v. CORDER.

CERTIORARI—PAYMENT OF COSTS—CERTIFICATE—BOND.

1. A receipt, signed by a justice of the peace whose judgment is sought to be reviewed on certiorari, showing that the plaintiff in certiorari has paid to him a named sum "in full of all costs to date" (the date of the application for certiorari) in the case in which the judgment complained of was rendered, substantially meets the requirement of the Civil Code of 1895, § 4639, that the party applying for the writ of certiorari must produce a certificate, from the officer whose judgment is the subject-matter of complaint, that all costs which may have accrued on the trial below have been paid.

2. When a certiorari is sustained and the case sent back for another hearing, the certiorari bond becomes functus officio; the security thereon is discharged from further liability, and may become security on a subsequent certiorari bond in the same case.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company against S. A. Corder. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order dismissing a certiorari, defendant brings error. Reversed.

Payne & Tye and R. J. & J. McCamy, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Mann, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. This case comes up on exceptions to the dismissal of a certiorari by the judge of the superior court. The grounds on which the judge rested his judgment were (1) that the security on the certiorari bond was the same as that on a former certiorari bond given by the same party in the same case, the first certiorari having been sustained and the case remanded for another hearing; and (2) that the petition for certiorari was not accompanied by a certificate of the magistrate that all the costs had been paid as required by law. Attached to the petition for certiorari was the following writing, signed by the magistrate: "Received of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company the sum of five $\frac{45}{100}$ dollars, in full of all costs to date in the case of S. A. Corder v. W. & A. R. R. Co. This 30th day of Jan., 1901."

1. We do not hesitate to hold that the receipt of the magistrate answered every requirement of the law as to the necessary certificate of the payment of costs, and that this ground furnished no good reason for dismissing the certiorari. The Civil Code of 1895, § 4639, does not prescribe any special form of certificate by the magistrate. The primary object of that section is that there shall be a writing under the hand of the justice of the peace showing that all the costs which have accrued in his court have been paid. An itemized statement of costs, receipted by the magistrate, but not stating that it embraces all the costs which have accrued, will not meet this requirement, because it is entirely consistent with the hypothesis that only a part of the costs have been paid. Savannah, etc., R. Co. v. Shell, 72 Ga. 201. In the present case, however, the receipt of the magistrate showed, in effect, that all the costs which had accrued in his court had been paid, and this will not be held defective merely for lack of the technical words, "I certify," etc. See, in this connection, Williams v. Shuler, 94 Ga. 660, 19 S. E. 981.

2. The main point for decision in this case is whether, when a case has been taken by certiorari to the superior court, the certiorari sustained, and the case sent back to the magistrate for another hearing, the surety on the certiorari bond is still liable for the eventual condemnation money, and therefore ineligible to act as surety on a subsequent certiorari bond in the same case. It is contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error that, when the first certiorari was sustained, the bond, which was a condition precedent to its issuance, became functus officio, and that therefore the surety could under no circumstances become liable thereon. We think there can be no doubt that this contention is sound. A proper decision of this question involves the construction, in pari materia, of sections 4639, 4655, and 4656 of the Civil Code of 1895. Section 4639 provides, in part, that with certain exceptions, before any writ of certiorari shall issue, the party applying therefor, his agent or attorney, shall give bond and good security, "conditioned to pay the adverse party in the cause the eventual condemnation-money, together with all future costs." Section 4655 provides that if, on the hearing, the certiorari shall be sustained and a final decision thereon made by the superior court, the plaintiff (in certiorari) may sign up judgment for the amount recovered by him in the court below, together with the costs paid to obtain the certiorari and the costs in the superior court; "but if the certiorari shall be returned to the court below for a new hearing, the plaintiff shall sign up judgment for the costs in said superior court only, leaving the costs paid to obtain the certiorari to abide the final trial below." Section 4656 provides for the judgment to be entered in the event the certiorari is dismissed and a final decision made by the superior court, and concludes with the provision that, "if said case be sent back to the court below, and there be a judgment in said case in favor of said defendant in the court below, the security on the certiorari bond shall then be included as in case of security on appeal." The title of this last section is: "If the certiorari is dismissed, judgment for the defendant." When read in connection with sections 4639 and 4655, the words "if said case be sent back to the court below," etc., would seem clearly to contemplate the sending of the case back for final judgment in favor of the defendant in certiorari after a decision in his favor in the superior court. In other words, where the judge of the superior court decides the case in favor of the defendant in certiorari, but for any reason declines to enter final judgment, and sends the case back to the justice's court with direction that judgment there be rendered, finally for the defendant in certiorari, the security on the certiorari bond then becomes liable as in case of security on appeal. This construction of the words quoted is entirely reasonable and consistent with the other portions of the section, while any other construction would involve a hopeless conflict with section 4655. In that section explicit direction is given for the rendition of judgment in just such a case as the present, where the certiorari is returned for another hearing; and it is there provided that the plaintiff shall have judgment for the costs in the superior court only, leaving the costs paid to obtain the certiorari to abide the final trial below. It could not have been the intention of the law-making body to provide that the security on a certiorari bond should be liable on the bond regardless of the outcome of the hearing of the certiorari. The case may very properly be analogized to that of the surety on a supersedeas bond given by a plaintiff in error in this court, who is liable only for the costs of prosecuting the writ of error in this court, and not for the amount of the verdict that may finally be rendered in the case. Franklin v. Kriegshaber, 114 Ga. 947, 41 S. E. 47. It follows, then, that the surety offered by the plaintiff in certiorari on its bond was not, for any reason given, objectionable, and that the court erred in dismissing the certiorari.

MONK et al. v. McDANIEL.

ADOPTION—PROCEDURE—HABEAS CORPUS—CUSTODY OF INFANT.

1. The Code of Alabama of 1896, § 367, provides that any person desiring to adopt a child "may make a declaration in writing * * * which, being acknowledged by the declarant before the judge of probate of the county of his residence, filed," and recorded, has the effect of adopting the child. If such a declaration shows on its face that the declarant did not reside in the county in which it was acknowledged, filed, and recorded, but in another county of the state, the proceedings were void, and the declarant cannot invoke the same in this state as giving him the right to the custody and control of the child. The probate judge in such a proceeding does not act as a judicial, but as a ministerial, officer; nor will any statements made by him to the declarant as to the immateriality of the latter's place of residence render the adoption proceedings valid.

2. When this case was here before, and reversed upon the ground that the plaintiffs in error were the parents by adoption of the child whose custody was in question, the point above decided was not made or dealt with, but arose upon the second trial. The proceeding to adopt the child being now decided to have been void, and the trial judge having found, upon sufficient evidence, that the defendant in error was a fit and suitable person to take charge of the child, and had sufficient means to maintain such child, and the plaintiffs in error having shown no better right, there was no abuse of discretion in awarding the custody of the child to the defendant in error, and dismissing the writ of habeas corpus.

INJURY TO EMPLOYE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The summary of the contentions of the parties must embrace every material issue made by the pleadings. Where a plaintiff bases his action upon two alleged acts of negligence by the defendant as causing the injury complained of, the omission by the court to state plaintiff's contention as to one of the alleged acts of negligence, and to charge the law appropriate thereto, is error.

2. One is bound to use ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence, but this duty does not arise until the negligence of such other is existing, or is apparent, or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent person would have reason to apprehend the existence.

Action by Major Freeman, by his next friend, against the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

E. P. Treadaway, Harris, Chamlee & Harris, and Dean & Dean, for plaintiff in error. Payne & Tye and W. J. Neel, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. Major Freeman, by his next friend, sued the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway Company for certain injuries alleged to have been sustained because of the railroad's negligence while he was engaged in loading brick on defendant's cars. The railroad company had extended a spur track to the yards of the Rome Brick Company, and placed necessary cars on this spur track to be loaded with brick. Whenever it was necessary, the car, in process of being loaded, was temporarily shifted, so as to enable the railroad company to move out the loaded cars and station the empty ones. At the time of the alleged injury the plaintiff was in the employ of the brick company, and was engaged in loading an open car (usually used for hauling coal) with brick. He stood on the ground, and was pitching the brick to another employé in the car, who arranged them in tiers. The work of loading the car had progressed to the extent of six rows of brick, each row containing ten layers, when the switch engine and some empty cars were observed coming on the spur track where the car which was being loaded was stationed. The brick company's agent, who was superintending the loading, directed plaintiff to get on the partially loaded car to prevent the brick from falling when the switch engine undertook to couple to this car for the purpose of moving it. While so engaged, the coupling was made, and the brick were knocked down on plaintiff. Thus far in the narrative of the occurrences there is no substantial difference between the parties. The plaintiff contended, and offered evidence tending to show, that the coupling was made with unusual violence; that he did not know, nor had he any opportunity of knowing, that there was a hole in the bottom of the car; and that his foot became pinioned in this hole, and the brick fell on him, inflicting serious injuries. The defendant contended, and offered evidence tending to show, that the coupling was effected in the usual manner, without unnecessary violence, and that the other men in the car got out of the way of the brick, and were uninjured, and that, if plaintiff was injured at all, the injuries were of a trivial nature. The acts of negligence charged in the petition were the manner of making the coupling, which was alleged to be severe, violent, and reckless, and the furnishing by defendant of a car in which there was a hole in the bottom. The trial judge, in his summary of the plaintiff's contentions, wholly failed to refer to plaintiff's allegation of defendant's negligence in furnishing a car with a hole in the floor, and the omission is alleged as error.

1. It is the duty of the court undertaking to state the contentions to give to the jury the contentions on every substantial issue in the case. The petition alleged that the defendant was negligent in two specific particulars, only one of which was stated to the jury. The plaintiff might have escaped injury from the coupling of the cars but for the hole in the bottom of the car, through which he alleges that his foot passed, and prevented him from getting out of the way of the falling brick. If the company was not negligent in making the coupling, but was negligent in its failure to furnish a proper car, the plaintiff was entitled to have this alleged act of the defendant's negligence submitted to the jury. If the defendant was negligent in furnishing a defective car, and the plaintiff did not know of the defect, nor, in the exercise of ordinary diligence, could have known of such defect, and sustained an injury because of this defect, he would be entitled to recover, if, by the exercise of ordinary care, he could not have avoided the consequence of the defendant's negligence. The petition made this issue, and the plaintiff was entitled to have it submitted to the jury.

2. The errors alleged in the remaining grounds of the amended motion relate to certain charges which plaintiff in error criticises as not being adjusted to the facts of the case, and as eliminating the doctrine of contributory negligence. The charges complained of contained literal excerpts from the opinion of Justice Cobb in Western & Atlantic R. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 Ga. 708, 39 S. E. 306, 54 L. R. A. 802, and are adjusted to the particular facts of the case at bar, and are not open to the criticism made against them. The substance of the charges given was that one is bound to use ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence, but this duty does not arise until the negligence of such other is existing, or is apparent, or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent person would have reason to apprehend the existence.

There was no error in giving the charges complained of, and a new trial is granted because of the error stated in the first division of this opinion.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

COLLEY v. SOUTHERN COTTON OIL CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

FELLOW SERVANTS—DANGEROUS PREMISES—PLEADING—AMENDMENTS.

1. Employés in the service of and subject to the same general control and direction of a common master, and whose labor conduces to the same general purpose, are fellow servants, although they may be employed in different departments of duty, and so far removed from each other as that one can in no degree control or influence the conduct of the other. Davis v. Muscogee Mfg. Co., 32 S. E. 30, 106 Ga. 126; Kerr v. Crown Cotton Mills, 81 S. E. 166, 105 Ga. 510; Brush Electric Light Co. v. Wells, 35 S. E. 365, 110 Ga. 192, followed.

2. It is the duty of a master to furnish his employé with a safe place to work, and where the employé is injured in consequence of a breach of this duty he may recover, even though the negligence of a fellow servant may have contributed to the injury.

3. While the allegations of the original petition with reference to the matters referred to in the note just preceding were somewhat vague and indefinite, there was enough in the petition to amend by. The amendment offered was properly allowed, and the petition as amended set forth a cause of action.

certain amendments. Judgment on main bills of exceptions reversed, on cross-bill affirmed.

Hawkins & Weddington and T. W. Hardwick, for plaintiff in error. Dessau, Harris & Harris, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Colley sued the Southern Cotton Oil Company, alleging in his original petition as follows: Some time prior to October 24, 1901, defendant employed plaintiff to labor in the capacity of carpenter at and about its factory, doing such work as his superiors would order him to do. Defendant had a cotton press in the second story of its building, in which the lint taken from cotton seed was packed into bales. Alvin Gibson was an employé of defendant, and his duty was to prepare and press or pack the cotton. At the time plaintiff was employed there were two long skids running obliquely from the door of the pressing room to the ground, upon which the bales of cotton were transmitted from the pressing room to the ground. Under these skids there was a passageway from one part of the yard to another, which was used by defendant's employés. There was no other passageway, all the other space in the yard being filled with cotton seed hulls, etc. On or about October 15, 1901, the skids broke, and were removed from the yard. The breaking and removing of the skids was known to defendant's superintendent in charge of the plant, and also to its general manager, whose duty it was to have the skids repaired or replaced with new ones. On October 24, 1901, plaintiff was engaged in the performance of his duties, and while passing from one part of the yard to another, in order to secure a certain piece of timber necessary to be used in the work he was then doing, while just under the door of defendant's pressroom, Alvin Gibson, without any warning to the plaintiff whatever, threw out of said pressroom door a bale of cotton, striking plaintiff on the head and shoulders, violently crushing him to the ground. Plaintiff had no knowledge of the fact that the bale of cotton would be thrown from the pressroom door, had no means of knowing that it would be done, and could not have known of it by the exercise of ordinary care. Gibson was ordered by the superintendent to throw the cotton out from the pressroom door. The defendant was negligent in that it failed to repair the broken skids or to replace them with new ones. The defendant was grossly and criminally negligent in knowingly permitting its agent, Gibson, to throw the cotton out of the pressroom door in such a reckless manner. Defendant owed plaintiff the duty of informing him that cotton would be thrown from the door, in order that he might have been on the lookout. The recklessness and negligence of Gibson in throwing the cotton out of the door shows him to have been an unskilled servant, and this was known to defendant.

The plaintiff was free from fault, and the consequences of defendant's negligence could not have been prevented by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence on his part. The petition describes the injuries, and prays for damages in the sum of $20,000. By amendments duly allowed the following allegations were made: Defendant's superintendent, referred to in the original petition, had, at the time of giving the order therein mentioned, full control, direction, and supervision of all the employés of defendant; all of them being subject to his orders. The superintendent was defendant's vice principal during the entire month of October. The superintendent was grossly negligent in giving the order referred to. Gibson, the employé, was negligent in throwing cotton at all from the pressroom door, and negligent in doing this without warning plaintiff that he was about to do so. Defendant is responsible for such negligence. At the time of the accident plaintiff had no notice or knowledge or information that defendant or any of its employés had ever thrown cotton from the pressroom door, and had no reason to consider it dangerous or hazardous to pass by the same. Plaintiff was employed as a carpenter to do repair work and carpenter work on the various buildings about the plant of defendant, and his work had no connection with the business of defendant, which was manufacturing seed into oil, and had no connection with the business of repairing and packing or pressing cotton after the seed had been taken therefrom. While plaintiff and Gibson were subject to the control and direction of the same general master, they were not engaged in the accomplishment of the same general object. The pressroom door was nine feet above the ground. The other amendment alleged: At the time the superintendent and vice principal of defendant gave the order to throw the cotton from the pressroom door he directed Gibson and the other employés in that department to throw the cotton down as fast as the same was ready to be thrown down, and about two bales per day were pressed and packed and thrown down. The order was that all cotton should be thrown from the pressroom door until the skids were repaired. The superintendent well knew that, in order for this order to be obeyed, the cotton would have to be thrown down during working hours, and while many of the employés of the defendant were constantly and necessarily using the passageway under the pressroom door; that the distance from the door to the ground was nine feet, and the average weight of the bales of cotton thrown down was 500 pounds, the actual weight of the bale which struck plaintiff being 508 pounds. Plaintiff alleges that under these circumstances the giving of the order was gross and wanton carelessness on the part of the superintendent, for which the defendant is responsible.

The defendant demurred to the original petition, and also to the petition as amended, and the demurrers were sustained. The plaintiff assigns error upon the judgment sustaining the demurrers, and the defendant, by cross-bill of exceptions, assigns error upon the allowance of the amendments.

It is contended that the original petition set forth a state of facts from which it appeared that the injuries sustained by the plaintiff were the result of the negligence of a fellow servant; that, therefore, it set forth no cause of action, and there was nothing to amend by. Counsel for the plaintiff in error candidly concede in their brief that under the ruling in Davis v. Muscogee Mfg. Co., 106 Ga. 126, 32 S. E. 30, and Kerr v. Crown Cotton Mills, 105 Ga. 510, 31 S. E. 166, the plaintiff and Gibson were fellow servants, and that, if these cases are to be followed, the demurrer was properly sustained, unless the original petition can be construed as setting up negligence on the part of the master in failing to furnish the plaintiff a safe place to work, or in failing to keep the same safe after having furnished it. They ask leave to review these cases, and that they be overruled, contending that they are unsound in principle; but after consideration we must decline to overrule the same. Since the decision in Brush Electric Light Company v. Wells, 110 Ga. 192, 35 S. E. 365, the principle of the decisions referred to has been steadfastly adhered to, and must now be considered as the settled law of this state. The case of Bain v. Athens Foundry, 75 Ga. 718, relied on by counsel as controlling, was distinguished by Mr. Justice Fish in the Wells Case, and, in addition to this, was a decision by only two justices, and for that reason not controlling. It is to be determined, therefore, whether the original petition, properly construed, sets forth any averments of negligence of the master which would charge the defendant independently of the negligence of the fellow servant, or which were connected therewith in such a way that the fact that the act of a fellow servant contributed to the injury would not relieve the master from liability for his neglect. The petition alleged that a passageway was furnished for the plaintiff and the other employes, which at the time it was furnished was perfectly safe; that it had been rendered unsafe by the breaking of the skids, and that the absence of the skids brought about a new use for the passageway—that is, as a place for throwing bales of cotton from the door above; and that this new use was the result of an order from one who was to be considered as representing the master. Construing the petition as a whole, it is to be clearly drawn therefrom that this change in the use of the passageway was made under the direction of the master, without notice to the plaintiff, who was accustomed to use the passageway, whose safety was imperiled by the new use to which it was placed. While the throwing of the bale into the passageway was the act of a fellow servant, and one of the risks which the plaintiff would have taken if he had been informed that the passageway was to be put to this use, the new use to which the passageway was put was not the act of a fellow servant, but the act of the master, and the dangers incident to such use was not one of the risks assumed by the plaintiff until he had been put on notice that that part of the premises was to be used in a different manner from that in which it was used at the time of his employment. See, in this connection, 1 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 28. So construing the petition, it set forth a cause of action, and the amendments were allowable, being simply an amplification of the somewhat general averments of the petition.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed; on cross-bill affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

O'NEILL MFG. CO. v. HARRIS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 10, 1904.)

FORTHCOMING BOND—ACTION—PARTIES—PLEADING.

1. Suit may be brought on a forthcoming bond in the name of the officer to whom the bond was made payable, though he may have retired from office prior to the bringing of the action.

2. The petition in the present case sufficiently alleged the failure to produce the property, and the circumstances necessary to establish the plaintiff's right to bring the suit.

3. In an action on a forthcoming bond, it is not necessary that the execution levied on the property for the production of which the bond was given be set out in the petition, or attached thereto as an exhibit.

4. A petition in such a case is not defective in failing to allege that the property in controversy is that of the plaintiff in execution.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Floyd County; J. H. Reece, Judge.

Action by O. I. Harris, for use, etc., against the O'Neill Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Denny & Harris, for plaintiff in error. Griffith & Weatherly and C. E. Carpenter, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. This was an action on a forthcoming bond given by a claimant of property which had been levied upon under executions from a justice's court. The action was brought in the name of Harris, the constable to whom the bond was made payable, for the use of the plaintiff in execution. At the time the suit was commenced, Harris was no longer constable, having been succeeded in office by Byars, and the action was brought by him as "former constable of said county." The case is now before this court on exceptions to the overruling of a demurrer to the petition.

1. The principal question raised by the de-murrer is whether the suit could be brought by Harris after his retirement from the office of constable, or should have been instituted in the name of his successor, Byars. The purpose of a forthcoming bond is to indemnify the levying officer. Aycock v. Austin, 87 Ga. 566, 13 S. E. 582; Turner v. Camp, 110 Ga. 632, 36 S. E. 76. While, in claim cases, he is required to take a proper bond, when tendered him by the claimant, the responsibility is upon him to see to the correctness of the bond and the solvency of the security. Civ. Code 1895, § 4614. For failure to discharge his duty in this respect he may be held liable after his retirement from office, and it necessarily follows that to his successor, who had nothing to do with the levy or the taking of the bond, no liability attaches. The responsibility incident to the acceptance of a forthcoming bond is personal to the officer who takes it, and hence the bond is made payable to him alone, and not also to his successors in office. Consequently, upon a breach of the bond, the obligee therein, for whose individual protection it was given, may institute suit on the instrument for the use of the plaintiff in execution; and this is so notwithstanding the fact that the plaintiff has, prior to the bringing of the action, gone out of office. Whether the suit may also be brought by the succeeding officer, as the one entitled to the legal custody of the property, quære?

2. The demurrer also attacks the petition on the ground that "no failure to deliver the property to the levying officer is shown or alleged; that no connection is shown between the plaintiff in this case and W. M. Byars; that no right is shown in said W. M. Byars to execute or take part in the execution of the justice court process referred to in the petition." This ground of the demurrer is wholly without merit. The petition distinctly alleges the failure of the claimant to deliver the property in accordance with the terms of the bonds. The only "connection" necessary to be established between the plaintiff and Byars is set up in the recital of the fact, as alleged, that the plaintiff was the officer making the levy, and to whom the bond is payable, and that Byars is his successor in office; and this in itself was a sufficient allegation of Byars' right to execute the processes of the court whose officer he was.

3. It is also contended that the petition was defective, in that the fi. fas. which were the basis of the levy on the property to which the claim was interposed were not set out in the petition, or attached as an exhibit thereto. We are not aware of any law of pleading which would render necessary, in a case like the present, the incorporation of the fi. fas. in question in the petition. No authority to support this contention is cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error, and we are satisfied that no such authority exists. The bonds themselves are set out literally in the petition, and this was all that was required. Gibson v. Robinson, 90 Ga. 756, 16 S. E. 969, 35 Am. St. Rep. 250.

4. Nor was it a good ground of demurrer that the petition failed to allege that the property in dispute was the property of the plaintiff in execution. In an action on a forthcoming bond, no issue can properly be raised as to the title to the property involved. The only question to be decided is whether or not there has been a breach of the bond. As was said by Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley in Anderson v. Banks, 92 Ga. 122, 18 S. E. 364: "It is not allowable for a claimant to defeat a sale by interposing a claim, and then appropriate the property to his own use, or suffer it to be appropriated by his surety on the claim bond, and then contest, not in the claim case—the very case appointed by law for the purpose—but in a suit on the bond, the right of the plaintiff in execution to sell the property."

The foregoing disposes of all the points made by the demurrer, and necessarily leads to an affirmance of the judgment of the court below. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

THOMPSON v. GLOVER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 10, 1904.)

ACTION AGAINST INTRUDERS—DEFENSE—GOOD FAITH—EVIDENCE.

1. In a proceeding under Civ. Code 1895, § 4808, against intruders, the defendant cannot be evicted, if in good faith he claims a legal right to the possession of the land.

2. While on an issue involving "good faith" a party may testify as to his mental state, the jury are not concluded by what he says in reference thereto, but may test its truthfulness by comparing such claim with all the circumstances attending the transaction.

3. Where, however, there were circumstances amply sufficient to warrant the defendant in contending that the deed under which the plaintiff claimed was void because made by the grantor, when, from her age and mental infirmity, she was unable to contract, and he therefore in good faith claimed the right of possession as one of her heirs at law, and there was no evidence to contradict such claim of good faith, a verdict finding him an intruder was contrary to the evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Glascock County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Action by J. M. Glover, by his next friend, against Lawson Thompson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Mrs. Lowe was the owner of a tract of land in Glascock county, consisting of 95 acres, on which she resided, but which was rented to her son Lawson Thompson. He had been in possession as tenant for many years, and so remained until the time of her death, in 1900. Mrs. Lowe was about 90 years of age, and shortly before her death made a deed to this land to her great-grandchildren, the Glovers, subject to her life estate. After her death Lawson Thompson continued in possession, but the Glovers rented the land to his son Frank Thompson, who lived in another county, and who is not shown to have taken possession of the rented premises, nor is there any direct evidence that he sublet to his father. When the rent note became due, it was sent to a justice of the peace, who presented it to Lawson Thompson for payment, which was declined; he insisting that the deed to the Glovers was void, as having been made at a time when, on account of her physical and mental condition, Mrs. Lowe was incapacitated to make a valid conveyance. The evidence leaves it very doubtful as to who finally paid the rent note; the justice of the peace who received the money being uncertain as to whether it was paid by Lawson Thompson, or by John Thompson, another of his sons. The Glovers instituted a proceeding under Civ. Code 1895, § 4808, against Lawson Thompson, as an intruder. He defended on the ground that he did in good faith claim a legal right to the possession of the property as one of his mother's heirs at law, contending that the deed to the Glovers was void. His counsel requested the court to charge, in effect, that, even if the jury should find that the deed to the Glovers was valid, that they rented to Frank Thompson, and that Lawson Thompson recognized such contract, and was in as a subtenant, and remained in after the expiration of the term, he could not be proceeded against as an intruder, but that he could only be ousted under the proceedings authorized against tenants holding over. This request was refused. The jury found in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant's motion for a new trial having been overruled, he excepted.

Rogers & Stephens and B. F. Walker, for plaintiff in error. K. J. Hawkins, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. In a proceeding under Civ. Code 1895, § 4808, against intruders, the legality of the possession depends on the legality of the original entry. Murdock v. Miller, 21 Ga. 388; McHan v. Stansell, 39 Ga. 199; Durden v. Clack, 94 Ga. 278, 21 S. E. 521. The issue is good faith, rather than good title. Of course, a party may testify to his mental state, and that he claims possession in good faith. But that does not close the question, nor prevent the jury from testing the reasonableness and truthfulness of that statement by comparing it with all the facts and circumstances attending the transaction. Baxley v. Baxley, 117 Ga. 63, 43 S. E. 436. Had there been any conflict on this subject, or any facts from which a want of good faith could have been inferred, the approval of the verdict by the trial judge would not be disturbed. But here the contradicted testimony is that Mrs. Lowe extremely aged and very feeble. Even the witnesses for the plaintiff admitted that she was "childish" and "very peculiar." The testimony of the defendant and of the attending physician went more into details, and tended to establish facts calculated to warrant the claim, in the utmost good faith, that she had not mental capacity to make the deed. When, therefore, the circumstances warranted the contention, and there was nothing to contradict the statement of Lawson Thompson that he in good faith claimed possession of this property as one of her heirs at law, a verdict finding that he was an intruder was contrary to evidence.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

STONECIPHER v. WILSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 10, 1904.)

INJUNCTION — TRESPASS — RESPONSIBILITY OF DEFENDANTS.

1. This was an application to restrain the cutting of timber, based upon the grounds that the defendants were insolvent and that the damages would be irreparable. No other equitable reason for granting an injunction was alleged, nor was there anything in the petition which would bring it within the provisions of the timber cutter's act, embraced in Civ. Code 1895, § 4927. Held, that the evidence being insufficient to show that the damages would be irreparable, and there being a conflict in the evidence as to whether the defendants were able to respond in damages, the discretion of the trial judge in refusing to grant an injunction will not be controlled.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by Estelle Stonecipher against B. O. Wilson and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. E. Mann, for plaintiff in error. Shumate & Maddox and R. J. & J. McCamy, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. This was an application to restrain the cutting of timber. The judge refused to grant an injunction, and the plaintiff excepted. The application was based only upon the grounds that the defendants were insolvent, and that the damages alleged would be irreparable. There was no other equitable reason alleged for the granting of the injunction; nor was there any attempt on the part of the pleader to bring the case within the provisions of the timber cutter's act, embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 4927. The petition alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of the land, but no abstract of title of any character was attached to the petition. The right of the plaintiff to an injunction depended, therefore, upon whether it was established to the satisfaction of the judge either that the defendants were insolvent, or that the damages would be irreparable. The evidence at the hearing was not of such a character as to authorize a finding that the damages would be irreparable. The petition alleged that the defendants were not able to respond in damages. This was denied in the answer. The only evidence before the judge on the subject of insolvency was the verified petition and the verified answer. As there was a direct conflict on this vitally material point, the discretion of the judge in refusing to grant the injunction will not be controlled. See, in this connection, Wiggins v. Middleton, 117 Ga. 162, 43 S. E. 432.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

CANTON COTTON MILLS v. EDWARDS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 10, 1904.)

INFANTS—CAPACITY—INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—PETITION.

1. While the statute has arbitrarily declared that children under 10 years of age shall not be held criminally responsible, yet, in view of their varying mental and physical capacities, it has not fixed the age at which they may be employed to work.

2. Such question is not to be determined as a matter of law by the courts, but as a matter of fact by the jury.

3. The petition was not subject to demurrer, in view of the allegations that the plaintiff had not been warned, and, by reason of his tender years, was unable to appreciate the dangers, or to remember, understand, or act upon warnings that might have been given as to what was necessary to protect himself while working in the midst of moving machinery.

Error from Superior Court, Cherokee County; Geo. F. Gober, Judge.

Action by Wylie Edwards, by his next friend, against the Canton Cotton Mills. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Wylie Edwards, by his next friend, brought suit against the Canton Cotton Mills for personal injuries, alleging: That on February 10, 1902, the plaintiff, being a child 10 years old, was employed to sweep floors and make bands for the spinning room. That, in order to get water to drink, it was necessary for him to pass the entire length of defendant's factory, filled with swiftly moving machinery, and that after obtaining a drink of water, and while returning, it was necessary to pass a machine called a "finisher." That he stopped to observe the lap of cotton as it came out of the machine onto the roll. Boylike, and with no knowledge of the danger, he laid his hand on the roll, as he had seen the man in charge of the machine do, when, in some way unknown to the plaintiff, his hand was caught and drawn between the rolls, to his great damage. That plaintiff was not aware of the dangerous character of the machine, nor had he been warned of its danger. That he was so young as not to be aware of the dangerous character of defendant's machinery; nor was he capable of appreciating and guarding against such dangers; nor was he capable of understanding, remembering, and acting upon warnings that might have been given by defendant; and of all this defendant had full knowledge. That defendant was negligent, in that it retained in its employment, and required to be in its mills among its machinery, a child too young to realize and guard against a danger, and too young to appreciate and act upon any warning, and too young to work in such a place. That it was negligent in failing to warn him, and in failing so to guard its machinery as to make the factory safe for him to work in. That the defendant was negligent in not protecting him from dangers incident to work about a machine of whose dangers he knew nothing, and which, by reason of his youth and inexperience, he was incapable of guarding against. The defendant demurred on the grounds that the petition set out no cause of action; that the injury was the direct result of plaintiff's own negligence; that it was not negligence in defendant not to warn plaintiff, nor was it negligence to employ a child of the age of plaintiff, nor was it bound to inform him as to the dangerous machines in and about the mills on which plaintiff was not expected to work. The court overruled the demurrer, and the company excepted.

Geo. I. Teasley and P. P. Du Pre, for plaintiff in error. Burton Smith and Geo. Gordon, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. The age of majority and the age under which there can be no criminal responsibility have been arbitrarily declared by statute. But neither nature nor the courts have fixed any definite age at which children attain the capacity to work. In some children the mind outruns the body, and in others the body outgrows the mind. Some are weak and undeveloped at the age of 14, and others are strong and vigorous at 10. Some at an early age can hunt, drive, ride, swim, and work in many occupations with ordinary safety, while others of the same age, with even greater physical strength, by reason of want of experience, would be unable to engage in the same sports or labors without serious risk. The question of capacity, therefore, is not to be determined as a matter of law by the courts, but as a matter of fact by the jury; applying the principle involved in Civ. Code 1895, § 2901, which declares that "due care in a child of tender years is such care as its capacity, mental and physical, fits it for exercising in the actual circumstances of the occasion and situation under investigation." The petition alleged that the plaintiff was 10 years old, ignorant of the character of the machine and of the danger of working therewith as he had seen others do; that he had not been warned; that he was incapable of appreciating, remembering, or acting upon any warnings that might have been given him; and that the company was not only negligent in failing to warn plaintiff, but also in failing to guard its machinery so as to make the factory safe as a place in which to work. These allegations made it proper to overrule the demurrer. Compare Evans v. Josephine Mills, 119 Ga. 448, 46 S. E. 674.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

E. E. FORBES PIANO CO. v. OWENS et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 10, 1904.)

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—ATTACHMENT—JURISDICTION—GROUNDS—CERTIORARI.

1. An attachment in a suit to recover $100, besides interest and attorney's fees, is not within the jurisdiction of a justice's court, and the justice presiding therein has no power to allow an amendment to the pleadings in such a proceeding.

2. It is not a ground of attachment in this state that the defendant "has left the county." An attachment issued on such a ground is fatally defective, and cannot be amended; and, even if this were not so, the addition, after the words quoted, of the words "and absconded," would not cure the defect in the attachment.

3. Where, on the trial of a writ of certiorari from the judgment of a justice's court, it appears that the magistrate has entertained jurisdiction of an attachment involving more than $100, including attorney's fees, that the attachment was based on the ground mentioned in the last preceding headnote, and that the magistrate refused to dismiss the attachment on motion of the complaining party, but allowed the plaintiff to amend, the judge of the superior court should sustain the certiorari unconditionally, and render final judgment in favor of the plaintiff therein.

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County;
A. W. Flite, Judge.

Action by T. N. Owens and others against one Fields. Certain property was attached, and the E. E. Forbes Piano Company filed a claim thereto. Judgment for plaintiffs, and claimant brings error. Reversed.

H. F. Sharp and M. B. Eubanks, for plaintiff in error. Starr & Erwin, for defendants in error.

CANDLER, J. In a justice's court in Gordon county Owens et al. sued out an attachment against Fields, the ground of attachment being that Fields "has left this county," and the indebtedness alleged as the basis of the suit being $100, besides interest and attorney's fees. This attachment was levied on a piano as the property of the defendant, and a claim to the property was filed by the plaintiff in error, the E. E. Forbes Piano Company. On the trial of the claim case before the justice the claimant moved to dismiss the attachment because the affidavit on which it was based set out no ground of attachment under the laws of Georgia. This motion was overruled, and the plaintiffs were allowed, over objection of the claimant, to amend the attachment by inserting after the words "has left this county" the words "and absconded." The jury in the justice's court found the property subject to the attachment, and the claimant took the case by certiorari to the superior court. The bill of exceptions recites that the judge of the superior court passed an order "sustaining the judgment of the justice of the peace allowing the amendment to the attachment affidavit, * * * and reversing the verdict complained of on the grounds that the amount claimed, including attorney's fees, exceeded one hundred dollars, and ordered a new trial in said case, and directed the justice issuing the attachment to amend the same so as to make it returnable to the next term of Gordon superior court." Error is assigned upon "so much of said judgment as affirms the judgment of the magistrate in allowing the amendment to the attachment affidavit, and that part of the judgment directing the magistrate to so amend the affidavit and attachment as to make it returnable to the next term of Gordon superior court." The amount in controversy, including attorney's fees, being greater than $100, it is clear that the magistrate had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit or to try the claim filed to the property in dispute. Being without jurisdiction, it follows that he could not legally allow an amendment to the pleadings in the case. The attachment should have been made returnable to the superior court in the first instance, and in that court any proper amendment could have been offered and allowed. Be that as it may, however, it is clear from the answer of the magistrate to the writ of certiorari that the affidavit and attachment in the first instance were fatally defective, and not subject to amendment, and that even as amended the attachment should have been dismissed. There is no law in this state which authorizes the issuance of an attachment on the ground that the defendant "has left the county" in which the proceeding is brought. Attachment may issue to seize the property of one who "is actually removing, or about to remove, without the limits of the county"; but that is not this case. Originally, therefore, the attachment in this case was invalid whether returnable to the superior court or the justice's court, because issued on a ground which the law does not recognize as a foundation for the writ. In effect, then, there was no attachment before the court, and consequently nothing to amend. However, taking, as we must, the magistrate's answer as stating the truth of the proceedings in his court, the attachment was in no better condition after amendment than before. According to that answer, the attachment, as amended, was upon the ground that the defendant "has left this county and absconded." Attachment is a summary remedy, and must be strictly construed and pursued; and it has been held that an attachment is fatally defective which alleges as the ground for its issuance that the defendant "has absconded." Levy v. Millman, 7 Ga. 167:

¶ 1. See Justices of the Peace, vol. 31, Cent. Dig. §§ 154, 156, 329.

Brown v. McCluskey, 26 Ga. 577. See, also, Deupree v. Eisenach, 9 Ga. 599; De Leon v. Heller, 77 Ga. 740 (2b). In any view of the case, therefore, the magistrate should have dismissed the attachment; and the judge of the superior court, on certiorari, should not have sent the case back to the magistrate, but should have rendered final judgment in favor of the plaintiff in certiorari in accordance with the principles here announced.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

W. A. GREER & CO. v. RANEY et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 10, 1904.)

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS — ADVERSE POSSESSION — NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. There being in fact no dispute on the subject, it was not error for the judge to charge that there was "no dispute of the fact that the plaintiffs were the heirs of the common grantor." Southern Ry. Co. v. Chitwood, 45 S. E. 706, 119 Ga. 28.

2. Plaintiffs having made out a perfect paper title, and the evidence for the defendant failing to show continuous possession under color for seven years before the institution of the suit, the court did not err in failing to charge on the subject of prescription.

3. The newly discovered testimony as to the time when the adverse possession began was cumulative, and of a nature which could have been discovered by the exercise of the diligence required by law.

4. Some of the witnesses to the newly discovered facts had been examined at the trial, and that thereafter they had refreshed their memory as to the date when such possession began was not an absolute ground for the grant of a new trial, but a matter in the discretion of the trial judge.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Action by J. M. Raney and others against W. A. Greer & Co. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Raney, Bruce, Ward, and Christopher, alleging themselves to be the heirs and purchasers from the heirs of Gideon T. Braddy, brought suit against Greer & Co. for damage occasioned by cutting timber from lot No. 234 in the Second district of Wilcox county. For want of information, the defendants neither admitted nor denied that the plaintiffs were the heirs or successors in title of Braddy, but defended on the ground that they had entered "under perfect right, and had perfect right to enter upon and become possessed of the same"; that the plaintiffs have no interest in the land; and that the defendants entered on the lot in good faith, and have a perfect right to do so, under a lease for turpentine purposes from one Faitha Young, formerly Paulk. The plaintiffs made out a perfect paper title, supplementing it by proof that they were the heirs or purchasers from the heirs of Braddy, and the defendants offered no evidence on this subject. The judge charged that there was no dispute as to the plaintiffs being the heirs of Braddy. The defendants claimed under a paper title, the first link of which was a deed from Braddy to Allen Smith, dated August 25, 1868, but which was satisfactorily shown to be a forgery. There were successive deeds from Allen Smith to John D. Smith, dated July 21, 1885, recorded January 17, 1890; from John Smith to Fletcher, dated November 3, 1887, recorded January 17, 1890; from Fletcher to Elbert Paulk, dated December 1, 1887, recorded November 12, 1895; from Elbert Paulk to Faitha Young, recorded March 9, 1892; and a lease from her dated October 24, 1893, of the turpentine privileges to the defendants, Greer & Co. The defendants' plea did not set up any title by prescription. The deed from Braddy to Smith in 1868 having been shown to be a forgery, there was on the trial some evidence of possession under color, and that there had been a deadening of timber 16 or 17 years before this suit, but no proof to connect the same with defendants' claim. There was also some evidence that Smith, in the fall of 1886 or 1887, cut some logs and boards, and left the boards and all the work done on the land. There was no evidence of possession by Fletcher, who bought on November 3, 1887, and sold to Paulk December 1, 1887. A witness testified that McSwain built a house for Elbert Paulk after the 3d of November, 1887. Witness was unable to say whether the house was built after the 1st of December, 1887, or not. Paulk testified that he acquired a deed December 1, 1887, and had McSwain build him a house, and there was evidence of continuous possession thereafter, but it was not shown to have been for seven years before the suit which was filed November 29, 1894. The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiffs, the defendants made a motion for a new trial on sundry grounds; among others upon the failure of the court to charge on the subject of acquiring title by prescription under color, and on the newly discovered evidence of certain witnesses, some of whom had been examined on the original hearing, to the effect that the house was built or begun in the fall of 1887; that the land had been continuously occupied from in November, 1887, one witness testifying that the building began by or before November 20, 1887. Some of the witnesses to the newly discovered facts had been examined at the trial, but stated that they could not then definitely remember when the improvements began; that since the trial they had refreshed their memories, and can now state positively that the building began in November, 1887, one fixing it as early as before the 15th of November. There was also a showing that these facts had not been stated to the defendants or their counsel, and a showing as to the good character of these witnesses. The motion for a new trial does not contain the affidavit of the defendants or their counsel, but the bill of exceptions recites that the defendants both swore that they did not know of these new facts until after the trial, and the affidavit of the sole counsel that he never heard of the witnesses knowing anything about this land, and that he used due and reasonable diligence in getting up the evidence for the trial. The defendants except to the refusal to grant a new trial.

J. H. Martin, for plaintiffs in error. Hal. Lawson and Eldridge Cutts, for defendants in error

LAMAR, J. 1. There was no evidence in conflict with that offered by the plaintiffs to establish the fact that they were the heirs or successors in title from Braddy, and it was not error for the court so to instruct the jury. Southern Railway Co. v. Chitwood, 119 Ga. 29, 45 S. E. 706; Civ. Code 1895, § 4334.

2. The plaintiffs made out a prima facie case, and, unless it was met by some sufficient defense, they were entitled to recover for the value of the timber cut. There is no assignment that the verdict was excessive, and no ruling of the court on this branch of the subject which requires the grant of a new trial. The defendants' answer gave no intimation of an intention to rely upon a title by prescription, nor was there any request for a charge on this subject. The evidence as to possession before November 29, 1887, was wholly insufficient to establish continuous, uninterrupted, and adverse possession under any of the parties through whom defendants claimed. The evidence as to the building of the house showed that it was constructed after the 1st of December, 1887, and less than seven years before the filing of the suit. The court did not err, therefore, in failing to charge on the subject of prescription. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3586, 3589.

3-5. The newly discovered evidence as to possession having begun before November 29, 1887, did not require the grant of a new trial. If the failure to plead prescription was intentional, the defendants cannot raise a new issue and offer evidence thereon after the verdict. If they intended to rely on prescription, there is no sufficient explanation as to the failure to make inquiry of their predecessors in title, or others by whom such adverse possession could be established. They had to prove public and continuous possession—a possession which in its nature was not secret, but notorious—and there is no showing which explains why it could not have been procured by the exercise of the diligence required by law. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5480, 5481. Motions for new trial on the ground of newly discovered testimony are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial judge, but are not intended to serve the purpose of permitting additional evidence by new witnesses to the same fact, nor for cross-examination of those previously sworn (Hall v. State, 117 Ga. 263, 43 S. E. 718 [2]); nor, after a witness has once testified, to allow him to refresh his memory, and then, as matter of course, grant a new trial thereon (Archer v. Heidt, 55 Ga. 200 [2]). See Newman v. Malsby, 108 Ga. 339, 33 S. E. 997; Southern Ry. Co. v. Pulliam, 108 Ga. 808, 34 S. E. 147. The case differs from Hays v. Westbrook, 96 Ga. 219, 22 S. E. 893; G. S. & F. R. Co. v. Zark, 108 Ga. 800, 34 S. E. 127; and also from Davis v. Bagley, 99 Ga. 142, 25 S. E. 20.

6. In view of the state of the record, and of the fact that the verdict for the plaintiffs was demanded, we do not pass upon the motion to review. Knight v. Isom, 113 Ga. 613, 39 S. E. 108; Baxley v. Baxley, 117 Ga. 60, 43 S. E. 436. Whether Paulk's deed or any preceding deed in defendants' chain had been recorded or not was immaterial. The possession prior to that period was not continuous. That subsequent thereto was for less than seven years before the suit.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

SUPREME CONCLAVE KNIGHTS OF DAMON et al. v. WOOD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

LIFE INSURANCE—APPLICATION—FALSE STATEMENTS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Where an applicant for life insurance covenants in his application that the statements made to the medical examiner are true, and these statements are made a part of the contract of insurance and form the basis of such contract, any variation in any of them which is material, whereby the nature or extent or character of the risk is changed, will avoid the policy, whether the statement was made in good faith or willfully or fraudulently.

2. In civil cases the burden of proof may be carried by a preponderance of the evidence, which is that superior weight of the evidence upon the issues involved which is sufficient to incline a reasonable or impartial mind to one side of the issue rather than to the other.

Hall & Wimberly and E. P. Mallary, for plaintiffs in error. Hardeman, Davis, Turner & Jones, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. The courts of the United States and of several of the states have for several years been trying to get away from the earlier decisions in regard to warranties in insurance policies. All of the earlier decisions, so far as we are aware, hold the insured bound by the strict law of warranty, whether the statement warranted be material or not; holding that the parties had the right to agree that a representation was material, though in fact it was not. Latterly some of the courts have strained to construe the statements of the insured as representations wherever they were not unequivocally made warranties. Thus it has been held that where, in the application, certain statements were covenanted to be true, if the policy or contract did not declare them to be warranties, but referred to them as representations or statements, they would be construed as mere representations, so that, if immaterial, their falsity would not avoid the policy. See Moulou v. Ins. Co., 111 U. S. 335, 4 Sup. Ct. 466, 28 L. Ed. 447; Phoenix L. I. Co. v. Raddin, 120 U. S. 183, 7 Sup. Ct. 500, 30 L. Ed. 644; Northwestern Mut. L. I. Co. v. Woods (Kan. Sup.) 89 Pac. 189; Alabama Gold L. I. Co. v. Johnston, 80 Ala. 467, 2 South. 125, 59 Am. Rep. 816. But the courts in this state are not troubled with these finer distinctions and strained constructions. Mr. T. R. R. Cobb, the great lawyer and codifier, who incorporated the principles of law and equity into our Code, doubtless saw the great injustice and hardship to the insured under the earlier decisions of the courts. It was to change this, we apprehend, that he in 1860 placed in the Code which was adopted in 1863 what are now sections 2097 and 2098 of the Civil Code of 1895. These sections are as follows:

"Sec. 2097. Every application for insurance must be made in the utmost good faith, and the representations contained in such application are considered as covenanted to be true by the applicant. Any variation by which the nature, or extent, or character of the risk is changed, will void the policy.

"Sec. 2098. Any verbal or written representations of facts by the assured to induce the acceptance of the risk, if material, must be true, or the policy is void. If, however, the party has no knowledge, but states on the representations of others, bona fide, and so informs the insurer, the falsity of the information does not void the policy."

Thus it will be seen that a policy cannot now be avoided upon the ground of the falsity of a representation, though warranted, unless that representation be material, and the variation from truth be such as to change the nature, extent, or character of the risk. So this court has uniformly construed these sections, as far as we can ascertain. Whenever an applicant for life insurance makes material representations in his application or examination, and covenants that they are true, under the above section of the Code, and these representations are made the basis of the contract of insurance; such contract is void if the representations vary from the truth in such manner as to change the nature, extent, or character of the risk. This is true although the applicant may have made the representations in good faith, not knowing that they were untrue. Southern L. I. Co. v. Wilkinson, 53 Ga. 535; O'Connell

v. Supreme Conclave Knights of Damon, 102 Ga. 143, 23 S. E. 282, 66 Am. St. Rep. 159; Morris v. Imperial Ins. Co., 106 Ga. 461, 32 S. E. 595. The representations, when made, if material, are warranties, under the Code; but they differ from the ordinary warranty, in that their falsity does not avoid the policy unless they are material, and the variation from the truth is such as to change the nature, extent, or character of the risk. It is therefore immaterial whether the warrantor acted in good faith in making them. If one sell another a horse, and warrant the soundness of the animal, he is bound by the warranty, whether at the time of the sale he knew or did not know that the animal was diseased. So, too, if an applicant for life insurance inform the insurance company, by a written answer to a question as to whether he has had heart disease, that he has not had it, such answer being covenanted in his application, he is bound by his covenant, without regard to his good faith in making the representation. Such was the present case. The representation was certainly a material one, and doubtless the company acted upon it. It is scarcely conceivable that the company would have issued the policy if the applicant had answered that he was or had been afflicted with heart disease, or even if he had answered doubtfully. We think that, if the answer made was untrue, the plaintiff below cannot recover. In reading the brief of evidence, we find that the testimony was conflicting as to whether the insured was or had been afflicted with heart disease at the time of his application for insurance. The physician who treated him testified that, in his opinion, the applicant was at the time afflicted with the disease. The company's physician, who made an examination at the time of the application, testified that, in his opinion, the applicant had at that time no sign or symptom of the disease. This will be a question for the jury to decide upon the next trial. A great many assignments of error are made in the motion for a new trial upon rulings on evidence and upon the charge of the court. We have not discussed the grounds of the motion seriatim, but have laid down the principles which we think control the case. The views of the trial judge were not in accord with what we have laid down, and a new trial will have to be granted.

2. One of the charges complained of related to the burden of proof. This we will not discuss, further than to say that the second headnote gives the rule in regard thereto as laid down in Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5144, 5145. In the charge given on this subject the judge confused preponderance of evidence with proof to a reasonable and moral certainty, confusing the law as to civil cases with the law applicable in criminal cases. We do not think it proper in a civil case to instruct the jury that the party on whom rests the burden of proof must establish his contention to a reasonable and moral certainty. If he establishes it by a preponderance or superior weight of evidence, to the satisfaction of the jury, that is sufficient. As to the meaning of "reasonable and moral certainty," see Bone v. State, 102 Ga. 387, 30 S. E. 845.

It appeared from the evidence that when the plaintiff was injured he was not "immediately * * * disabled, so as to cause a total loss of time," but that a period of 24 days elapsed from the time of the injury until the plaintiff was first confined to his bed, and that during that period the plaintiff was continuously at his place of business, though not performing the duties usually assigned to him. Held, that the plaintiff's own evidence failed to bring his case within the terms of the contract of insurance, and that the grant of a nonsuit was proper. *Williams v. GEORGIA, C. & N. RY. CO. v. BROWN.

CARRIERS—CONTRACT OF PASSAGE—DEGREE OF CARE.

1. The mere purchase of an ordinary railway ticket by a husband for his wife, even though he pays for it, does not constitute a contract between the husband and the company for the safe transportation of the wife; but the implied contract for safe passage which the law raises from the purchase of the ticket is in favor of the wife, and in her behalf alone an action be maintained for its breach.

2. The charge of the judge as to the degree of diligence which the defendant was required to exercise for the preservation of the health of the plaintiff, even when considered in the light of the entire charge, was, under the peculiar facts of the present case, erroneous, and required the granting of a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County; H. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by S. I. Brown against the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. N. Worley, H. J. Brewer, and Erwin & Erwin, for plaintiff in error. Geo. C. Grogan and I. C. Van Duzer, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Brown purchased from the railway company a ticket for his wife. She presented herself for transportation, and the train failed to stop. It is claimed that her health was impaired by exposure resulting from being left at the station. Brown brought an action against the company for the loss of his wife's services, and it was held that he had a cause of action. See Brown v. Railway Co., 119 Ga. 88, 45 S. E. 71. The present suit is one by the wife for pain and suffering growing out of the same transaction. She recovered a verdict, and the railway company assigns error upon a judgment overruling its motion for a new trial, and upon other rulings made during the progress of the trial.

1. Construing the petition as an action sounding in contract, it is claimed that the contract was between the railway company and the husband, who purchased and paid for the ticket, and that, as the wife was no party to the contract, she has no right of action. Under the decision in Aiken v. Southern Railway Co., 118 Ga. 118, 44 S. E. 823, 62 L. R. A. 666, this question must be decided adversely to the contention of the plaintiff in error. In that case it was held that, where a railway company sold an ordinary ticket, the law implied a contract for safe carriage with the person who presented himself for passage, without reference to who may have actually paid for the ticket.

2. In one ground of the motion for a new trial error is assigned upon the following extract from the charge: "One who has a railroad ticket, and is present to take the train at the ordinary point of departure, is a passenger, although he has not entered the car. In duties toward him directly involving his rights, the company is bound to extraordinary diligence, and, in those touching his convenience or accommodation, to ordinary diligence. Now, as far as her safety was concerned—and, gentlemen, that involves the safety of life, limb, or her health—as far as her safety was concerned, if the defendant company did not exercise extraordinary diligence, and on account of such failure she was injured, she would have a right of action and a right to recover." It is claimed that the effect of this charge was to instruct the jury that in this case the railway company was bound to exercise extraordinary diligence to preserve the health of the plaintiff. We think the charge is susceptible of this construction, and that when so construed it was, under the facts of this case, erroneous and prejudicial to the defendant. While, as was pointed out when the husband's case was here, the gist of the action was not the condition of the waiting room, but was the consequences arising from exposure resulting from the failure to transport, in spite of the fact that plaintiff took advantage of such accommodations as were at hand. Under the peculiar facts of the case, the jury could draw no other conclusion from the charge than that it was the duty of the railway company to exercise extraordinary diligence for the preservation of the health of the plaintiff during the time that she was compelled to wait for the arrival of another train, and in this way they were, in effect, instructed that the defendant was bound to exercise extraordinary diligence in regard to the manner in which it kept the waiting room, as this was the conspicuous element in the transaction which resulted in the alleged impairment of the plaintiff's health. A railroad company is bound to exercise extraordinary diligence for the preservation of the lives and persons of its passengers while they are being received upon its trains, while being transported therein, and while being discharged therefrom; but it is bound to exercise only ordinary diligence in the preservation of the lives, health, and persons of passengers who are awaiting at stations the arrival of trains, or who are detained at stations as the result of a refusal or failure on the part of the company to stop its trains for the reception of such passengers. Southern Ry. Co. v. Reeves, 116 Ga. 743, 42 S. E. 1015; Wilkes v. R. Co., 100 Ga. 794, 35 S. E. 165. While the judge in one or more portions of his charge distinctly instructed the jury that the defendant was bound to exercise extraordinary care as to the safety of its passengers, and ordinary care as to their comfort and convenience, the charge complained of had the effect of instructing the jury that the safety of the plaintiff involved the preservation of her health, and that to such a matter the rule of extraordinary diligence was applicable. The effect of this charge was to tell the jury that the defendant was bound to exercise extraordinary diligence for the preservation of the health of the plaintiff during the time that elapsed between the failure of the train to stop and the departure of the plaintiff on another train the next day.

Another ground of the motion for a new trial complains that after the judge had charged the jury that it was the duty of the plaintiff to lessen the damages, as far as practicable, by the exercise of ordinary care, he added, "This does not apply in cases of positive and continuous torts." While the charge was in the language of Civ. Code 1895, § 3802, still, in cases like the present, the last sentence of that section should not be charged.

In still another ground of the motion, complaint is made that the court charged the jury upon the subject of the duty of the railway company to furnish a safe place for passengers to enter and alight from its trains. There was nothing in the case authorizing a charge on this subject.

It is, however, unnecessary to determine whether either of the errors last referred to would have been sufficient to require the granting of a new trial, as the judgment is reversed because of the error in charging with reference to the degree of diligence which the defendant was bound to exercise.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

Error from Superior Court, Wilkes County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Action by the Security Investment Company against R. O. Barksdale, administrator. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Colley & Sims and S. H. Hardeman, for plaintiff in error. Wm. Wynne, B. S. Irvin, and Anderson, Anderson & Thomas, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. The Security Investment Company, alleged to be a copartnership composed of Elliot M. Beardsley and Augustus A. McKelvey, of Bridgeport, Conn., sued B. F. Barksdale on several promissory notes, and, in addition to a general judgment, prayed for a special lien on certain land described in a deed given as security for the payment of the notes. Defendant pleaded usury. Pending the suit the defendant died, and R. O. Barksdale, administrator, was made party defendant. On the trial, at the conclusion of the evidence, the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The case is here upon exceptions by the defendant to the overruling of his motion for a new trial.

From the undisputed evidence in the record we gather the following facts: In the early part of 1888 B. F. Barksdale employed B. S. Irvin to obtain a loan of \$3,800 for him upon the land in question. Irvin was a loan broker, doing business in Washington, Wilkes county, who did not lend his own money, but simply undertook to find parties willing to lend money to prospective borrowers, and charged commissions for his services. He was the correspondent of the Georgia Loan & Trust Company (hereafter called the "Trust Company"), a corporation of this state, which was itself engaged in the similar business of a mere loan broker or negotiator, charging borrowers a commission for its services. Irvin took Barksdale's application for the loan, and forwarded it to the trust company. The loan was made for \$3,800. The notes for the same were dated February 1, 1888, due February 1, 1893, bearing interest at 8 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, according to interest coupons thereto attached, and were secured by a mortgage on the land in question. The notes and mortgage were executed in favor of the trust company, though it was not the real lender of the money, the papers being executed in this form for convenience, and immediately thereafter were transferred to John Stringer, the true lender. Irvin charged Barksdale a commission of 10 per cent. for procuring the loan, of which Irvin got 3 per cent. and the trust company 7 per cent., which was deducted from the amount loaned by Stringer. Before the maturity of this loan, the trust company had arranged with the Security Investment Company (hereafter called the "Investment Company") to negotiate a new loan to take the place of the old one. On January 28, 1893, Barksdale again applied to Irvin for a loan of \$3,800, for the purpose of paying off the old loan. In the written application signed by Barksdale, he made the following agreement: "I hereby agree to pay all expenses incurred in negotiating the above loan, in examining the premises, investigating titles to the lands offered as security, and in executing all necessary papers, and I understand that the loan is granted upon the representations above made as to my property and condition, all of which I declare to be true." On January 31, 1893, Irvin, as examiner, made a report of his examination of the premises described in the application, and declared that, in his opinion, the property offered was ample security for a loan of \$3,800. Indorsed on the application were the words, "Renewal of 1872," 1872 being the number of the old loan; also, "Approved by the Security Investment Company. I. W. Beardsley." These indorsements were not dated. Upon this application the new loan was negotiated and made. \$3,800 belonging to the investment company were appropriated to the payment of that amount due John Stringer and in extinguishment of the old loan, and on February 1, 1893, Barksdale executed four promissory notes, payable to the investment company, or order, five years after date, and aggregating \$3,800. These notes had interest coupons attached for semiannual interest at the rate of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, and there were additional interest notes executed, but not attached, representing semiannual interest upon the principal notes at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent. per annum. All these notes for principal and interest were secured by a deed to the land in question, executed by Barksdale to the investment company upon the same date as the notes, and conformably to sections 1969 and 1970 of the Code of 1882. On January 31, 1893, Barksdale paid Irvin \$475, of which \$152 was for the semiannual interest due on the old loan on February 1, 1893, and \$323 was for commissions for negotiating the new loan. Of these commissions Irvin retained \$57, and sent the balance to the trust company as its share of the same for its services in negotiating the new loan. The investment company was the real lender, and parted with the full amount of \$3,800 paid to Stringer in settlement of the old loan, and received neither any part of the commissions nor any bonus or brokerage for making the loan. It contracted for nothing more than the lawful interest, and neither expected nor received anything more than that. Its method of doing business was, after making loans, to sell them to other parties as promptly as possible, transferring the principal notes, with the coupons for $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest, and retaining, as its own profit, the additional interest coupons for one-half of 1 per cent. interest. The principal notes sued on in this case, with the attached coupons, were transferred to other parties, who, after maturity and nonpayment, transferred them back to the investment company, that it might bring suit on them, it having kept the security deed for the benefit of all parties concerned.

The trust company procured the investment company to make loans submitted by it, but it had other correspondents and connections, and often procured lenders through other channels. The trust company had been thus dealing with the investment company for about a year when the loan in the present case was made. The trust company was not engaged in lending money itself, although it appeared that as a business policy it sometimes purchased a loan upon its maturity and nonpayment, which had been negotiated through its instrumentality, in order that the lender might be induced to accept other loans which it might have for negotiation. When the original loan was negotiated February 1, 1888, the Security Investment Company was composed of Burr and Knapp, who were, respectively, the president and vice president of the Georgia Loan & Trust Company. At that time, and until January, 1892, Burr and Knapp, who were brokers, in Bridgeport, Conn., did some business as negotiators of loans, and the trust company paid them a part of the commissions received by it whenever they secured an investor for one of its loans. As the notes and mortgages or deeds were at that time, for convenience, made to the trust company, though the money loaned did not belong to it, but to the parties advancing the same as investors, the facts had to be explained whenever suits were brought to collect the loans. To avoid this, the trust company induced other parties at Bridgeport to form a new security investment company for the purpose of making some of these loans. The old Security & Investment Company, composed of Burr and Knapp, went out of business, and the new Security & Investment Company, composed of entirely different parties, was formed, in January, 1892. As before stated, the trust company never paid this new Security Investment Company any commissions, brokerage, or bonus for loans made by it. All it made was the one-half of 1 per cent. interest per annum, which it secured by retaining the additional coupons for that amount of interest as before stated. Neither Irvin nor the trust company was authorized by the investment company, which made the loan in this case, to make loans without first getting the approval of the company, and when the loan that was made to Barksdale in 1888 became due the trust company obtained the consent of the investment company to make the new loan and take up the old one. The course of business was for the trust company to forward the papers, such as the application of the borrower, report of the examiner, etc., to the investment company, which passed upon them for itself, and itself decided whether or not the security was good and the terms offered satisfactory, and for itself determined which loans, if any, it would make. While the trust company had no power to lend the money of the investment company until after the latter company had passed on the application and approved the same, and thus authorized the loan, it appeared that the trust company had, in an occasional instance, for the purpose of closing the loan promptly, and as a business policy, made a loan and taken the papers to the investment company, assuming the risk, however, of the investment company approving the loan and agreeing to make it, and that in such cases the investment company had, as a matter of fact, taken the loans, though made without its authority. This did not appear to be the case in the loan made to Barksdale. On the contrary, the uncontradicted testimony of the treasurer and general manager of the trust company was as follows on this subject: "I will say as to this loan [the one made in 1888], the original investor, John Stringer, was paid off the $3,800.00 entirely. We then had to negotiate the loan through a new party, whom we had secured in the meantime. When this loan became due, we obtained the consent of the Security Investment Company to make the loan, and took up the old loan." But, even if the loan in the present case were made by the trust company before it had been approved and authorized by the investment company, there was no evidence that the latter company had knowledge of this fact. While the evidence on the subject is somewhat confused, viewed in the strongest light for the plaintiff in error it shows that the investment company kept on deposit in the Chemical National Bank of New York money which the trust company could draw on, in favor of the borrower, for the amount of the loan, after the investment company had examined the application and other papers for the loan, and had approved the same, and decided to make the loan. It appeared that Burr and Knapp, the president and vice president of the trust company, were attorneys in fact for the investment company; but what their powers were as such did not appear, further than that Knapp, as such attorney in fact, transferred the notes sued on in this case to the different parties who purchased them from the investment company.

1. These facts, in view of the prior rulings of this court, demanded a verdict for the plaintiff in the court below, and the court did not err in so directing. In Merck's Case, 79 Ga. 213, 7 S. E. 265—the leading case on the subject, which has been frequently followed—it was held: "(1) Where the lender of money neither takes nor contracts to take anything beyond lawful interest, the loan is not rendered usurious by what the borrower does in procuring the loan and using its proceeds. Thus, that the borrower contracts with one engaged in the intermediary business of procuring loans, to pay him out of the loan for his services, and does so pay him, will not infect the loan, the lender having no interest in such intermediary business or its proceeds. (2) By using intermediaries as channels of transmission for papers, relying upon their inspection of property and examination of titles made at the borrower's instance, and forwarding the money through them also at his instance, the lender does not constitute them his agents to make the loan, and is not chargeable with the consequences of dealings between them and the borrower, whether those dealings be public or private, known or unknown." In the opinion in that case Chief Justice Bleckley said: "If he [the lender] holds control of his capital, and decides for himself when he will part with it, and on what terms, and has no terms but lawful interest and good security, and satisfies himself that the security is good, he transacts his own business, and is not to be judged by the law of agency." He further said: "He who is satisfied with another's inspection of property or examination of titles does not render that other his agent by forbearing to inspect or examine for himself," and, if he be a lender, "does not the less judge of the security by basing his judgment on the representation or opinion of whomsoever commands his confidence." Again, the learned justice said: "But grant that the middlemen were by legal implication agents of both parties, the lender as well as the borrower, for several purposes, such as receiving and delivering papers, inspecting the property, examining the title, etc., it is certain, according to the evidence in the record, that they were not agents, express or implied, for making the loan, fixing the terms of it, or accepting the security. Nor did they in fact do these things, but they were done by Sherwood. Now, unless some one who represented the lender in making the contract took or contracted to take for himself or the lender or some other person something from the borrower over and above a legal rate of interest, how could the contract, under our Code, be usurious? It seems to us legally impossible that it could

This language is equally applicable to acts of the case now in hand. Indeed, the present case, under its facts, is controlled by the rulings made in Merck's Case.

2. The mere fact that the investment company deposited in the Chemical National Bank a fund which should be subject to the check of the trust company for the amount of a loan only in the event that the investment company, after an examination by itself of the application of the prospective borrower, and the security offered for the loan, should approve the same, and for itself decide to make the loan, did not render the trust company the agent of the investment company for the purpose of making loans. Such a course of business was evidently for the purpose of more promptly placing the money in the hands of the borrower by saving the time that would elapse if, after the papers should be approved by the investment company and returned to the trust company, and the notes and security deed should be executed by the borrower, and sent to and received by the investment company, it should then forward a check to the trust company for the amount of the loan. Counsel for the plaintiff in error largely relied upon the case of Clarke v. Havard, 111 Ga. 242, 36 S. E. 837, 51 L. R. A. 499, wherein it was held that when one who received money from the owner thereof for the express purpose of lending it out at interest, and with authority so to do, either general or limited, afterwards loaned the money to another, and exacted from the borrower a commission, which, added to the stipulated interest, made an amount which exceeded that which could be lawfully charged as interest, such transaction was usurious, if it was understood between the lender and his agent that the former was to pay nothing for the latter's services, and the circumstances were such that the lender must necessarily have known that the agent intended to charge the borrower, and did charge and collect from him, such commission for making the loan. It is quite apparent that the ruling then made is not applicable to the facts of the present case. In that case Presiding Justice Lumpkin said: "This case is obviously different upon its facts from that of Merck v. Mortgage Co., 79 Ga. 213, 7 S. E. 265, and numerous others of its class, in which the lender received the borrower's application, passed upon it for himself, and for himself decided whether or not the security was good and the terms offered satisfactory. Here Barnett passed upon these and all kindred questions for the lender, manifestly with authority so to do, which was either general or limited by instructions not disclosed. If this does not amount to agency, we have no conception what agency is."

3, 4. O. A. Coleman testified as a witness for the plaintiff. In the motion for a new trial complaint was made that the court erred in excluding certain matter alleged to be testimony given by him in the Tallafarro superior court in the case of Sackett v. Stone, which was offered for the purpose of impeaching his testimony in the present case, it being stated in the motion that the proper foundation was laid for the introduction of such evidence to impeach him by calling the witness' attention to the time when and the place where the alleged contradictory statements were made. From the fact that the motion sets out something more than a page of what purports to be testimony delivered by Coleman in the case of Sackett v. Stone, and then alleges that movant "offered the foregoing testimony of Coleman for the purpose of impeaching his evidence delivered in the case at bar," and "this evidence the court ruled out," we think it apparent that a written report or brief of testimony alleged to have been given by Coleman in the trial of that case was offered in evidence to impeach him. A reference to Coleman's testimony in the brief of the evidence in the present case shows this must be true. He swore: "I testified in the case of Solomon Sackett et al. v. Mary E. Stone, in Taliaferro superior court, in February, 1901. I don't know whether this is correct or not, but I presume so." Evidently he must have been referring to a report or statement of his testimony in that case. Further in his testimony he said: "I don't know why I should be held responsible for what the reporter says in the report of what I said in the last case. I have never read the testimony over. All I undertook to do was to tell the truth, as I do now." If this view of the matter be not correct, then it is certain that the motion does not disclose in what manner it was sought to prove what the testimony of Coleman was in the Sackett-Stone Case. A stenographic report or brief of the testimony alleged to have been given by Coleman in the other case was not competent evidence without proof of its genuineness and correctness. Hardeman v. English, 79 Ga. 387, 5 S. E. 70. See, also, Cox v. State, 64 Ga. 374 (5), 87 Am. Rep. 76; 1 Thompson on Trials, § 504. No such proof appears to have been made or offered in this case. The reason upon which the trial judge excluded the report, we think, was wrong, but the ruling was correct. "If testimony was properly rejected, the ruling of the court will be sustained, although he may have given an insufficient, or even a wrong, reason therefor." Smith v. Page, 72 Ga. 539.

HARDY v. POSS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)

DISTRESS WARRANT — PROCEDURE — VERDICT — BOND — LIABILITY OF CONSTABLE.

1. The filing of a counter affidavit converts a distress warrant into mesne process, and the proceeding amounts to a suit for rent. In such proceeding the form of the verdict or judgment is general, and is for the amount found to be due.

2. Where a counter affidavit is filed to the levy of a distress warrant, the only bond the levying officer may take is one for the eventual condemnation money. If the bond taken by the levying officer is conditioned otherwise, and loss is sustained by the plaintiff in the distress warrant, the officer is responsible.

3. The evidence authorized the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Wilkes County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Distress proceedings by W. M. Poss against Alex Boatwright and others. Judgment for plaintiff. On failure of the constable to make the money, a rule was entered against him, and verdict rendered for plaintiff against the defendant in rule. From an order denying a new trial, he brings error. Affirmed.

Jas. M. Pitner, for plaintiff in error. I. T. Irvin, Jr., for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. W. M. Poss sued out a distress warrant in the justice's court of the 171st District, G. M., of Wilkes county, against Alex Boatwright. This distress warrant was placed in the hands of J. T. Hardy, constable of said district, who levied the same. Boatwright made a counter affidavit. The case was returned to the justice's court, and on the trial a verdict was rendered in favor of Boatwright. Plaintiff carried the case to the superior court, where the judgment in the justice's court was reversed, and the case sent back for a new trial. On the second trial in the justice's court a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Upon failure of the constable to make the money, a rule was brought against him at the November term, 1903, of the superior court of Wilkes county. An issue was formed, and upon the trial the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, Poss, against the defendant Hardy. Hardy made a motion for a new trial, and, the same being overruled, brought the case here.

It was admitted upon the trial that the constable had taken a forthcoming bond from the defendant in the distress warrant. The constable, in his answer to the rule, set up that the property levied upon by him was never released to the defendant in the distress warrant, but that the same was in his possession at all times until after the rendition of the verdict upon the first trial in the justice's court, when he delivered the property to Boatwright; no order of the court having been taken requiring him to hold the property, nor was he notified that a certiorari would be sued out in the case. He further set up that the defendant in the distress warrant was not now a resident of the county, and that he had no property out of which the money could be made. The movant of the rule offered evidence tending to show that the constable had turned the property levied upon over to the defendant in the distress warrant on his giving a forthcoming bond, and that the constable was verbally notified immediately upon the return of the first verdict that the case would be carried to the superior court by certiorari. There was also evidence on the part of the movant tending to show that some three weeks after the first trial in the justice's court the constable admitted having possession of the property levied upon at that time, and sought advice as to whether he should keep it, or sell and deposit money in bank to await the final determination of the case.

1. The verdict and judgment had upon the second trial in the justice's court were general, and plaintiff in error insists that the court erred in failing to charge that after a counter affidavit had been filed, and the plaintiff, without objection, went to trial on the issue formed thereby, the action became mesne process; that the general verdict and judgment were illegal, and the plaintiff was not entitled to recover from the constable on the rule. This assignment of error is based on the rulings made in the cases of Argo v. Fields, 112 Ga. 677, 37 S. E. 995, and Barnett v. Tant, 115 Ga. 659, 42 S. E. 65. The case of Argo v. Fields was the foreclosure of the special statutory lien for supplies furnished a tenant, and this court said that it was not lawful to issue a general judgment against the tenant, because the statute only gave the landlord a lien upon the crop made during the year of the tenancy. The issue in the other case arose upon a counter affidavit to a laborer's lien. It will be noted that in both of these cases statutory liens were being asserted. The practice in issues formed upon a counter affidavit to a distress warrant is different. The filing of the counter affidavit converts the distress warrant into mesne process, and the proceeding amounts to a suit for rent (Chisholm v. Lewis & Co., 66 Ga. 729; Elam v. Hamilton, 69 Ga. 736), and the plaintiff is entitled to a general judgment (McNell v. Harker, 40 Ga. 26; Seifert v. Holt, 82 Ga. 757, 9 S. E. 843). Prior to the act of 1894 (Acts 1894, p. 52) the tenant was required to give a replevy bond before he could contest his rent, but since then the party distrained is not required to give a replevy bond where the levying officer retains possession of the property of the tenant levied on. Civ. Code 1895, § 4819. The only change made by the amending act was to allow the defendant in a distress warrant to make his counter affidavit, and have the issue tried without giving the bond for the eventual condemnation money, where the property levied upon remains in the possession of the levying officer. The practice as to the form of verdict and judgment is unaffected by this amendment.

2. Plaintiff in error insists that the court erred in charging as follows: "I charge you further, if the defendant, the constable, levied on the property by virtue of a distress warrant, * * * and did not keep possession of it, but turned it over to Mr. Boatwright, and took from him a forthcoming bond for the property, and did not take a bond for the eventual condemnation money, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover." Before the amendment of 1894 the defendant in a distress warrant could only make an issue by taking the oath and giving a bond for the eventual condemnation money. Since this amendment he can make an issue by taking the oath and leaving the property in the hands of the levying officer. If the bond for the eventual condemnation money is not given, the plaintiff has the right to have the property remain in the hands of the officer; and if the officer deal with the property in any other manner than one allowed by statute, and a loss is sustained by the plaintiff, the officer is responsible. The officer cannot protect himself by taking any other bond than that for the eventual condemnation money, and, where such bond is not given, the plaintiff is entitled to rely upon the presumption that the officer has done his duty, and is retaining the property in his possession. See Boyles v. Bank, 96 Ga. 796, 22 S. E. 582.

3. The case was submitted to the jury under the evidence, and the presiding judge approved the verdict after requiring the plaintiff to write off a certain amount therefrom, which was done. We see no abuse of the judge's discretion in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

PITTMAN et al. v. COLBERT et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—UNLIQUIDATED DAMAGES—INJUNCTION.

1. Where a judgment by default is rendered in a case in which the damages are not liquidated, the defendant is thereby concluded as to the truth of all the material allegations of the petition, save as to the amount of the damages. The defendant may in such a case, notwithstanding the judgment by default, contest before the jury the amount of the damages, and to this end may not only rigidly cross-examine the witnesses for the plaintiff, but also introduce evidence in his own behalf. Civ. Code 1895, § 5073; O'Connor v. Brucker, 43 S. E. 731, 117 Ga. 451 (2). See, also, Lenney v. Finley, 45 S. E. 317, 118 Ga. 427 (2).

2. The evidence upon one or more of the vital and controlling issues being directly conflicting, the discretion of the judge, exercised in granting an interlocutory injunction until these issues can be determined by a jury, will not be controlled.

ST. AMAND et al. v. LEHMAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

INJUNCTION — CONSPIRACY — PLEADING — APPEAL—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

The petition alleged that three defendants were blasting and digging a well on a vacant lot, for the purpose of interfering with a well-defined underground stream, in order to destroy complainant's mineral spring, and the valuable improvements maintained in connection therewith. One of the defendants denied the conspiracy, or that damage would result, and claimed, further, that if any damage did result it would not be irreparable. Another of the defendants failed to answer, thereby admitting the confederacy, the threatened injury, and the other allegations in the petition. Held:

1. The petition set out a state of facts which was good as against a demurrer, and which if true would have entitled plaintiffs to the injunction prayed for.

2. In view of the failure of one of the defendants to answer, it would have been proper to grant the injunction against him.

3. The fact that the evidence is not briefed is not ground for dismissing the bill of exceptions, but leaves the case for any disposition which may be properly made, without regard to the evidence.

4. The petition and the answer, both being verified, served the office both of pleading and evidence on the application for injunction; and without regard, therefore, to the brief of all the testimony, enough appears to show that there was a conflict of evidence on all material facts.

5. The threatened injuries referred to in the sworn petition were irreparable in their nature. The delay to the defendant, arising from an injunction, would not counterbalance the irreparable injury which might flow to petitioners if the injunction were refused, and their mineral spring destroyed by the blasting and digging, and the jury on the final trial, on a full hearing of all the testimony, should find that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief prayed for.

6. In view of the state of the record, the judgment is affirmed, with direction.

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; A. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by J. S. Lehman and others against J. G. St. Amand and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

St. Amand and the other executors of E. W. Marsh filed their equitable petition against Ray of Douglas county, Brooker of Cobb county, and Lehman, a nonresident, as well as their associates and confederates, averring that E. W. Marsh was at the time of his death the owner of the Sweetwater Park Hotel and Bowden Lithia Springs property, in Douglas county, on which he had erected bathhouses, cottages, and hotel, laid out a park, and constructed a branch railroad, at a total expense of about a half million dollars; that the chief value of the property consisted of the mineral springs, the waters of which had been analyzed, and at great expense advertised, thereby building up a large business in the bottling and sale of the water, besides attracting many visitors to the springs and property; that the defendants are now, and have been for some time, engaged in sinking a well on property which petitioners are informed is claimed to be owned or controlled by Lehman, his confederates and associates; that this excavation is being made by the defendants to injure and damage the property of the estate of Marsh, although there is no indication that a spring would ever approach the surface at that point, or on any of the lands claimed to be owned by Lehman or either of the other defendants, but that they hope, and so express themselves, that they will intersect the underground current or well-defined stream of mineral water flowing through said land to the present spring of petitioners; that said stream is well known and defined, and there has never been any difficulty in ascertaining its exact course; that said Ray, Lehman, and the other defendants are now engaged in pounding with heavy machinery upon the strata of rock, and are sinking and blasting for the purpose of cutting off the flow of said underground current, and, if allowed to proceed, the damage to petitioners' estate will be irreparable; that this is being done for the express purpose of destroying the right and property of the estate, and so as to divert the present stream from its natural course, and cause the water to sink lower into the excavation proposed to be made, and thereby totally destroy the value of the estate so far as the mineral water is concerned; that the defendants have no improvements on the land or near it, and do not occupy it, either by themselves or by tenants, and there is no necessity for doing the work, and no reason for it, except to injure the property of petitioners; that all of the defendants well know that for many years no one has been allowed to blast, pound, bore, or otherwise interfere with the stone around the spring, for fear of endangering the quality and quantity of the water flowing into the spring through the underground stream aforesaid; that none of the defendants would be able to answer in damages; that, while some might be able to pay what debts they owe at present, they are totally insolvent so far as being able to answer the damage to the estate if they are not enjoined; that therefore petitioners are remediless. They pray for process against Ray, of the county of Douglas, and ———, of the county of Cobb, and Lehman, and, if Lehman cannot be served with process, that he be served by publication, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with the rights of petitioner, or from digging, blasting, pounding, drilling, or boring the well and excavation complained of, and for a permanent injunction against each from further acts, by them selves or agents, toward sinking the well at the place designated, or at any other point that will in any way interfere with the property of the estate. The petition was verified positively by one of the petitioners. In his sworn answer, Lehman admitted that he was a nonresident. For want of sufficient information, he neither admitted nor denied the allegations as to the value of the improvements or character of the business created in connection with the springs. He averred that he had employed Brooker to bore the well, and that Brooker had engaged Ray to assist him therein; and claimed that he owned the land on which the well was being dug. He denied that it will injure the plaintiffs' springs; denied that he had any purpose in any way to damage the plaintiffs in the free use of their mineral spring; denied that there is any well-defined current; and averred that if there is any such stream it is impossible of ascertainment, and that there is a stream between the well and the proposed well. He denied that he was insolvent. "In answer to paragraph 17, defendant says that plaintiffs are not remediless in courts of law, and that they have no right to ask equitable relief; that, if he has damaged or should damage them in any way on account of the matters set up in their petition, they have a complete and adequate remedy at law." Ray, one of the defendants, was personally served, but filed no answer. The defendant Brooker is alleged in the petition to be a resident of Cobb county, but appears to have been served by the sheriff of Douglas county leaving a copy of the petition and process at his residence. The judge refused the injunction against all the defendants, to which the plaintiffs excepted. On the call of the case here, counsel for Lehman moved to dismiss the bill of exceptions, on the ground that there was no bona fide effort on the part of plaintiffs to brief the evidence.

W. A. James and J. S. James, for plaintiffs in error. Roberts & Hutcheson, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. The petition charged that the three defendants had confederated for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff. Lehman alone answered. Even if there were defects in the service as to Brooker, Ray was properly served, and failed to answer. His silence was therefore to be treated as an admission of the sworn allegations of the petition, warranting an injunction against him; and if, as claimed, we cannot consider the evidence, it leaves the record in such shape that we can at least determine that it would have been proper to enjoin Ray from the continuance of the wrongful act alleged against him, and admitted to be true by his silence. According to the allegations of the verified petition, the defendants had confederated together to blast, pound, and dig the rocks on a vacant lot adjoining plaintiff's spring, not for the purpose of obtaining water useful to the defendant, but with the sole intent of injuring the plaintiff and destroying a mineral spring of great value, around which he had constructed an immense plant. While the word is not used, the facts amount to a charge that the defendants are acting maliciously. If, as alleged, the effort is to destroy a known or well-defined subterranean stream, or to divert it from the spring of the lower proprietor, the plaintiff is not without remedy, even though the flow is underground. Or if the evidence shall show that it is a case of interference with percolating waters, and that the defendants are actuated by malice in wasting or diverting the water, the plaintiffs are still entitled to equitable relief. Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 528, 64 Am. Dec. 721, cited in Saddler v. Lee, 66 Ga. 48, 42 Am. Rep. 62. And compare Barclay v. Abraham (Iowa) 96 N. W. 1080, and Stillwater Co. v. Farmer (Minn.) 93 N. W. 907, 60 L. R. A. 875, as to the effect of malice and waste.

Lehman's answer was in the nature of a demurrer, answer, and plea combined. It admitted the digging of the well, and in so far as it denied that there was any underground stream running from it to the spring, or that any damage would be occasioned to the plaintiff by the digging of the well, it raised an issue of fact which could properly have been considered by the trial judge on the application for injunction. In so far, however, as it set out "that plaintiffs are not remediless in courts of law, and that they have no right to ask equitable relief; that, if he [defendant] has damaged or should damage them in any way on account of the matters set up in their petition, they have a complete and adequate remedy at law"—it was performing the office of a demurrer, which, however, should have been overruled, for it is hard to imagine any case to which the remedy of injunction to prevent irreparable damages would be applicable if not to facts like those set out in this petition. Had it appeared, therefore, that the interlocutory relief prayed for was refused on this ground, a reversal would necessarily result. And so, too, if it was denied because of conflicting evidence. For while, ordinarily, the court will not interfere with the chancellor's discretion in passing upon disputed facts, there are some cases in which the fact of conflict does not deprive the petitioner of a remedy by which to preserve the status until the disputed issue may be submitted to the jury in a trial in which both parties have the right to cross-examine all the witnesses. This distinction was pointed out in Everett v. Tabor, 119 Ga. 128, 45 S. E. 72, though the opinion was not published until after the interlocutory hearing in the present case. It was there said that there would be strong reason to grant the injunction if the delay to one party would not counterbalance the irreparable injury which might flow to the petitioner were the chancellor to decide the facts in a way different from that which might be determined by the jury on final verdict. The present case is within that rule. The well of the defendants is being dug on a vacant lot. They have no immediate occasion for its use, and the injunction can only occasion a delay from which no serious or irreparable damage can flow. But if the blasting or digging should divert the underground stream, or destroy the spring of the plaintiff, and if on the final trial the jury should find in favor of the plaintiff, it is manifest that an enormous damage, of a character considered irreparable in law, would be inflicted. Money could not compensate for what had been done, and refilling the well would not undo the harm which had been done.

It is said, however, that the plaintiffs have not made any bona fide effort to brief the evidence, and that therefore the case should be dismissed. But this result does not flow from a disregard of the rule of practice. Southern Mining Co. v. Brown, 107 Ga. 264, 33 S. E. 73. It does prevent this court from inspecting the brief of evidence, and, if the case was solely dependent upon a consideration of what appeared therein, an unconditional affirmance would necessarily result. But the petition and answer were both sworn to, and in reading them as pleadings we necessarily are put in possession of the fact that the parties were diametrically at issue, and that there was a conflict in the evidence. The testimony must conform to the pleadings, and could do no more than add to the conflict. In consideration of which, and that no harm could come to the defendants from granting the injunction, and that irreparable injury might flow to the petitioners from its refusal, we affirm the judgment. But under Civ. Code, §§ 5998, 5586, we direct that the judgment of affirmance shall not prejudice the right of the plaintiff to present another application for an injunction. Brown v. Joiner, 77 Ga. 232, 3 S. E. 157; Ford v. Harris, 95 Ga. 97 (4), 22 S. E. 144; Sims v. Cordele Ice Co., 119 Ga. 597, 46 S. E. 841.

Judgment affirmed, with direction. All the Justices concurring.

LANE et al. v. BROTHERS AND SISTERS OF EVENING STAR SOC.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)

ASSOCIATIONS—RIGHT TO USE OF NAME—INJUNCTION.

1. "An association has a right to adopt a title by which it is to be known, the unauthorized use of which will be restrained by a court of equity." 4 Cyc. 304, and authorities there cited. It was accordingly not error for the court in the present case to enjoin the defendants from obtaining a charter under a name already used by the plaintiff to designate what the court was authorized to find was a department of its organization.

2. The funds in dispute were not claimed by the defendants in their individual capacity, but as officers of what they contended was an independent voluntary association. There was ample evidence to authorize a finding that this alleged society was merely a department of the plaintiff, which was an incorporated mutual benefit organization. While the court was without authority, at an interlocutory hearing, to order the funds in dispute (which, under the evidence for the plaintiff, had been wrongfully withdrawn by the defendants from the bank in which they were deposited) paid over to the plaintiff, equity required that the funds be held in the custody of the court to abide the final determination of the cause. The judgment will therefore be affirmed, with direction that the court appoint a receiver to take charge of the money in controversy to await the final judgment to be rendered. As to the power of the court to appoint such receiver, see McGarrah v. Bank, 43 S. E. 987, 117 Ga. 553.

FOWLER v. DAVIS.

(120 Ga. 442)

REFERENCE—REPORT—ERROR—EXCEPTIONS OF FACT—PRESUMPTIONS—EQUITY.

1. While the report of the auditor was concise and brief, it appears to embrace findings upon all of the material issues made by the pleadings; and it has not been made to appear that there was any error in refusing to recommend the report on the ground that the same was too indefinite, and did not cover the issues involved.

2. When error is assigned upon the refusal of a judge to approve an exception of fact to an auditor's report in an equity case, the burden is upon the plaintiff in error to show, to the satisfaction of the Supreme Court, that the finding of the auditor is unsupported by evidence, the presumption being that the finding is correct; and, where it does not distinctly appear that the finding is unsupported, the judgment of the trial judge refusing to approve the exception of fact will be affirmed.

3. Whether a petition sets forth an equitable or a legal cause of action depends upon the relief prayed for, and a petition which prays for a dissolution of a partnership, an accounting, and an injunction certainly makes an equity case.

4. No sufficient reason has been shown for reversing the judgment.

Error from Superior Court, Pickens County; Geo. F. Gober, Judge.

Action by J. R. Fowler against A. W. Davis. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

N. A. Morris and W. T. Day, for plaintiff in error. John W. Henley, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Fowler brought a petition against Davis in which he alleged that they had entered into a partnership for the purpose of buying and selling live stock, and that the partnership was subsequently extended to a livery stable business, and to the buying and selling of tanbark. The terms of the agreement between the parties in reference to what was alleged to be the original partnership are set forth. It is alleged that upon a fair accounting the defendant would be indebted to the plaintiff on matters connected with the partnership enterprise. It is also alleged that the plaintiff is indebted to the defendant on different matters, but that after these are all deducted the defendant would still be indebted to the plaintiff. The prayers of the petition were that a dissolution of the partnership be decreed, that the defendant be enjoined from suing the plaintiff upon any demand he might have against him, that there be a general accounting of all matters of controversy between them, and that the plaintiff have judgment against the defendant for the amount which might be shown to be due after such an accounting. The defendant's answer set forth his version of the arrangement between himself and the plaintiff in reference to the purchase and sale of live stock, which differed in some particulars from plaintiff's version, and distinctly denied that this arrangement constituted them partners. It was denied that this arrangement had ever been extended to include either a livery stable or a tanbark business, though it was admitted that there were some transactions between the parties in reference to tanbark. It was alleged that, upon a fair accounting of all the matters above referred to, the defendant would not be indebted to the plaintiff in any amount, but that plaintiff was indebted to defendant stated sums upon notes and accounts; and judgment was prayed against the plaintiff for the amounts due. The case was referred to an auditor, who made a report which was in effect a finding that the arrangement between the parties was as contended by the defendant; that there was no partnership; that upon an accounting between the parties, growing out of the transactions, the defendant was not indebted to the plaintiff anything; that the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant the amounts claimed on the notes referred to in the answer, and a given amount on the accounts, but less than that claimed in the answer; and that defendant was entitled to a judgment for these amounts against the plaintiff. The plaintiff filed a motion to recommit the case to the auditor, and also filed exceptions to the report. The court overruled the motion to recommit, as well as the exceptions of law, refused to approve the exceptions of fact, and directed a decree to be entered in accordance with the auditor's report, which was

To these different rulings the plaintiff excepted.

The evidence before the auditor was voluminous, and the brief filed with his report was a very extensive document. The report itself embraced less than a page of legal cap written with a pen. It contains ten distinct findings, which are not classified by the auditor, but all of them may be properly denominated exceptions of fact, unless the first, which is simply a finding "that there was no partnership," be construed as in the nature of a finding on the question of law involved. The plaintiff filed both an exception of law and an exception of fact to the finding just referred to. The first nine findings of the auditor constitute in effect a finding by him that the version of the defendant in reference to the transaction between the parties was correct, and that upon an accounting based on this version the defendant is not indebted to the plaintiff in any amount. In other words, these findings are in effect a finding against the plaintiff on the cause of action alleged in the petition. The tenth finding sets forth that the plaintiff is indebted to the defendant a given amount on notes and a given amount on account. This is a finding in favor of the defendant on the prayer of his cross-petition. The report is very concise and pointed, and while it does not set forth the calculations by which the auditor reached the results stated in his findings, and there is not a distinct finding of the different amounts which went to make up the aggregate result, still the report seems to cover all of the material issues made by the pleadings; and we cannot say that there was any error in the refusal of the judge to recommit the case to the auditor. See, in this connection, Civ. Code, §§ 4585, 4587, 4593.

In an equity case an exception of fact to an auditor's report is not submitted to a jury unless the judge approves the exception, and it is discretionary with the judge whether he will approve the exception. Civ. Code, § 4596; Cranston v. Bank, 112 Ga. 617, 620, 37 S. E. 875, and citations. If the judge refuse to approve an exception of fact in an equity case, this court will not reverse the judgment, unless it is made to appear that he has abused his discretion, and in no case will it be held that there has been an abuse of discretion when there is any evidence to authorize the finding of the auditor. See the case just cited, and the cases therein referred to. It is incumbent, therefore, upon a plaintiff in error who complains of the refusal of the judge to approve an exception of fact to an auditor's report in an equity case, to show to the satisfaction of this court that the finding of the auditor complained of in the exception was unsupported by the evidence; the presumption being that the finding was correct. After a careful examination of the voluminous brief of evidence in the present case, we cannot say that it has been shown with certainty that any finding of the auditor was entirely unsupported by the evidence, and therefore error has not been made to appear in the ruling of the judge refusing to approve the exceptions of fact.

But it is said that this was not an equity case, and that therefore the exceptions of fact should have been submitted to a jury in any event. Whether a case is an equity case or a common-law case depends largely, if not entirely, upon the prayers. Steed v. Savage, 115 Ga. 97, 41 S. E. 272 (1). The plaintiff prayed for an accounting, but an accounting may be had either at law or in equity. But he also prayed for a decree dissolving a partnership, and for an injunction, and under the latter prayer obtained a temporary restraining order. That the case is an equity case does not seem to admit of any doubt.

The foregoing discussion disposes of all the questions involved except the one arising out of the auditor's finding that there was no partnership. It is unnecessary to determine whether, under the facts alleged in the petition, the plaintiff and the defendant were partners. As the auditor found that the relation existing between them was as set forth in the defendant's answer, and as the rights of third persons are not involved, and the auditor has made a full accounting between the parties in the light of his finding as to what were the facts with reference to their relationship to each other, it is immaterial to the present controversy what that relationship be denominated. The auditor has found what was the agreement between the parties, and has given effect to the rights of each under the terms of that agreement, and it is immaterial whether the relationship of partners existed, or that merely of principal and agent. No sufficient reason has been shown for reversing the judgment.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

LITTLE v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ — VIOLATION OF LAW — RULES OF COMPANY — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An employé cannot recover damages of a railroad company for an injury proximately caused by his violation of a penal statute or municipal ordinance. The principle is not modified where the employer may have directed the employé to violate the law, or may have sanctioned the continuance of a custom amounting to a contravention of the law.

2. The rules of a railroad company for the government of its employés are not obligatory, as such, upon those who do not know them, and to whom they have not been promulgated.

3. An employé cannot recover of a railroad company if he is negligent, and his negligence appreciably contributes to his injury.

4. The contentions of the plaintiff as made by the pleadings were fairly submitted to the jury.

5. The application of the charge of the court on the subject of contributory negligence to the evidence necessarily controlled the verdict, and the verdict for any minor error of law will not be set aside.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt Hodges, Judge.

Action by J. H. Little against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error, and defendant assigns cross-error. Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed. Cross-bill dismissed.

J. H. Little sued the Southern Railway Company for injuries alleged to have been received from a collision between two switch engines, one of which was operated by him as engineer. About 7 o'clock on the afternoon of July 1, 1902, he was directed to "break up" a train of cars just arrived from the North, in order to make up another for the South. In the performance of this order, it was necessary for him to pull his train to a point on the main line sufficiently far to clear a certain switch, and then push the cars back in a siding from this switch. Plaintiff started out on the main line with about 13 cars, loaded with coal, attached to his engine, and ran down the main line, crossing the track of the Central of Georgia Railroad Company, and stopped his train after the crossing was cleared. The track of the defendant road was down grade after the crossing was reached, and the plaintiff was unable to back his train into the switch intended. He made several attempts to do so, each time pulling his train a little further off to get the "slack," but was unable to push his cars back. Then he started his train down grade towards the passenger depot, running at a speed of about 8 or 10 miles an hour, crossing two streets of the city of Macon without checking his speed, and ran through a railroad culvert, located on an abrupt curve, into a switch engine that was bringing some cars from an opposite direction. In approaching the culvert his view of this switch engine was cut off by the high embankment through which the culvert extended. He contended, and the railway company denied, that he received a signal from the yardmaster to pull his train forward after his ineffectual efforts to back the cars. The evidence offered by the plaintiff tended to show that, in moving his train forward, he was acting under orders from the yardmaster; that the engine collided with was at the time running backward in making a "flying switch," and had no light or outlook on the rear; that the collision was the result of the negligence of the servants in charge of that engine in failing to provide proper warning, and in making a flying switch in opposition to the rules of the company; that, when plaintiff stopped just beyond the railroad crossing, he was signaled to go ahead by the defendant's servant; and that the collision was not the result of any negligence on his part. On the other hand, the railroad company offered evidence tending to show that the plaintiff violated the rules of the yard in moving his train so far; that he failed to stop within 50 feet of the track of the Central of Georgia Railroad, an intersecting railroad; that he failed to check the speed of his train when he was crossing the public streets of the city of Macon; and that at the time of the collision he was running his train at a speed of 15 to 20 miles an hour, in violation of the ordinance of the city of Macon which limited the rate of speed to 5 miles an hour. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff, by direct exception, brings the case here for review.

John R. Cooper, M. W. Harris, and J. H. Hall, for plaintiff in error. Dessau, Harris & Harris, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. 1. Within an hour after the plaintiff began to discharge his duties in shifting the cars, he violated two statutes of the state and a municipal ordinance of the city of Macon. When he ran on the main line with his cars, he failed to observe Civ. Code, § 2234, which required him to stop within 50 feet of the place of crossing the Central Railroad, which was an independent railroad. He did not stop before crossing the Central Railroad, but immediately after clearing the same he brought his cars to a full stop. It was afterwards that he ran his train down in the direction where the collision occurred. Plaintiff in error contends that in no sense was the failure to stop within 50 feet of the Central Railroad crossing a contributing cause of the injury, for the reason that he had crossed the railroad and come to a full stop, and, even if he had been negligent in violating the statute requiring him to stop within 50 feet of the crossing, that, having stopped his train just beyond the crossing, his failure to observe the statute could not have contributed to the injury. On the other hand, the railway company insists that this was a down grade, and, if he had stopped within 50 feet of the crossing, he would have been able to push the cars back into the siding, and that, because of his failure to observe the statute, and in going beyond the Central of Georgia Railroad crossing to a point so far down grade, he was unable to push the cars back, and was guilty of negligence. The court submitted this issue to the jury; instructing them that, unless they believed the failure on the part of the plaintiff to comply with this statute was a contributing cause of the injury, he would not be chargeable with negligence in failing to observe it.

Section 2234 is primarily designed to prevent collisions between the trains on the intersecting roads. Although the plaintiff did not comply with the statute in stopping within 50 feet of the intersecting road, he did bring his train to a full stop after crossing the track of the Central of Georgia Railroad Company. Relatively to what occurred after crossing that track, the failure to stop before he crossed it was not the proximate cause of the collision. Diligence might have required him to ask for assistance in backing his train, instead of moving further down grade, but his failure to stop his train within 50 feet of the railroad crossing is too remote to be regarded as a contributing cause of the collision with the other engine. But as the jury were instructed that this would not be an act of negligence unless it was found to be a contributing cause of the injury, and as the evidence demanded a finding that the injury proximately resulted from the violation of the statute requiring him to check the speed of his train while approaching a street crossing, and in running faster than was permitted by the municipal ordinance, the submission of this irrelevant issue should not have the effect of vitiating the only verdict which could properly have been rendered under the facts of the case.

After the plaintiff had stopped his train beyond the railroad crossing, and was unsuccessful in his attempts to back the cars, he started forward at a speed estimated by the witnesses as from 8 to 20 miles an hour, crossing two streets in the city of Macon without checking the speed of his train. The court charged Civ. Code, §§ 2222, 2224, requiring an engineer to check the speed of his locomotive within 400 yards of such crossings, so as to be able to stop in time should any person or thing be crossing the track; and in this connection the court instructed the jury that, if they believed that the failure of the plaintiff to observe this statutory requirement was a proximate cause of his injury, he would not be entitled to recover. There are several cases construing these sections of the Code. Their application has been confined to injuries to person or property occasioned by a railroad company at a grade crossing, and in these cases it has been held to be negligence per se not to comply with the statute. There has been no adjudication as to what effect a failure to observe this statute would have upon the engineer in the event he was injured at a point either on or near the crossing. The statute makes it the duty of the engineer, and not of the railroad company, to blow the whistle and check the speed of the train. If he fails to do this as required by the statute, he is subject to indictment for a misdemeanor; and if, in the commission of this criminal act, an injury results which could have been avoided but for the commission of that act, his right to recover from the railroad company will be defeated. 1 Labbatt on Master & Servant, § 362; Missouri Ry. Co. v. Roberts (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 270. The same may be said as to the violation of the speed ordinance of the city of Macon, which prohibits the running of trains in that portion of the city at a greater rate than 5 miles per hour. The plaintiff admits that at the time he sustained the injury the speed of his train was 8 to 10 miles an hour. When he collided with the other engine he was in actual violation of the speed ordinance of that city. He had just passed two street crossings without checking the speed of his train, or attempting to do so. He rushed towards the impending collision in disobedience of the state statute requiring him to check the speed of his locomotive at street crossings, and in disobedience of the municipal ordinance limiting him to a speed of 5 miles an hour. If his injury was caused by reason of a violation of either the statute or the ordinance, he would not be entitled to recover. But he says that he was commanded by the railroad company to disobey both the statute and the speed ordinance, and that, even if there was no express command to that effect, there had been such repeated violations as to amount to a custom. It would be contrary to public policy for courts to relieve a citizen of the consequences of his act in violating the law or his duty to society, and it cannot be any defense that some one else either assisted in the offense or commanded him to do it. Ry. Co. v. Roberts (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 270. It is no justification for one criminally responsible for his conduct that another commanded him to do an act which is inhibited by law. No custom, however universal, could have the effect of repealing a penal statute, and the mere forbearance of the corporation to prosecute for repeated violations of the ordinance would not amount to an implied repeal of the ordinance. Central R. R. v. Curtis, 87 Ga. 425, 13 S. E. 757. In Wallace v. Cannon, 38 Ga. 199, 95 Am. Dec. 385, a widow of a deceased employé sued the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company to recover damages because of the death of her husband by the alleged carelessness of the employés of the railroad company while her husband was acting as engineer. The defendant pleaded that at the time of the killing the railroad company was engaged in the transportation of insurrectionary troops to fight against the forces of the United States, and that the plaintiff, in propelling the train, was in resistance to the government of the United States. The court there ruled that where two or more parties are engaged in the same illegal transaction, and one is injured by the negligence or carelessness of the other, the courts will not lend their assistance to either party to recover damages. See Martin v. Wallace, 40 Ga. 52; Redd v. Muscogee R. Co., 48 Ga. 102. While approving the principle in the last three cases cited, we have serious doubt as to its application in those cases. It follows that, if the railway company either commanded or connived at a violation of the penal law, the plaintiff, who was the actual perpetrator, could not recover of the defendant for an injury traceable to a violation of the statute.

2. The court charged that an employé of a railway company is not bound by any rule, regulation, custom, or usage not communicated to him or furnished to him or spoken or told him, and of which he had no knowledge, and of which he could get no knowledge by the use and exercise of ordinary care and diligence. The error assigned upon this charge is that the law does not impose upon the employé the duty of exercising ordinary care in ascertaining the rules of the company. He is only bound by the rules promulgated by the company, and of which he has knowledge. As applied to the evidence, the jury could have understood the charge only to mean that an employé is not bound by any rule of which he had no knowledge, but, if there was furnished him an opportunity to learn the rules, and by the exercise of ordinary care he could have acquainted himself therewith, this would amount to knowledge. This statement of the rule is recognized in Port Royal Ry. Co. v. Davis, 95 Ga. 299, 22 S. E. 833; Carroll v. Ry. Co., 82 Ga. 452, 10 S. E. 163, 6 L. R. A. 214.

3. In order for an employé of a railroad company to recover damages from the company for an injury received while in its employment, it must appear that he was free from fault. This principle has been stated in many forms. The charge of the trial judge on this subject was modeled on Prather's Case, 80 Ga. 427, 9 S. E. 530 (2), 12 Am. St. Rep. 263. The statement of the doctrine that an employé of a railroad company cannot recover if he "immediately or remotely, directly or indirectly, caused the injury or any part of it, or contributed to it at all," has been approvingly cited in W. & A. R. R. v. Herndon, 114 Ga. 168, 39 S. E. 911. In Banking Co. v. Hicks, 95 Ga. 301, 22 S. E. 613 (2), it was said that "the negligence of the plaintiff, however slight, which contributes in an appreciable degree to the cause of the injury, defeats a recovery." If the negligence of the employé appreciably contributes to the injury, he cannot be free from fault, and, to recover, he must show himself blameless.

4. Complaint is made that the contentions of the plaintiff were not fully submitted in the charge. If the plaintiff desired any further elaboration of his contentions, he should have made an appropriate request. The charge was very elaborate, and covered every material phase of the case, and submitted every substantial issue to the jury.

5. Plaintiff in error did not make a motion for a new trial, but by direct exception complains of the various rulings and charges of the court. When he pursued the latter course, he staked his right to a reversal of the verdict upon strictly legal grounds. The controlling question in the case is the contributory negligence of the plaintiff in violating a penal statute and municipal ordinance. The charge of the court on this subject, applied to the evidence, necessarily controlled the verdict, and any minor errors of law will not have the effect of reversing the verdict.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed. Cross-bill of exceptions dismissed. All the Justices concurring.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v.
WEATHERS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 10, 1904.)

RAILROADS—INJURIES TO STOCK—PETITION.

1. The petition was good as against a general demurrer, and as amended it fully met the objections raised by the special demurrer filed.

2. In an action for damages against a railroad company for injuries to live stock, the presumption raised against the company, under Civ. Code, § 2321, upon proof of damage to the stock by the running and operation of the locomotive, cars, or other machinery of the defendant, extends only to the negligence alleged in the petition; and where the only negligence alleged was the failure to have a headlight on the engine which it was claimed caused the injury sued for it was not error for the court to charge that, if the plaintiff proved that the injury occurred as alleged in the petition, "the presumption of law would be * * * that it was the result of negligence on the part of the defendant—that is, that its failure to have a headlight on the engine was negligence." The last part of this charge clearly related to the presumption as above.

3. The record discloses no error in the admission of evidence; the ground of the motion based on the affidavits of persons who were not introduced as witnesses on the trial does not contend that these affidavits contained newly-discovered evidence, and sets forth no error on the part of the trial court; the evidence, while conflicting, was sufficient to sustain the finding for the plaintiff; and it does not appear that the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Chattooga County; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action by T. K. Weathers against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. D. Taylor, J. Branham, and W. S. McHenry, for plaintiff in error. H. F. Sharp and C. A. Thornwell, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. This was a suit for damages against a railroad company for alleged injuries to the plaintiff's mule, as a result of which the mule was rendered wholly useless. The petition charged that the defendant "was negligent in the running of its train [by which the mule was struck], and that the engine pulling said train did not have up a headlight, and that it was so dark that one was necessary." The particular train by which it was alleged the mule was struck was set out in the petition, and the injuries to the mule were described. The defendant demurred generally and specially, the general demurrer setting up that the petition failed to allege any specific acts of omission on the part of the company or its agents that would constitute negligence and authorize a recovery. To meet this demurrer the plaintiff amended his petition by alleging that the track or roadbed of the defendant at the point where the injury occurred was very nearly straight for a distance of about 400 yards south of the trestle where the mule was injured; that, if the company had had a headlight on the engine at the time of the injury, its servants would have seen the mule before running upon it, and could have stopped the train in time to have avoided the injury. It was charged that the running of the train at the time in question without a headlight was negligence on the part of the defendant company, and that, as a result of this negligence, the mule was not seen, and was run over and injured. The defendant insisted upon its demurrers, notwithstanding the amendment, but they were overruled. Exceptions pendente lite were filed to the overruling of the demurrers, and error assigned thereon in this court. On the trial the plaintiff introduced evidence from which the jury were authorized to find that the mule was struck by the train and injured as alleged in the petition, that at the time of the injury it was dark, and that the engine had no headlight. The evidence for the defendant was squarely in conflict with that for the plaintiff, and tended to show that the mule was not struck by the train at all. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant made a motion for a new trial, to the overruling of which it excepted.

1. That the petition was good as against a general demurrer is fully settled by the decision of this court in the case of Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Pierce, 120 Ga. —, 47 S. E. 581. The defendant could not admit the allegations of the petition and escape liability. It is equally clear that, in view of the amendment offered by the plaintiff, the special demurrer was properly overruled. The allegations as to the straightness of the track from the place of the injury in the direction from which the train was coming, the darkness of the evening, and the failure of the defendant to have any headlight on its engine clearly made out a case of negligence on the part of the company, in the absence of which the presence of the mule on the track could have been discovered and the injury avoided. The defendant was put on ample notice that the sole act of negligence relied on by the plaintiff was the alleged failure to have a headlight burning on its train, and was in a position to meet this issue by proving either that it did have a headlight, or that at the time in question it was daylight, and none was needed. The fact that on the trial the company did seek to prove the latter of the two alternatives renders it unnecessary to further discuss this feature of the case.

2. In the amendment to the motion for a new trial error is assigned upon the following charge of the court: "Now, gentlemen, if he [the plaintiff] has proved all these things to your satisfaction, then, nothing else appeating, he would be entitled to recover, because, if nothing else appeared except what I have just stated to you, then the presumption of law would be, when it is shown that the mule was injured in the manner charged, that it was the result of negligence on the part of the defendant; that is, that its failure to have a headlight on the engine was negligence." The objection made to this charge was that the court erred in the use of the phrase, "that its failure to have a headlight on the engine was negligence." From the entire charge of the court as sent up in the record it appears that in the portion thereof to which exception is taken the court was instructing the jury as to the law contained in Civ. Code 1895, § 2321. After reading that section, and just preceding the charge quoted, the court charged: "Now, gentlemen, in this case, before the plaintiff would make out his case prima facie, and nothing else appearing, * * * he must show that at or about the time mentioned in his petition * * * he was the owner of the mule described in the petition, and he must show that on that date the mule was struck by the engine or train of the defendant in this county; and he must show that it was injured in the particulars he sets out, by being struck in that way, or some one of those particulars, and must show that thereby it was so much injured as to be useless, and to render its killing necessary; and he must show that that mule was struck by the defendant's engine by reason of the fact that at the time the engine had no headlight; and then he must, of course, show some value of the mule." Taking this in connection with the portion of the charge complained of, which immediately follows it, it will be seen that, far from furnishing any ground for complaint on the part of the defendant, it is open to the criticism that it placed too great a burden on the plaintiff, in that it instructed the jury that, in order for the plaintiff to make out a prima facie case, he must show that the mule was struck by the defendant's engine by reason of the fact that at the time the engine had no headlight. When the plaintiff showed to the satisfaction of the jury that his mule was struck, as alleged in his petition, by the defendant's train, and proved the damages resulting therefrom, his case was prima facie made out; and the law, under section 2321 of the Civil Code of 1895, raised a presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant as alleged in the petition. This being the case, it was unnecessary, in order to make out a prima facie case, for the plaintiff to specifically prove the negligence alleged. Without entering into any discussion of the various decisions of this court on the subject, it is sufficient to say that in this state the law requires a plaintiff suing a railroad company for damages to person or property by the running of its trains to set out specifically in his petition the acts of negligence upon which he relies for a recovery, and a petition which is deficient in this respect is subject to a special demurrer. Blackstone v. R. Co., 105 Ga. 380, 31 S. E. 90; Russell v. R. Co., 119 Ga. 705, 46 S. E. 858; Seaboard R. Co. v. Pierce (Ga.) 47 S. E. 581. The case of Sims v. R. Co., 111 Ga. 820, 35 S. E. 696, would seem to hold a contrary view; but the Sims Case was decided by a divided bench, and must therefore yield as authority to the other cases cited, each of which was a unanimous decision of a full bench. This court has repeatedly ruled that a plaintiff cannot recover for acts of negligence proved against the defendant other than those alleged in his petition; and that while, under certain circumstances, evidence might be admissible as to other acts of negligence, such evidence can in no case be made the basis of a recovery in the absence of an allegation in the petition setting it up and claiming damages therefor. If there can be no recovery for acts of negligence not alleged in the petition, it follows as a logical conclusion that there is no presumption of negligence against the company other than as to acts alleged by the petition to have been negligent. The charge complained of, taken as a whole, in effect presented this view to the jury, the only fault in it being that it went further, and charged that the plaintiff must prove the particular act of negligence alleged in order to make out a prima facie case. This burden was not upon the plaintiff, although, as a matter of fact, it appears that he did introduce evidence to show that the injuries sued for were inflicted after dark on the day in question, and that at the time the engine carried no headlight. The evidence for the defendant tended to show that the engine in question did not strike the plaintiff's mule at all, and that at the time when it was claimed the mule was struck it was daylight, and no headlight was needed to enable the engineer to see the mule if he had been upon the track. The jury, under a fair charge, found in favor of the contentions of the plaintiff, and rendered a verdict in his behalf.

3. The motion also complains of the admission by the court of certain evidence for the plaintiff over the objection of the defendant's counsel that it was irrelevant. The mere fact that the evidence was irrelevant would not, without something to show that it injuriously affected the complaining party, be cause for a new trial. The evidence in question, however, which consisted of a written report of the section boss to the headquarters of the company, contained several statements which, inasmuch as the section boss was himself a witness on the trial, were relevant on the question of the credit to be given his testimony before the jury; and the admission of the report in evidence was not, therefore, for any reason assigned, erroneous.

What purports to be a third ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial might have had a persuasive effect upon the trial judge, inasmuch as it was based upon affidavits of witnesses of known character and standing as to material facts bearing upon the questions at issue on the trial before the jury. These affidavits were not offered as newly discovered evidence, and they could have had no other purpose than to affect the judge when he came to pass upon the general grounds of the motion. It was within the discretion of the court to consider the affidavits for this purpose, but he was in no sense bound to do so. It is a settled rule of this court that, where there is a conflict in the evidence, and the trial judge is satisfied with the conclusions reached by the jury, the verdict and judgment will not be disturbed. Following this rule, regardless of the truth of the disputed issues of fact, the jury having determined those issues in favor of the plaintiff, and the trial judge having approved their finding by refusing to grant a new trial, we will not interfere, although we might, as an original proposition, believe that the jury ought to have found differently. Taking the affidavits to which we have referred, we might be satisfied that the finding of the jury was wrong; but, those affidavits not being offered as newly-discovered evidence, we hold that upon none of the grounds of the motion was the refusal to grant a new trial erroneous.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

LAMAR v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

COMMON CHEAT—CONTRACT OF HIRING.

1. An act of the General Assembly, approved August 15, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90), provides that if any person shall contract with another to perform for him services of any kind, with intent to procure money or other thing of value thereby, and not to perform the service contracted for, to the loss and damage of the hirer, or, after having so contracted, shall procure money or other thing of value from the hirer, with intent not to perform the service, to the loss and damage of the hirer, he shall be deemed a common cheat and swindler, and shall be punished as for a misdemeanor. Held, that such act does not violate the constitutional inhibition against imprisonment for debt; the legislative purpose being, not to punish for a failure to comply with the obligation, but for the fraudulent intention with which the money or other thing of value is procured.

2. The evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to grant a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Valdosta; W. H. Griffin, Judge.

Kibby Lamar was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

Wilcox & Johnson, for plaintiff in error. S. M. Varnadoe, Sol., for the State.

COBB, J. The accused was prosecuted under the provisions of the act approved August 15, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90), which are set forth in the first headnote. In Calhoun's Case, 119 Ga. 312, 46 S. E. 428, which was also a prosecution under this act, no question as to the constitutionality of the act was raised, but attention was there called to the fact that the legislation was probably the result of prior decisions of this court under the laws in reference to cheating and swindling. In addition to the cases cited in Calhoun's Case, see Edge v. State, 114 Ga. 113, 39 S. E. 889. In the present case the accusation was demurred to on the ground that the act provided for imprisonment for debt, and if this objection is well taken the act is void. Civ. Code 1895, § 5718. If the act prescribes a punishment for a simple violation of a contractual obligation, it is beyond the power of the General Assembly. But if its purpose is to punish for fraudulent and deceitful practices, it is valid, even though the fraud or deceit may arise from the failure to comply with a contractual engagement. Fraudulent practices which resulted in one obtaining the money or property of another were in a number of instances denounced as crimes by the common law, and by statute, both in England and in this country, a number of such practices have been declared to be crimes, although the particular practice was not embraced within the definition of any common-law offense. The right of the lawmaking power to declare fraudulent practices a crime does not seem to have ever been seriously questioned. The various sections embraced in the chapter of our Penal Code which deals with the subject of cheats and swindlers show that not only are many of the fraudulent practices which were condemned at common law still crimes in this state, but that the General Assembly has from time to time created other offenses which are based upon such practices. See Pen. Code 1895, § 658 et seq. The General Assembly cannot, under the guise of a statute creating a criminal offense, imprison one who has failed to pay a debt; but if one in becoming a debtor perpetrates upon another a fraudulent practice, it is not beyond the province of the lawmaking power to denounce as a crime the fraudulent practice, and imprison him who has been guilty of the practice, notwithstanding he may be at the same time under the obligation of a debtor to him upon whom the fraud was perpetrated. It is reasonably clear that in enacting the statute now under consideration the legislative purpose was not to punish one simply for a failure to pay a debt, but was to punish the act of securing the money or property of another with a fraudulent intent not to perform the service, the promise to do which was the consideration for such money or property. This distinguishes the present case very clearly from that of State v. Coal Company, 92 Tenn. 81, 20 S. W. 499, 36 Am. St. Rep. 68, which was cited and relied on by the plaintiff in error. Nor does our decision necessarily conflict with that in Carr

v. State, 106 Ala. 35, 17 South. 350, 34 L. R. A. 634, 54 Am. St. Rep. 17, also cited by the plaintiff in error. The court construed the statute involved in that case in such a way as to make its chief purpose the collection of a debt by duress of imprisonment, and if this construction was right the conclusion inevitably followed. Our statute is not susceptible of such a construction. There was no error in overruling the demurrer.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and no reason appears for reversing the judgment.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

(120 Ga. 453)

NASHVILLE, C. & ST. L. RY. v. MILLER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 10, 1904.)

RAILROADS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—MITIGATION OF DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS—PLEADING.

1. The fact that a person other than the wrongdoer, as a mere gratuity, pays to one injured as the result of his negligence a sum of money equal to the amount he would have earned had he been able to work during the period of disability, will not mitigate the damages due by the wrongdoer to the injured party for lost time.

2. The rule just stated is applicable, though the person making the payment is the employer of the injured party.

3. Quare, whether the wrongdoer can plead the payment to diminish the amount of his liability, when, under the terms of the contract of employment, the injured party had a legal right to demand it.

4. When a petition in an action for personal injuries contains allegations which in a general way show that the plaintiff has lost time, and evidence which fixes the time lost and the value of such time with certainty is admitted without objection, a charge that plaintiff is entitled to recover for lost time such an amount as the evidence authorizes will not be held to be erroneous, though there is in the petition no distinct claim for damages on account of lost time.

5. None of the evidence objected to was inadmissible for any of the reasons assigned.

6. An allegation in a petition that the plaintiff "has suffered and will continue to suffer great pain" is sufficient to authorize the admission of evidence that mental pain has been suffered, and, when such evidence is admitted, there is no error in charging the jury that in assessing the damages they may take into consideration the mental pain suffered by the plaintiff.

7. The charge as a whole was free from error. The verdict was warranted by the evidence, and was not excessive. No sufficient reason has been shown for reversing the judgment.

Error from Superior Court, Dade County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by J. T. Miller against the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Payne & Tye and R. J. & J. McCamy, for plaintiff in error. Rosser & Brandon and Ben J. Conyers, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Miller was a railway mail clerk, and received injuries as the result of a collision between the train upon which he was working and another train. He brought his action for damages against the railway company, and at the trial it was conceded that he was entitled to recover; the sole issue in the case being as to the amount of damages which should be awarded him. The jury returned a verdict for $4,000. The defendant made a motion for a new trial upon numerous grounds, and complains that the court erred in overruling the same.

1-3. Error is assigned upon the following charge: "It is immaterial whether the government paid the plaintiff anything or not. That would not affect the rights of the plaintiff in this case to recover against the railroad company." Error is further assigned upon the refusal of the judge to give in charge a written request which was as follows: "Plaintiff admits in his testimony that he received from the government his regular salary during the time he did not work on account of his injury. This being so, I charge you that he cannot recover anything on this account for time lost, as claimed in his declaration." King, an assistant division railway mail superintendent, testified as follows: Plaintiff "returned to work about June 10, 1903—about the time his year expired. If he had not gone back to work he would have been granted further time, but his pay would have stopped. The government pays them for one year when they are disabled from work. This is done on physician's certificate for no period longer than sixty days consecutively, and not to exceed one year in total." The amount thus received by the plaintiff was $1,400. While the statute or regulation of the Post-Office Department under which this payment was made does not appear in the record, nor is it cited in the briefs of counsel, the payment was evidently made under the provisions of section 1424 of the postal laws and regulations, which reads as follows: "Whenever a railway postal clerk shall be disabled while in the actual discharge of his duties by a railroad or other accident beyond his power to control, he shall send to the division superintendent a certificate of his attending physician or surgeon, sworn to before an officer authorized to administer oaths, who has an official seal, setting forth the nature, extent, and cause of his disability, and the probable duration of the same; and such further evidence as to the character of the disability as may be necessary shall be furnished. The division superintendent will forward the certificate, with his recommendation, to the general superintendent of the railway mail service, who will submit the matter to the Postmaster-General, who may, in his judgment, the facts justifying such action, grant such disabled clerk leave of absence with pay for periods of not exceeding sixty days each, and not exceeding one year in all."

In considering whether the assignments of error under consideration are well taken, it is necessary to determine whether the payment referred to in the testimony was of such a character as to preclude the plaintiff from claiming compensation for lost time against the railway company. When one engaged in any calling or avocation from which he derives a pecuniary benefit is compelled to give up for a time the performance of his duties, as the result of an injury inflicted upon him by a wrongdoer, he is entitled, as a general rule, to demand compensation for the time thus lost at the hands of the wrongdoer who inflicted the injury. The general rule is that, where a wrongdoer causes time to be lost, he will not be heard to say that the person injured has suffered no pecuniary loss, because he has received, as a direct result of being injured, contributions which in amount aggregate more than what would have been earned during the time; nor will his liability be diminished to the extent of contributions which were less than what would have been earned. If, from motives of affection, philanthropy, or as the result of a contract, the plaintiff has received from one other than his employer any sums, the reception of which are directly attributable to the fact that he has been injured, the person causing the injury will not be allowed to urge the payment of such sums in mitigation of the damages claimed against him. Thus, it has been held that the damages will not be reduced by any amount of insurance received in consequence of the wrongdoer's act. See Western & Atlantic Railroad v. Meigs, 74 Ga. 857 (5); Cunningham v. R. Co., 102 Ind. 478, 1 N. E. 800, 52 Am. Rep. 683. Nor will the fact that medical attention and nursing have been rendered gratuitously preclude the injured party from recovering the value of such services (Brosnan v. Sweetser [Ind. Sup.] 26 N. E. 555; Pennsylvania Co. v. Marion, 104 Ind. 239, 3 N. E. 874; Varnham v. Council Bluffs [Iowa] 3 N. W. 792), though it has been held that no recovery can be had for the value of services of this character rendered by members of the family, unless an agreement to pay for them be shown (Goodhart v. R. Co. [Pa.] 35 Atl. 191, 55 Am. St. Rep. 705). Ought the rule to be different where the employer, from motives of humanity, sympathy, business interest, and the like, pays to the injured employé, as a mere gratuity, for a given time, an amount which he would have been authorized to demand if he had performed the services of his employment, but which he had no right to demand unless the services were performed? In Texas it has been held that an amount paid by an employer, whether paid as the result of a direct undertaking or as a mere gratuity, cannot be pleaded in mitigation of damages. Missouri Ry. Co. v. Jarrard, 65 Tex. 560. In an Indiana case the same rule was laid down, though it does not appear distinctly whether the payment was made as the result of a contract or as a gratuity. Ohio R. Co. v. Dickerson, 59 Ind. 317. It has been held by the courts of last resort of New York and Alabama, and by intermediate courts in Missouri, that where an employer pays to his employé, during the period of his disability, an amount which would be equal to his wages earned if he had been at work, the employé cannot seek compensation for lost time against a wrongdoer who causes the time to be lost. See Drinkwater v. Dinmore, 80 N. Y. 390, 36 Am. Rep. 624; Montgomery Ry. Co. v. Mallette, 92 Ala. 210, 9 South. 363 (6); Lee v. Western Union Tel. Co., 51 Mo. App. 375 (6), 385; Ephland v. Ry. Co., 57 Mo. App. 147 (4), 160. A ruling to the same effect seems to have been made by Lore, C. J., on circuit in Delaware. Chielinsky v. Hoopes, 40 Atl. 1127 (6). None of these cases seem to lay any stress upon the question as to whether the payment was a gratuity, or was required by the contract of employment. The cases referred to above are cited in the different text-books on Damages. These text-writers do not agree as to what is the correct rule, but Mr. Watson distinctly takes the position that the sounder view is that which would preclude the wrongdoer from taking advantage of the employer's having, from reasons satisfactory to himself, paid to his injured employé an amount which would have been equal to his wages if he had performed the services for the period during which he was disabled. See Watson's Dam. Pers. Inj. § 479; 1 Suth. Dam. (3d Ed.) § 158; 2 Rorer on R. R. p. 859; 1 Joyce on Dam. § 231; Voorhies on Dam. p. 61. See, also, the article written by Mr. Watson, the author of the work above cited, in 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) p. 649. We think the view taken by Mr. Watson, and which seems also to be concurred in by Mr. Sutherland and Mr. Rorer, is sounder than that which appears to be approved by the other text-writers. The wrongdoer may show, in defense to a claim for lost time, that no time has been lost; and this, of course, is right and just, because, if no time has been lost, no compensation is due from anybody on account of lost time. But if time has been lost as the result of a tort, sound sense, common justice, and, it may be, public policy would demand that the tortfeasor be prohibited from making a defense founded upon the proposition that he has been guilty of a wrong—it may be, a grievous and outrageous wrong—but that some third person, not only not in sympathy with the wrongdoer, but despising him and his act, has, from some worthy motive, paid to the injured person an amount which, if it had come from the wrongdoer, would have equalled the damages which would have been assessed against him. There is nothing in the record to show that the government, in its contract of employment with railway postal clerks, stipulates for the payment of salary during periods of disability; and, so far as the record discloses, when such an employé is disabled from work, he cannot, as a matter of right, demand anything from the government by way of compensation during the period of disability. There is nothing in the testimony of the witness King to indicate that payments are made in such cases otherwise than as a matter of grace. If we look at the postal law or regulation above quoted, it is perfectly clear that the payment is a mere gratuity on the part of the government. We are therefore not confronted in the present case with the necessity for deciding the question as to what would be the rule in the event that the injured employé, under his contract of employment, had a right to demand of his employer the amount which he would have earned as wages during the period he was disabled. On this question we now make no authoritative ruling, but we do rule that where an employer pays to an injured employé, as a matter of grace, the amount which he would have earned as wages if he had not been disabled, a wrongdoer who brings about the disability has no concern with this transaction between the employer and the employé, and the amount so paid is not to be regarded as in any sense compensation for lost time. Hence there was no error in the charge complained of, nor in refusing the instruction requested.

4. Complaint is also made that the court's charge in reference to lost time was erroneous, for the reason that there was no allegation in the petition claiming compensation for lost time. The petition did not in terms ask damages for lost time. It did allege that the plaintiff "was confined to his bed for many weeks"; that he was "earning $1,400 at the time of his injury"; that "his capacity to labor has been largely and permanently impaired." He claimed damages in the sum of $500 for doctor's bills, medicine, and nurse hire; laying the aggregate damages which he claimed to have sustained in the sum of $10,000. Under these general allegations the plaintiff offered evidence to show that he had lost time, and the evidence set forth with certainty the time lost, to wit, one year, less two days. In Savannah Ry. Co. v. Holland, 82 Ga. 258, 10 S. E. 200, 14 Am. St. Rep. 158 (4), it was held that it was not necessary that punitive damages should be claimed eo nomine in a petition; that it was enough if the facts alleged and the proof be such as to warrant the assessment. In the present case the general allegations of the petition were sufficient to show that time had been lost, and any defect in reference to specific details should have been taken advantage of by special demurrer. The evidence in reference to lost time having been admitted without objection, there was no error in the charge that plaintiff was entitled to recover for lost time if the evidence authorized it. In Western & Atlantic R. Co.

v. Patillo, 99 Ga. 97, 24 S. E. 958, there was neither allegation nor evidence in reference to lost time, and it was therefore manifest error to instruct the jury on the subject. In the present case there was ample evidence admitted without objection, and the allegations of the petition, though general, were sufficient to cover the subject in the absence of a special demurrer.

5. In four grounds of the motion for a new trial, complaint is made of rulings of the court on the admission of evidence. In two of them it is alleged that it was error to admit certain evidence in reference to the character of the injuries sustained by the plaintiff, on the ground that there was no allegation to authorize the admission of such evidence. In another ground the evidence objected to was by a witness that the plaintiff complained of a great deal of pain, the objection being that it was hearsay; and, in still another ground, evidence of the plaintiff's wife was objected to, to the effect that the plaintiff returned home from his first trip after the injury, and immediately went to bed, and that she had to rub him quite often. The allegations of the petition were sufficiently broad to authorize the admission of the evidence first above referred to, and the other evidence was not inadmissible for any reason assigned in the motion for a new trial.

6. The judge charged the jury that, in determining the damages to be assessed, they could take into consideration the mental suffering that the plaintiff had undergone as a result of the injury. Objection is made to this charge on the ground that there were no allegations in the petition to authorize any charge on the subject of mental pain. The petition alleges that the plaintiff was confined to his bed for many months on account of the injury, and that "he has suffered and will continue to suffer great pain." This allegation in reference to pain was sufficiently broad to authorize the introduction of evidence in regard to mental pain, and, evidence to this effect having been introduced, there was no error in charging on the subject.

7. The motion for a new trial contains numerous exceptions to the charge, but, when the extracts excepted to are considered in the light of the entire charge, we do not think they were erroneous for any reason assigned, nor was any error committed which required the granting of a new trial. The charge, taken as a whole, seems to have fairly and fully submitted the issues to the jury. If the judge did not go into detail as fully as defendant's counsel desired, this should have been made the subject of special requests, or at least the attention of the judge should have been called thereto. We find no error of law which in our opinion would authorize a reversal of the judgment. The remaining question grows out of that ground of the motion which complains that the verdict is excessive. Under the view we have taken of the case, the evidence authorized a finding of $1,400 for lost time. The evidence also authorized a finding for the physical suffering which the plaintiff underwent, and this would itself be sufficient to justify the remainder of the verdict, even if nothing was allowed for mental suffering, and the jury had determined the issue in reference to permanent disability in favor of the company.

HOLMES et al. v. HOLMES et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)
SECOND TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—LAW OF THE CASE.

1. The charge complained of was fully in accord with the law of this case as announced when it was first before this court (33 S. E. 216, 106 Ga. 858). The requests to charge were, in part, contrary to the doctrine laid down. Those which were not, and which were pertinent and applicable, were fully covered by the charge as given. The evidence was conflicting, but warranted the verdict, and it was not error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

NATIONAL BLDG. ASS'N v. QUIN.
USURY — PLEADING — ADMISSIONS OF AGENT—RECEPTION OF LETTER—EVIDENCE—ACTS OF AGENT.

1. The answer of the defendant was not subject to demurrer upon the ground that it attempted "to set up the plea of usury, and [contained] no allegation of fact which, if proved, would take the contract sued on out of that class of contracts of building associations recognized by the law as not being usurious."

2. Declarations of an agent as to business transacted by him, in order to be admissible against his principal, must have been made by him while representing the principal in the transaction in controversy, and must also have been a part of the negotiation, and constituting the res gesta.

3. Evidence that a letter was written to a given person does not authorize a presumption that he received it, unless the evidence also shows that such letter was properly addressed, duly stamped, and mailed.

4. It is erroneous to admit in evidence, over proper objection by the party against whom it is offered, an advertisement published in a newspaper by a person while acting as his agent in a matter to which it is claimed such advertisement referred, when it appears that such person made the publication in his individual capacity, and there is no evidence to show that the party against whom it is offered authorized the publication, or by subsequent ratification adopted it as his own.

Error from City Court of Washington; W. H. Toombs, Judge.

Action by the National Building Association against B. L. Quin. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. A. Slaton, for plaintiff in error. S. H. Hardeman and Colley & Sims, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. There was a demurrer to the answer filed by the defendant, which demurrer was overruled by the court, and the first question to be decided is whether the court erred in this ruling. The suit was apparently one by a building and loan association against one of its borrowing members and stockholders for the recovery of the amount due to the association by such member and stockholder upon an advance made by it to her upon her stock, and for the establishment in the judgment of a special lien upon described land, which had been conveyed by the debtor to the creditor as security for the debt. The answer of the defendant set up the defense of usury, under which she sought both to reduce the amount of the plaintiff's claim and to invalidate the security deed. The demurrer was "that said answer is not sufficient in law, for that it attempts to set up the plea of usury, and contains no allegation of fact which, if proved, would take the contract sued on out of that class of contracts of building associations recognized by the law as not being usurious." Taking the allegations of the plaintiff's petition to be true, the case would fall within the well-settled rule in this state that the ordinary contract between a legitimate building and loan association and one of its borrowing members and stockholders is not usurious, although the borrower may therein obligate himself to pay more for the use of the money advanced upon his stock than interest thereon at the highest rate which the law authorizes in other contracts. But these allegations, except as to the giving of the bond sued on and the execution and delivery of the security deed, were expressly denied by the defendant. All that she admitted was "that said bond and written instrument sued on were given by her as alleged in the petition," and she immediately explained and limited this admission by alleging that "they were given as security of said loan of $1,800 and six per cent. interest," and that, "under the contract between her and plaintiff, she was a mere borrower, and not in any wise a stockholder in said plaintiff company"; that the plaintiff "approached her, before said loan was made, with the distinct proposition to loan her the said $1,800, stating that it did not wish any stock subscriptions or to obtain any stockholder, but merely [desired] to loan its money, of which it had an abundance to loan"; "that the money would not bear exceeding six and one-half per cent. per annum, and that their method of doing business was adopted merely as a convenient way of loaning and securing its money"; that she "was assured by the plaintiff that the intention of both parties, which was to act merely in the relation of lender and borrower, would be accomplished by the execution of the papers she signed, and that she was borrowing the money at the rate of six and one-half per cent. as aforesaid." She further alleged "that plaintiff adopted this method of doing business, not bona fide as a legitimate building and loan association, but merely as a device to evade the laws of Georgia in regard to usury, and in fraud of [her] rights," and that the "whole business of plaintiff's company was on the line of this transaction with defendant, and its sole purpose in doing business in this state was to lend money at usurious rates of interest." The answer denied the allegation of the petition that at the time the contract was entered into the defendant was a member of the alleged building and loan association; denied the allegation that, while a member of such association, she applied for and obtained an advance on stock which she owned therein; and, after making these denials, admitted the giving of the bond set out in the plaintiff's petition, but qualified and restricted this admission as above indicated, so that it did not conflict with these denials, but amounted simply to an admission that she did execute and deliver the written instruments to the plaintiff, but did so merely for the purpose of borrowing money from the plaintiff, who had adopted this method of making loans in order to evade the laws of this state against usury.

If the understanding between the parties, prior to and at the time that the contract was entered into, was that the defendant was not to become a stockholder in a building and loan association, but the relation of the parties was to be merely that of lender and borrower, and in this transaction the plaintiff adopted the mere forms of a building and loan association's method of doing business, "not bona fide as a legitimate building and loan association, but merely as a device to evade the laws of Georgia in regard to usury," certainly these facts would take the contract between the parties "out of that class of contracts of building and loan associations recognized by the law as not being usurious." The question raised by the demurrer was not whether the contract alleged in the plaintiff's petition was usurious, but whether the contract alleged in the defendant's answer was usurious. The contract set forth in the petition was one thing, and the contract alleged in the answer was another. The one was apparently a legitimate building and loan association contract. The other was simply a contract for the loan of money at usurious interest, masquerading in the habiliments of a building and loan contract for the purpose of concealing its real usurious character. Whatever else may be said of the defendant's answer, it was not subject to this demurrer. The demurrer was evidently based on the ruling of this court in Goodrich v. Atlanta National Building & Loan Association, 96 Ga. 808, 22 S. E. 585, which is cited by counsel for defendant in error in its support. In that case it was held that "the pleas alleging usury, and which were stricken, on motion, by the court, containing no averments of fact which take the present out of that class of cases in which, according to the rulings of this court, contracts purely mutual between the members of building and loan associations, where each member takes an interest in the several contributions to a general fund, are held to be not usurious, were therefore properly stricken." While the answer of the defendant in that case did allege that "the scheme by which she borrowed the money was a scheme to evade the usury laws of this state, and the contract usurious," it set up no facts to show that the actual contract between the parties was otherwise than as the plaintiff alleged. The defendant there did not deny that the plaintiff was a legitimate building and loan association, nor deny that she was, when the contract sued on was entered into, a member and stockholder of such association, nor did she deny that the contract sued on was the one which she made with the plaintiff. So there were no averments of fact in reference to the contract or the relations of the parties to take the case out of the established rule with reference to building and loan contracts.

As we have seen, the demurrer in the present case simply presented the question whether, if the defendant proved all that she alleged, the plea of usury would be sustained. We are clearly of opinion that the plaintiff could not admit all the allegations of the answer as to the relations of the parties when the contract was entered into, and their mutual understanding and intention in reference thereto, and still maintain the action for the full amount sued for, and a special lien on the land alleged to have been conveyed to it to secure the payment of the debt. The court did not err in overruling this demurrer.

2. Three of the grounds of the motion for a new trial may be considered together, as the same considerations will dispose of each of them. O. M. Smith, a witness for the defendant, testified in part as follows: "Mr. J. M. Anderson was the state agent of the plaintiff.

When he first came to Washington, he approached me to act as agent for the National Building Association. I declined to talk to him about it. I told him that our people had been so badly hit by building associations that he could get no subscribers to the stock of such associations here. He said he did not wish to get subscribers to such stock, but all they wanted was borrowers. Said the company had a great deal of money to loan; had fifty thousand dollars to place in Washington, Ga. At first I refused to consider his proposition, but he afterwards talked to Mr. R. H. Wooten, and came back to me, and, after he explained it to me, I accepted the position. Mr. Anderson told me the interest on the money advanced by the company would amount to about 6% in advance, making an interest rate of not more than 6½%. Upon this I took the local agency, and advertised the lending of money at 6½%, as shown by this advertisement." The plaintiff moved to rule out this testimony, because no authority has been shown in Anderson to bind the plaintiff by the admission contained in such conversations, and because the testimony showed that this was not a part of the res gestæ of the transaction between the plaintiff and the defendant. This motion was overruled by the court, and, in the motion for a new trial, error was assigned upon this ruling. H. P. Quin, a witness for the defendant, was asked by defendant's counsel: "Did you ever have a conversation with J. M. Anderson with reference to this matter between Mrs. Quin and the association?" He answered: "I had a conversation with Mr. J. M. Anderson about a year after this contract was made. He told me that the primary object of the association was to lend money, and that Mrs. Quin would be settled with at the rate of 6½%, and that she would be allowed that rate of interest on all that she had paid into the association." The plaintiff objected to this testimony upon the grounds that no authority had been shown in Anderson to bind the association; that parol evidence was not admissible to alter or contradict a written contract; and because the evidence was not a part of the res gestæ. The court overruled this objection, and complaint was made in the motion for a new trial of this ruling. Subsequently the plaintiff moved to rule out this testimony upon the same grounds, and the overruling of this motion is one of the grounds upon which a new trial was asked. Neither the declarations of Anderson made in his conversations with Smith, nor his declarations in the conversation with Quin, were a part of the res gestæ of the transaction involved in this case. Anderson did not represent the plaintiff in any negotiation with the defendant. His declarations to Smith did not even relate to the contract in controversy, but to an entirely different transaction, between different parties. His declarations to Quin were made long after the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant was entered into, and, besides, were not the declarations of an agent of the plaintiff who represented it in the negotiation with the defendant. Declarations or admissions of an agent as to business transacted by him are not admissible against his principal unless they were part of the negotiation, and constitute the res gestæ, or the agent be dead. Civ. Code 1895, § 3034; Griffin v. Montgomery & West Point R. Co., 26 Ga. 111; Evans v. Atlanta Ry. Co., 56 Ga. 498; Chattanooga R. Co. v. Liddell, 85 Ga. 482, 11 S. E. 853, 21 Am. St. Rep. 169; Hematite Mining Co. v. East Tenn. Ry. Co., 92 Ga. 268, 18 S. E. 24; Southern Ry. Co. v. Kinchen, 103 Ga. 186, 29 S. E. 816; Southern Ry. Co. v. Allison, 115 Ga. 635, 42 S. E. 15. The declarations of an agent, in order to be admissible against his principal, must relate to the identical transaction in controversy. Dorne v. Southwork, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 205; Barber's Adm'r v. Bennett, 62 Vt. 50, 19 Atl. 978.

While Wharton lays down the rule that "a party who commits the management of his whole business, or a particular line of business, to an agent, is bound by the admissions of the agent, as to his entire business committed to him," and that "when the agent is a general agent, representing his principal continuously," it is not "necessary for the admission of such declarations that they should either have been part of the res gestæ or should have been authorized" (Whart. Ev. § 1177), the courts are by no means harmonious in holding such to be the rule. There is, however, no necessity for us to consider this question in the present case, for clearly there was no evidence to show that the plaintiff had committed the management of its whole business to Anderson, or that it had committed any business whatever to him, save, perhaps, that of the selection and appointment of local agents in the state of Georgia. If he had any other power as "state agent," the evidence fails to disclose it. Indeed, all that it can be fairly said the evidence shows as to his authority is that he had authority to select and appoint a local agent for the plaintiff for the city of Washington, Ga., and the only evidence of even this authority is that he induced Smith to accept such agency; and the plaintiff apparently ratified his act in so doing, by afterwards recognizing Smith as its local representative to a certain extent. It follows that the court erred in each of these rulings.

3, 4. Another ground of the motion for a new trial is that the court erred in admitting, over the objection of the plaintiff, the following advertisement, printed in the Washington Gazette of December 8, 1899: "Money to loan on City Real Estate, 1 to 10 years, rate 6 per cent. O. M. Smith." This was objected to on the grounds that it was immaterial, that the advertisement appeared to have been published several months after the consummation of the contract sued on, and that no proof had been offered to connect the plaintiff with it. We think that the court erred in admitting this advertisement in evidence. It appeared upon its face to be simply the advertisement of O. M. Smith, and there was no evidence which showed that the plaintiff had any connection whatever with it. For this reason, if for no other, it was inadmissible. Counsel for the defendant in error contend that it was admissible because the defendant's husband testified that he saw the same advertisement in this paper before he, as agent for his wife, began with Smith the negotiations which resulted in the contract in controversy, and because Smith testified that he sent a copy of this advertisement to the building and loan association. While Smith did testify that he inclosed a copy of this advertisement in a letter which he wrote to the association about other matters, there was nothing to show that this letter was properly addressed, duly stamped, or mailed, and, unless all this had appeared, no presumption of the receipt of the letter could have arisen. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 1255, and cases cited in notes. Besides, even if we assume that the letter, with its inclosure, was received by the plaintiff association, there was no proof that Smith's letter to the association about other matters contained anything which required the plaintiff to either ratify or repudiate his act in publishing this notice, nor was there anything to show that the plaintiff did not repudiate it. Smith himself testified that it was his advertisement, and not that of the association, and certainly his mere inclosure of a copy of it in a letter which he wrote to the plaintiff about other matters, without more, would not place the plaintiff in a position where it had to either ratify or repudiate the publication.

There was no error in admitting, over the objection of the plaintiff, the itemized statements of account sent by the plaintiff to the defendant.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

SIMPSON v. WICKER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)

COSTS — AFFIDAVIT FORMA PAUPERIS—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—LIMITATIONS.

1. Under the act approved December 20, 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 79), an affidavit in forma pauperis before a foreign notary, with his seal attached, is receivable in the courts of this state, and sufficient to prevent a dismissal of a bill of exceptions for failure to pay costs.

2. The refusal to dismiss a case because of the failure of the plaintiff to attach a bill of particulars does not afford ground for the grant of a new trial. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4963, 5642.

3. The evidence was conflicting. There was testimony that at the time the services were rendered the defendant was a resident of this state, and shortly afterwards removed therefrom, so that the claim was not barred by the statute. Civ. Code 1895, § 3783.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by R. H. Wicker against J. H. Simpson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Dr. R. H. Wicker brought suit by attachment against Mrs. J. H. Simpson. The defendant filed a plea of the statute of limitations; that she was a married woman, and had never undertaken to pay the debt sued on, which was for medical services rendered to herself. She further pleaded that the debt had been paid by her husband. There was evidence that she and her husband lived in Alabama; that she returned to Georgia, and while ill sent for the plaintiff, agreeing to pay him out of her separate estate, and stating at the same time that she had returned to Georgia to live. A few months thereafter she returned to Alabama, and had been living there five or six years before the suit was brought. The plaintiff testified that he had sent her his bill; that she replied, admitting its correctness and her responsibility therefor, and promised payment. There was practically no dispute as to the correctness of the account, but much evidence for the defendant to the effect that she had never moved back to Georgia, and had never promised to pay the debt out of her separate estate, and had never treated the claim as due by herself. The jury found for the plaintiff. The defendant moved for a new trial on the general grounds, and because the court erred in not dismissing the attachment suit upon the ground that plaintiff did not attach a bill of particulars, and because the court allowed the testimony of the plaintiff as to the contents of a lost letter from defendant, admitting the debt and promising to pay the same, on the ground that the suit was not based thereon. On the call of the case here, attention was called to the fact that the affidavit in forma pauperis had been made before a notary in the state of Alabama, and, while his seal was attached, there was nothing to show that under the laws of Alabama a notary had the right to administer oaths, or that he was in fact a notary.

C. E. Carpenter and Cantrell & Ramsaur, for plaintiff in error. H. F. Sharp and Starr & Erwin, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. 1. Under the requirements of Civ. Code 1895, § 5614, the clerk of this court has raised the question as to whether an affidavit in forma pauperis made in a foreign state before a notary public is sufficiently authenticated by that officer's seal, where there is nothing further to show that he has statutory authority to administer oaths. The matter is of practical importance, inasmuch as it involves the admissibility of such affidavits on applications for injunction and in other legal proceedings. Nor is it free from difficulty, for there is great conflict in the decisions as to whether a notary public has the inherent power to administer an oath, or to attest affidavits, in any matter not connected with the protest of commercial paper. The question has never been directly and authoritatively passed upon in this state. In Charles v. Foster, 56 Ga. 612, it was decided that there was no presumption that he had any authority to attest a claim affidavit and approve a claim bond; this being out of the sphere of commerce, and involving the power of a magistrate or justice of the peace, his seal was no proof that he had such jurisdiction. In Brunswick Hardware Co. v. Bingham, 107 Ga. 270, 33 S. E. 56, "there was no authentication, other than his own signature, that the person attesting, the affidavit was a notary," it appearing both from the published opinion and the original record that no seal was attached. Outside of Georgia the decisions are directly in conflict on the subject. The courts of Alabama, Illinois, Michigan, Colorado, and Indiana hold that affidavits before a foreign notary are inadmissible when authenticated solely by his seal of office. Some of these decisions are based, at least in part, on the language of the statute defining the terms upon which foreign affidavits may be received in legal proceedings. In England, Maryland, District of Columbia, New York, and Minnesota the courts receive such affidavits when authenticated by the notary's seal. The Supreme Court of Minnesota, in Wood v. St. Paul, etc., Co. (Minn.) 41 N. W. 308, 7 L. R. A. 149, delivered a vigorous opinion to the effect that such affidavits were admissible when attested by the seal, and that, whether the power of notaries to administer oaths and attest affidavits was of statutory or customary origin, it was universal, and that, for a time beyond living memory, affidavits made before foreign notaries, when attested under their seals, had been received in the courts of England. Walrond v. Van Moses, 8 Mod. *323, was decided in 1722, before our adopting statute. There, on an application to change bail, the court held that "a plaintiff who was in Holland might make an affidavit there and get it attested by a public notary, and should be admitted in evidence to hold the defendant to special bail here." In Tucker v. Ladd, 4 Cow. 47, an affidavit taken before a notary in New Hampshire was allowed, over objections, to be read in a hearing in New York. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 565. At one time there appears to have been doubt as to the power of notaries to attest affidavits in this state. It was removed by the act of 1863. Pol. Code 1895, § 503 (4). This statute, however, was probably in part declaratory of a power already recognized. Prior to that date no act had been passed defining their duties, or authorizing notaries to administer any sort of an oath. When they were elected by the General Assembly (Acts 1814, p. 78), or by the courts (Cobb, Dig. p. 206), nothing was said as to their powers or duties. They were referred to as officers whose functions were well known, among which was the power to administer oaths. For the fee bill of 1792 (Cobb, Dig. p. 352) allows them to charge "for every protest and oath included, $2.00," and "for administering an oath in any other case, .25."

From the act of 1792, therefore, it seems evident that the Legislature assumed that notaries had the power to administer oaths by virtue of their office. It was a power not then granted, but recognized as inherent in notaries the world over. That such was the practice appears from Solomon v. Lacey, Dudley, 82, where "the bare certificate of a notary public of New Jersey to the oath" was received here in 1831. And therefore, whatever the conflict elsewhere, there was fair room to contend that in this state there was a legislative recognition that they had the power by virtue of their appointment. If so, it was not necessary to produce a foreign statute to show that they could do what was here recognized as a power inherent in the office. Still the doubt continued, and in 1870 the Legislature passed an act now contained in Civ. Code 1895, § 5060, authorizing pleas, answers, and defenses to be sworn to before certain officers, including notaries public; and, as the greater includes the less, it was no doubt argued that if they had the right to make such answer, which could be used as evidence on hearings for injunction, parties could likewise use, in the same case, affidavits attested by the same notary. This view, however, was not adopted in Brunswick Hardware Co. v. Bingham, 107 Ga. 273, 33 S. E. 56. Then came the act of 1899, by which the General Assembly expressly declared that any affidavit made out of the state of Georgia before any notary public, justice, judge, chancellor, or commissioner of any court of equity of the state or county where the oath was made, or before any other officer of said state or county who is authorized by the laws thereof to administer oaths, shall have the same force and effect, and be recognized in like manner, as if it had been made before any officer of this state authorized to administer the same. The proviso thereto did not make the act self-destructive and repeal it at the moment of its approval. The proviso was to the effect that the act should not apply to affidavits required to be made within the state of Georgia, nor should it impair or render invalid any of the existing provisions of law for making affidavits out of this state. For example, it did not repeal Civ. Code 1895, § 5060, relating to pleadings, nor Civ. Code 1895, § 3621; nor did it destroy whatever power to administer oaths was possessed by commissioners of deeds under Pol. Code 1895, § 120. Sugar v. Sackett, 18 Ga. 462 (3).

From the legislation generally, from their supposed customary powers, and from the language of the act of 1899, it is clear that foreign notaries are authorized to attest affidavits, and that the same may be received in legal proceedings here with the same effect and under the same circumstances as if made in Georgia. The act of 1899 is, however, silent on the subject of what shall be sufficient evidence of their official character and power to administer oaths. It does not say whether a statement to that effect in the jurat will be sufficient, nor whether there must be attached a certificate from the Secretary of State, or of the court making the appointment, or a copy of the statute conferring the power. It is evident that, so far as notaries are concerned, the silence in the statute must mean that the usual authentication by his seal of office is sufficient. Otherwise, who can say what else is necessary, or how it is to appear that he is what he claims to be, or has the authority to do what he actually does? The decision in Shockley v. Turnell, 114 Ga. 373, 40 S. E. 279, related to an affidavit before a clerk of a county court, with nothing to show that he was a clerk. He was not one of the officers named in the act of 1899, and there was no evidence that he had authority under the laws of Texas to administer oaths. We conclude that in the present case the affidavit in forma pauperis, attested as it was by a notary under his seal, is properly receivable, and that the case should not be dismissed for failure to pay the cost.

2. The failure to attach a bill of particulars was a defect in the pleadings which did not authorize a dismissal, except in the event that after motion therefor the plaintiff failed by the second term to supply the omission. Besides, defects in the pleadings cannot properly be used as a ground for a motion for a new trial. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5642, 4963.

3. The evidence was conflicting, but there was sufficient to show that the claim was not barred by the statute. There was testimony that, at the time the services were rendered, the defendant was living in this state, and shortly afterwards removed to Alabama, where she has since lived. The statute did not run in her favor if such was the case. Civ. Code 1895, § 3783. The letter received by the plaintiff from the defendant, together with his positive testimony that the contract had been made with the wife and not the husband, was sufficient to establish that the debt was the wife's and not the husband's. There was no error assigned on the charge of the court, and the evidence was sufficient to warrant the verdict.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

GAINES v. LUNSFORD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)

WAYS OF NECESSITY—WHEN GRANTED.

1. The Constitution provides for ways of necessity, but not for those of convenience; nor does it guaranty the landowner the right to connect directly with a public road, if there are other ways affording reasonably sufficient means of access therefrom to his farm or residence.

2. Where a tract is touched by steep and hilly "settlement roads," there is no such necessity as will warrant the taking of private property, in order to construct thereon a way leading to a public road which is in better condition, and on which heavier loads may be drawn.

3. Nor is the rule changed by the fact that a cut or obstruction exists on plaintiff's land, between his residence and the settlement roads.

4. Nor can a way of necessity across the lands of another be laid out because the settlement road is liable to be closed. As long as it is open to plaintiff's use, no legal necessity for opening another way exists.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by A. S. Lunsford against F. L. M. Gaines. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Sam L. Olive, for plaintiff in error. Jos. N. Warley, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. There are no plats in the record to show the situation of plaintiff's and defendant's land, nor the location of the public road, nor where the "settlement roads" referred to in the evidence touch the farm, nor, indeed, where the proposed way begins or ends. Even the plat referred to as attached to the petition is not brought up, and it is therefore difficult to determine where the private road is to start, and with what it is to connect. Aided by the argument, however, we infer that plaintiff's residence is located near the center of his farm. It appears that for many years there has been a private way leading therefrom across the lands of Gaines, the defendant, to what we infer was a public highway. This path or way was not 15 feet wide, its route had been changed from time to time, and it had not been worked by plaintiff and his predecessor in title, so that under Pol. Code, §§ 662, 678, no prescriptive right had ripened. Being unable to continue its use, he applied for the establishment of a way of necessity over practically the same route. The record shows that plaintiff's farm was touched by two settlement roads, and that he could have reached either over his own land, and without crossing the plantation of Gaines. It is claimed, however, that a farm road from plaintiff's dwelling would have had to cross a deep cut or obstruction in his field, that it would have been expensive to construct the route over the same, and that a way thus laid out would lead to settlement roads which were steep, hilly, and in such bad condition that it was impossible to haul thereon more than half a load.

At common law, where the grantor conveyed land otherwise inaccessible, there was of necessity an implication that he had unintentionally omitted to convey a means of access thereto. This necessary implication entitled the landlocked grantee to a way out to whatever public or private roads furnished access to the original tract, in the laying out of which, due regard, of course, had to be had to the convenience of the grantor. Such ways by implication are still recognized in this state. Civ. Code, § 3065. But in addition to these common-law ways of necessity, the Constitution provides for acquiring similar easements over the land of those with whom the applicant had no privity of estate, declaring (Civ. Code, § 5729) that, "in cases of necessity, private ways may be granted upon just compensation being first paid by the applicant." It does not provide whether he shall have a right to reach a highway, or some private way ultimately leading to a highway, though there are in the books some suggestions that the way of necessity contemplated under similar statutes elsewhere is one which connects the private land with a public road. See notes in Pettingill v. Porter, 85 Am. Dec. 677. But the use of the common-law phrase "way of necessity," and the many authorities holding that wherever necessity ceases the right to such way ceases (Civ. Code, § 3066), lead to the conclusion that, if the owner of the landlocked farm can reach a highway by means of another private or quasi public road, he is not under that necessity which alone entitles him to condemn the land of his neighbor. Such was the ruling in Chattanooga R. Co. v. Philpot, 112 Ga. 154, 37 S. E. 181, where Justice Cobb said: "If there is a way by which the applicant can lawfully reach his farm or place of residence, a case of necessity does not exist." There the owner of land could reach a private way which extended to the public thoroughfare. In Turnbull v. Rivers, 3 McCord, 131, 15 Am. Dec. 622, it was held that, if the land can be reached by a distant or difficult road, the grantee is not entitled to a way across the lands of the grantor.

2-4. The settlement roads are in bad condition, but not impassable. Access to a public and better road would be more advantageous. But the way of necessity contemplated by the Constitution is not a way of convenience, nor is it, indeed, intended to give the applicant the shortest route to market. If there is a defective road touching his land, or it is otherwise accessible without crossing the property of the abutting owner, the Constitution does not warrant taking the latter's property in order to reach a better highway. That would serve the applicant's case, rather than his necessity. The defects in these highways or private ways must be corrected at the expense of the public, the applicant or others having occasion to travel thereon. The delays, expenses, and burdens cannot be avoided by taking the land of another, even on just compensation. Nor does the fact that there was a cut or obstruction in plaintiff's farm between his residence and the settlement road change the legal complexion of this case. The burden of crossing these natural barriers falls upon him, and not upon another. "A way of necessity never exists where a man can get to his own property through his own land, however inconvenient the way to his own land may be." Dee v. King, 73 Vt. 378, 50 Atl. 1109. Particularly is this true where the record does not show the character of the obstruction, its nearness to the highway, the additional cost of construction, and its relation to the value of the tract. There might be cases where one side of a plantation is bounded by a highway with precipice, morass, or other natural obstruction of a character that makes it not absolutely impossible to reach the outlet to market, yet the expense would be so out of proportion to the value of the estate as to warrant laying out a way of necessity in an opposite direction, to a road beyond the land of an intervening owner. Nothing of that sort appears here.

Under the Philpot Case, it was error to allow testimony that the existing settlement road might be closed against the use of plaintiff. He can travel thereon at the present time. That right makes it unnecessary to use the land of the defendant. When the way is closed it will be time enough to determine whether proceedings should be taken to reopen that, or to grant another over the land of defendant.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

ROBINSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

WITNESS—IMPEACHMENT—CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where a witness is sought to be impeached for contradictory statements in an affidavit alleged to have been signed by him, and the witness is unable to read the affidavit, it is not an abuse of discretion for the court to refuse to allow counsel to read the affidavit in the presence and hearing of the jury, in order to ascertain from the witness whether he signed it; the judge stating to counsel that he may read the affidavit to the witness after the jury has been sent out.

2. Neither the evidence nor the prisoner's statement involved the question of voluntary manslaughter, and there was no error in so instructing the jury. Even if the question had been involved, the accused would not be heard to complain of this instruction to the jury, for the reason that his counsel had expressly requested the court so charge. Cochran v. State, 39 S. E. 337, 113 Ga. 736; Quattlebaum v. State, 46 S. E. 677, 119 Ga. 433; Harris v. State, 47 S. E. 520, 120 Ga. —.

3. A juror will not be heard to impeach his verdict. Hence a ground of a motion for a new trial tending to impeach a verdict on the ground that the jurors, before signing their verdict of guilty, had agreed to recommend the accused for pardon, cannot be considered when not verified except by one of the jurors.

4. There was no error in any of the rulings of which complaint was made, the evidence authorised the verdict, and the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in refusing a new trial.

HORTON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 8, 1904.)

APPEAL—WAIVER OF ERROR—MANSLAUGHTER—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A party cannot obtain a reversal for an error which he has invited, as by a request to charge, or by formal admission that a given principal was not involved in the case.

2. But the fact that one of defendant's counsel, in arguing to the jury, insisted "that there was no manslaughter in the case, but that it was a case of self-defense, and another of his counsel contended that the defendant was justifiable because of the invasion of his house," did not deprive the defendant of the right to a charge on the subject of manslaughter, if it was otherwise demanded by the evidence.

3. The evidence which warranted the charge on the subject of self-defense also called for an instruction on the law of manslaughter as contained in Pen. Code 1895, § 65.

Candler, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Paulding County; A. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Will Horton was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

Horton was indicted for the murder of Pearson. It appeared that Pearson had been drinking, and went with his wife to the house of Horton, and sent for a bottle of liquor; that Horton took a drink; and that Pearson took several, and finally lay on the bed. According to the testimony of Mrs. Pearson, wife of the deceased, Horton was seated in a chair, apparently asleep. Pearson, in a sort of stupor, rose from the bed, inquiring who had a gun drawn on him. Horton told him to hush, got up from the chair, and, without further cause, took a pistol from its place on the wall and made an attempt to shoot. Thereupon Mrs. Pearson ran between the two men and attempted to get her husband out of the door. Seeing that she could not get him out of the house, she pushed him on the floor. He fell against the baseboard, with his head slightly raised, and, while he was thus lying, Horton fired; the bullet, according to the testimony of a physician, entering the right side of the neck, and ranging down diagonally in the direction of the left hip. Mrs. Pearson, the sole eyewitness, insisted that Mrs. Horton had rushed out of the house, screaming for help, at the time the trouble began. The accused, in his statement, said that he and Pearson had had some difference about a purchase, in consequence of which Pearson had been quite abusive, and that, when he (the accused) was returning home that evening, he proposed to one Jackson, who was with him, that, in order to avoid a difficulty, they should not pass the house where Pearson was. This statement was supported by the testimony of Jackson and of a brother of Pearson. The defendant, in his statement, further claimed that when Pearson came to Horton's house he was drinking and abusive, and finally picked up a chair, and, in a stooping and threatening position, advanced upon Horton, who claimed that he shot in order to protect and save himself. A physician testified that the range of the bullet in Pearson's body could have been produced by a shot fired at a man approaching in a stooping position. There was evidence from several witnesses to the effect that Horton at once proceeded to the county seat, and was waiting at the jail to surrender himself to the sheriff; that he stated to several persons that he had killed Pearson "because he was coming at him with a chair," in self-defense, and "because Pearson was trying to run over him." Several witnesses testified that, without indicating by whom it was to be done, Pearson, during the day he was killed, had said he expected to be "killed with his shoes on." Mrs. Pearson testified that she would not be certain whether her husband had touched Horton or not; that, if so, it was not done violently. In another place she said: "My husband did not curse Horton. If he touched him at all, it was not very roughly." Several witnesses testified that Mrs. Pearson had said that, when it first began, she thought it would be a knockout, until Joe got a chair and Horton got the pistol." This she denied, but she admitted that she said she thought that at first it was "only a bluff." A verdict of guilty of murder, with recommendation to mercy, having been returned, the defendant made a motion for a new trial on the general grounds, and because the court allowed the wife of the deceased to testify without allowing the wife of the accused the same privilege; because the court failed to charge on the subject of the credibility of witnesses; and because, after the witnesses had been put under the rule, the court allowed Mrs. Pearson to testify a second time, after she had heard the evidence of the witnesses and the defendant's statement. The court charged on the subject of defense of person and habitation, justifiable homicide, and the fears of a reasonable man. The defendant assigns as error that he failed to charge on the subject of manslaughter. As to this, the court certifies in a note that one of the counsel for the defendant "insisted that there was no manslaughter in the case; that it was a case of self-defense"; and that another of his counsel "insisted that he was justifiable because of invasion of defendant's home." The defendant excepted to the refusal to grant a new trial.

A. J. Camp, W. H. Scoggins, F. M. Richards, and W. A. James, for plaintiff in error. W. K. Fielder, Sol. Gen., and John C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

LAMAR, J. No written request therefor having been presented, the failure to charge on the credibility or impeachment of witnesses affords no sufficient reason for the grant of a new trial. We find no error in any of the other assignments, except in that relating to the court's failure to charge on the subject of manslaughter. The judge charged the law of self-defense, and the evidence which made that proper also called for an instruction on the subject of manslaughter. Indeed, as we understand it, the trial judge did not base his omission to charge thereon upon the ground that there was no evidence to warrant the same, but, from the note to the motion for a new trial, it is inferable that his silence in this respect was due to the fact that one of defendant's counsel "insisted that there was no manslaughter in the case; that it was a case of self-defense," and the other "insisted that he was justifiable because of invasion of defendant's home." Plaintiff in error is not responsible for the verbiage of the note, and therefore it is to be construed, not strictly against him, but liberally in his favor. We conclude that the note states what was the contention of counsel in argument, not a formal admission, as in Coney v. State, 90 Ga. 143, 15 S. E. 746, and Griffin v. State, 113 Ga. 281, 38 S. E. 844. It is true that a party cannot obtain a reversal for an error which he has invited, as by a request to charge. Quattlebaum v. State, 119 Ga. 433, 46 S. E. 677. But because counsel insist that their client is not guilty of anything, he does not thereby lose the benefit of every defense warranted by the evidence. Parties are frequently held to their "theory of the case," and cannot rely on one in the lower court and on another here. But testimony not sufficient to sustain a plea of self-defense may yet be sufficient to require a charge on the law applicable to manslaughter. If the jury had believed the entire statement of the accused, and that he acted in self-defense or under the fears of a reasonable man, they could have found him not guilty. They may have believed only a part of his statement, or only a part of that tending to confirm his statement, but that did not necessarily mean that they should convict of murder. It was necessary, in view of the record, that they should be instructed as to what they should do if they found that, while Pearson was making an attack, it was not a felonious assault, and also what they should do if they believed that Pearson was making an attack, but that it was not of a character sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man. As to these points, of course, we do not mean to express any opinion, but, under the evidence, there were three possible verdicts—murder, manslaughter, and justifiable homicide. The court properly charged as to the first and last, but failed to give any instructions as to the second. Considering all of the circumstances of the case, this omission deprived the defendant of an instruction on a vital and material matter, the right to which he did not lose because his counsel argued that he was completely justified in what he did, and it entitles him to a new trial. Hatcher v. State, 116 Ga. 619, 42 S. E. 1018; Kimball v. State, 112 Ga. 541, 37 S. E. 886; Chestnut v. State, 112 Ga. 367, 37 S. E. 384 (4).

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except CANDLER, J., who dissents.

CANDLER, J. (dissenting). In my opinion, the decision of the majority is in conflict with the rulings of this court in the cases of Cochran v. State, 113 Ga. 736, 39 S. E. 337, Quattlebaum v. State, 119 Ga. 433, 46 S. E. 677, Harris v. State, 120 Ga. —, 47 S. E. 520, and Robinson v. State (this day decided) 47 S. E. 968, as well as with the sound and equitable principle that no man should be allowed to take advantage of an error which he has induced or invited. From the certificate of the trial judge, which is conclusive, it appears that the accused "insisted that there was no manslaughter in the case," and he should not now be heard to argue that the refusal to charge the law relative to that offense was error.

FRANKLIN v. CALLWAY, Sheriff.

CHATEL MORTGAGE—CROPS—PRIORITIES.

1. Under the act approved December 21, 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 78; Van Epps' Code Supp. § 6592), a mortgage dated July, 1903, given to secure money furnished to aid in making the crop for that year, is superior to the lien thereon of an older common-law judgment obtained in 1899, even though such mortgage on such crop was not recorded until November, 1903, and after the levy of the fi. fa. on the matured crop. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Washington: W. H. Toombs, Judge.

Action by A. Franklin against one Moss. Judgment for plaintiff. On refusal of J. W. Callway, sheriff, to turn over proceeds of execution sale and a discharge of the rule against the sheriff, Franklin brings error. Affirmed.

From the agreed statement of facts in the record it appears that on March 11, 1899, Franklin obtained a judgment in Oglethorpe county against Moss; that it was recorded on the general execution docket April 4, 1899; that subsequently Moss moved to Wilkes county, and in July, 1903, under the provisions of the act approved December 21, 1899, gave to Armor a mortgage on his crop in Wilkes county. Before the mortgage was filed for record, the common-law execution was levied on corn which was "part of the crop, but matured and gathered." The corn was sold under the justice's court fi. fa., but the sheriff refused to turn over the proceeds to Franklin, because the execution on the mortgage in favor of Armor against Moss had been placed in his hands, claiming the money. It was admitted that the mortgage had been filed for record November 13, 1903, after the levy of the common-law fi. fa. The judge discharged the rule against the sheriff, and directed him to pay the money to Armor. To this ruling Franklin excepted on the ground that the failure to record the mortgage until after the levy made its lien inferior to that of Franklin's execution. The other grounds of the bill of exceptions were abandoned, including that in which the constitutionality of the act of December 21, 1899, was attacked in so far as it made the lien of a younger crop mortgage superior to a common-law execution antedating December 21, 1899.

James M. Pitner, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Slaton, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. The act approved December 21, 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 78), relating to the lien of mortgages on crops, given to secure the payment of money and other articles necessary to aid in making and gathering the same, is limited in its application. It says nothing about the priority of such mortgages over bona fide purchasers, liens to secure ordinary debts, younger judgments, or as to its rank where there are several similar mortgages on the same crop. Nor does it say anything as to the necessity of recording, or as to the effect of a failure to record. The solitary provision is that such mortgages for supplies shall take priority over older judgments. Under the language of this statute, the mortgage given in July, 1903, was superior to a common-law fi. fa. entered on the general execution docket in April, 1899. The plaintiff in fi. fa., however, contends that the Legislature, in using the word "mortgage," meant thereby one that had the usual incidents, including proper execution and due registration. This may be true, even as to crop mortgages, when the rights of subsequent lienholders or bona fide purchasers are involved. But registration looks to the future, and how can the record or failure to record a mortgage executed in July, 1903, affect the holder of a common-law judgment rendered in 1899? He had not loaned his money on the faith of the crop. Recording the mortgage could not warn him, and keeping it off the record did him no harm. The judgment had no lien on the crop before it was planted. The property was brought into existence with the aid of supplies furnished by the mortgagee, which were thus somewhat in the nature of purchase money, creating the very property on which the plaintiff has levied. The Legislature was dealing with a condition in which persons holding an older fi. fa. had a lien on everything owned or subsequently acquired by the defendant. There was no possible way by which the mortgage could be recorded before the lien of the judgment attached. Even if the paper had been signed in the clerk's office, and immediately handed to him for registration, there would have been an instant of time between the execution and filing during which the lien of the judgment would attach. And therefore, whether the paper was recorded on the day it was executed, or months afterwards, would make no difference. Looked at from the standpoint of date and registration, the mortgage would necessarily be younger and therefore inferior to the existing judgment. To meet this situation, the act declared that the crop mortgage should be superior to the older fi. fa., irrespective of its date, and regardless of the time when it was filed in the clerk's office. Besides, assuming that under the definition in Civ. Code, § 2724, the paper did not become a mortgage, as to third persons, until it was recorded, that condition precedent was supplied when it was actually recorded in November, 1903. Under the act, whenever it became a perfect crop mortgage for supplies, it took priority of an older judgment having a lien on the same crop. Compare Rasin v. Swann, 79 Ga. 704, 4 S. E. 882; Thompson-Hiles Co. v. Dodds, 95 Ga. 754, 22 S. E. 673; Achey v. Coleman, 92 Ga. 746, 19 S. E. 710. The decision in Green v. Franklin, 86 Ga. 360, 12 S. E. 585, related to a mortgage executed under the Code of 1882, § 1955. The 30 days therein allowed having been abrogated by the act of 1889 (Civ. Code, § 2778), the limitation suggested in Courson v. Walker, 94 Ga. 175, 21 S. E. 287, does not modify the decision, which is otherwise directly in point.

There was a contention in the pleadings that the act of 1899 was unconstitutional in so far as it made such mortgages superior to judgments at the date of its approval. That point, however, was not argued in the brief, and was, in effect, abandoned.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

MORGAN v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF COHUTTA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—JURY TRIAL—APPEAL
—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—MONEY ORDER—PLEADING.

1. An appeal to a jury in a justice's court from a judgment against a municipal corporation must be entered in the name of the corporation.

2. Where, therefore, in such case, an individual, W., described as mayor pro tem. of the corporation, recited in the appeal bond, which was signed by W., "Mayor pro tem.," that, being dissatisfied with the judgment, he entered "his" appeal, this was not an appeal by the corporation, and should have been dismissed, even though the corporation's name appeared in the caption as party to the original case, and W., as mayor pro tem. of the corporation, for the corporation, acknowledged himself bound as principal.

3. An order for money, drawn by a municipal corporation upon its own treasurer, payable upon demand and without condition, is, in effect, a promissory note, and is an "unconditional contract in writing," within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, § 4134. Where, upon demand, such order is not paid, and suit is brought thereon in a justice's court, the defendant must make its defense at the first term.

4. It is too late, on the trial of an appeal to a jury in a justice's court from a judgment rendered by the magistrate in favor of the plaintiff upon an unconditional contract in writing, for the defendant to file a plea, when it affirmatively appears that no defense was made at or before the first term of the case. Morgan v. Prior, 36 S. E. 75, 110 Ga. 791.

5. For the reasons above stated, and also because the verdict of the jury in the justice's court was wholly without evidence to support it, the judge of the superior court erred in overruling the certiorari.

RALEY v. MAYOR, ETC., OF TOWN OF WARRENTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 9, 1904.)

TOWN OFFICE—ABOLITION—ACTION FOR COMPENSATION—AFFIDAVIT.

1. The original petition set forth no cause of action, and, if a cause of action was set forth in the amendment, it was entirely new and distinct from that attempted to be alleged in the original petition. There was therefore no error in refusing to allow the amendment, or in dismissing the original petition on demurrer.

2. The body of an affidavit began with the words "Personally comes Mrs. Joseph Raley," and was signed "M. N. Raley." Below the signature was the ordinary jurat, and the signature of an officer authorized by law to administer an oath. Held, that the paper was the affidavit of M. N. Raley, who was presumptively the person referred to therein as Mrs. Joseph Raley.

Error from Superior Court, Warren County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Joseph Raley against the mayor and commissioners of the town of Warrenton. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The petition of Joseph Raley against the mayor and commissioners of the town of Warrenton alleged: In pursuance of the authority conferred by the charter of the town, the defendants created the office of deputy or night marshal, in addition to the office of marshal. Petitioner filed his application for one of the marshal's or deputy marshal's positions, and he was by the defendants duly elected deputy or night marshal of the town, and his salary fixed at $300 per annum. Petitioner construed the action of the defendants as electing him for one year, and accepted the position as a contract for a year. Petitioner entered upon the discharge of his duties, and faithfully performed the same. After having served a few months, petitioner was discharged by the defendants without any charges having been preferred against him, and without any opportunity having been given him to defend himself against any charges. This notwithstanding a section of the code of the town provided that no officer should be discharged until he had been given notice of, and an opportunity to defend himself against, any charges which had been preferred. Petitioner has always been ready and willing to perform his part of the contract, and faithfully discharged the duties of the office as long as he was permitted to do so. He alleges "that by the breach of said contract of employment" he has been damaged in the sum of $187.50, the amount of his salary from the time he was discharged to the expiration of one year from his appointment. Attached to the petition are exhibits of the proceedings of the defendants, and the section of the town code referred to in the petition. From these it appears that, during a regular session of the defendants, one of the commissioners proposed that two marshals be elected, instead of one, as theretofore, and that they be paid $600 between them. This motion was carried. The petitioner's application "for one of marshal position for town of Warrenton" was then considered. Petitioner was nominated and elected "for night marshal," and his salary fixed at $300 per annum. All this took place in the early part of 1901. On June 15, 1901, the defendants met in regular session, and one of the commissioners "moved to dispense with the night marshal, thereby curtailing that expense." This motion was carried. Defendants demurred to the petition on the grounds that it set forth no cause of action; that, having created the office of night marshal, the defendants had a right to abolish it in their discretion; that, the office being created by ordinance, it could be abolished at any time, even though the incumbent was elected for 12 months. In response to the demurrer, the petitioner tendered an amendment, by which he offered to strike from the petition all the allegations thereof to the effect that he held "any office" in the municipality, and by alleging in lieu thereof that "he was employed by defendants as night marshal" for 12 months at a compensation of $300 per year. The defendants objected to the amendment on the ground that it set forth a new and distinct cause of action. This objection was sustained, and the amendment disallowed. The court then sustained the demurrer to the original petition and dismissed it. Pending the case in the trial court, the plaintiff died, and his administratrix was made a party in his stead. She has sued out a bill of exceptions complaining of both of the judgments above referred to. Her bill of exceptions was sued out in forma pauperis, and the affidavit made to avoid the payment of costs, after being properly entitled, is as follows:

"Georgia, Warren County. Personally comes Mrs. Joseph Raley, plaintiff in error in a bill of exceptions filed in the above-stated case, and, on oath, says that the estate of Joseph Raley, deceased, is, because of its poverty, unable to pay the costs in said case. Because from her poverty as an individual, she is unable to pay the costs in said case. M. N. Raley.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me this the 10th day of October, 1903. L. D. McGregor, N. P. Warren County, Georgia."

Some question having been raised as to the sufficiency of this affidavit, the point is dealt with in the opinion.

L. D. McGregor and S. H. Sibley, for plaintiff in error. E. P. Davis, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. (after stating the foregoing facts).

1. The charter of the town of Warrenton provides that the municipal authorities may from time to time elect a marshal, who shall remain in office 12 months, unless removed. Acts 1859, p. 212, § 5. One regularly elected to the charter office of marshal of the town of Warrenton cannot, during the term for which he was elected, be legally discharged from that office, unless removed in the manner prescribed by law. See, in this connection, Shaw v. Mayor and Council of Macon, 21 Ga. 280. If, however, the municipal authorities of the town of Warrenton create an office which the charter does not provide for, and elect one to the office thus created, they may, at their pleasure, abolish the office, and thus discharge the municipality from liability to the officer, notwithstanding his term as prescribed by the ordinance creating the office has not expired. City Council of Augusta v. Sweeney, 44 Ga. 463, 9 Am. Rep. 172. The proceedings of the municipal authorities shown in the exhibits to the petition can be construed in two ways; that is, creating two offices of marshal, or recognizing the charter office of marshal, and creating in addition thereto the new office of night marshal. If they be construed as providing for two officers, each having the powers and duties of a marshal, then the action was either void, as beyond the charter authority of the defendants, or neither of the offices thus provided for was the charter office of marshal. The charter provided for only one marshal, and recognized no such office as night marshal; and, therefore, if the action of the defendants be construed as referring to such an office, the position to which Raley was elected was a creation of the defendants. Under either view, Raley was never elected to a charter office, and, when the office to which he was elected was abolished, his right to tender his services and demand compensation was at an end. But it is said that the petition as originally framed was not to recover salary due an officer, but was to recover an amount due under a contract of employment between the town authorities and Raley. The petition is not capable of this construction. The words "employment" and "employ" may have been in the petition, but the words "office" and "officer" are more prominent in the allegations, and the averments as a whole leave no other impression than that it was the purpose of the pleader to treat the position which Raley occupied as that of an officer, rather than that of an employé under contract. Giving the petition the construction indicated, it set forth no cause of action. The purpose of the amendment being to recover under a contract of employment, if it set forth any cause of action at all, it was one entirely new and distinct from that attempted to be alleged in the original petition. It may be that the municipal authorities could make a binding contract for a specified time with an individual for the performance of services of the character indicated in the petition. See Alexander v. City of Americus, 61 Ga. 36. But upon this question we do not now pass.

2. The signature of the affiant is necessary to the validity of an affidavit in this state. Hathaway v. Smith, 117 Ga. 946, 43 S. E. 984, and case cited; Beach v. Averett, 106 Ga. 74, 31 S. E. 806, 71 Am. St. Rep. 239. The pauper affidavit, if an affidavit at all, is therefore the affidavit of M. N. Raley. The question therefore is, does it appear sufficiently from the face of the affidavit that the affiant is the plaintiff in error? The plaintiff in error is Mrs. Joseph Raley, and the jurat of the officer who administered the oath is, in effect, a certificate that Mrs. Joseph Raley appeared before him and subscribed this affidavit; and the affiant, M. N. Raley, is thus identified as the same person who is referred to in the body of the affidavit as Mrs. Joseph Raley. See, in this connection, Loeb v. Smith, 78 Ga. 504, 3 S. E. 458. The affidavit was sufficient to relieve the plaintiff in error from the payment of costs.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

LITTLE v. PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF FLORENCE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 19, 1904.)

CEMETERIES—REMOVAL OF BODIES—INJUNCTION.

1. Though a church which has allowed its members to bury their dead on the church lot for 20 years has dedicated such part of its lot to burial purposes, it will not be enjoined, where the cemetery is much neglected, and the church is about to be removed, and the graves will be left in the very midst of the most active business, from selling the lot and removing the bodies to another place.

Action by Valcour Little against the Presbyterian Church of Florence to enjoin it from removing the body of a deceased member of his family from the cemetery. H. C. McCall and S. T. Burch intervene by petition. Injunction denied.

George Galletly and S. W. G. Shipp, for petitioners. Wilcox & Wilcox and J. P. McNell, contra.

WOODS, J. The Presbyterian Church of Florence wishes to sell its church lot with a view of building its house of worship on a more suitable site. The lot attached to the church was used as a cemetery from about 1861 to 1885. To test the right of the church to sell the property, including the ground used as a cemetery, Valcour Little instituted this friendly proceeding to enjoin the church from removing the remains of his daughter, buried in the cemetery. Subsequently, H. C. McCall and S. T. Burch intervened in earnest hostility to the sale of the land used as a cemetery, or the removal of the bodies of their relatives therefrom.

The referee appointed by this court has taken much testimony relating to the history of the church and cemetery, and their connection with each other, and also as to the reason of the congregation for desiring to sell the property and rebuild elsewhere. We do not think it necessary to go into any extended examination of the title of the church. James McCown had title to the land for the life of Mrs. Ross. From his whole course of conduct in turning over the property to the church, and from the terms of the deed of the remainderman, W. H. Ross, to the church, it was manifest that the property was intended to belong to the Presbyterian Church of Florence. As an incident of this dedication and use by the church, it was, no doubt, contemplated that some of the land should be used as a cemetery, in accordance with the almost universal custom of the time. The privilege of interment was not confined to members of the church or their families, but the church officers exercised some general oversight and control, to the extent of excluding such interments as were objectionable. Subject to ordinary church uses and to this supervision and control, we think the church dedicated the land as a place for the burial of the dead, and in pursuance of this dedication it was so used for over 20 years. It is important to observe that no lots were sold and no consideration paid for the burial privilege allowed.

The testimony makes it perfectly clear that the location has now become entirely unsuitable for a place of worship on account of the proximity of railroad tracks, over which trains frequently pass during the church service. Without the aid expected from the sale of this property, the congregation would not, at least for a considerable time, be able to build another church. In 1886 interments in this cemetery were forbidden by the municipal authorities, and none have taken place since that time. The church proposes, before surrendering possession of the property to the purchaser, to remove all bodies buried there, and reinter them in a decent and orderly manner in the new cemetery now in general use in the community; and also to remove and re-erect the monuments and gravestones—all at its own expense, unless persons interested prefer to take such action on their own behalf. The question is whether, under these circumstances, the church should be enjoined from selling the property and removing the bodies in the manner proposed.

When a cemetery association or church sells particular lots in a cemetery, the purchaser becomes the owner of the soil, and manifestly his right to its possession protects interments made by him from disturbance. In re Brick Presbyterian Church, 3 Edw. Ch. 155. It is also true, as a general proposition, that, where ground has been dedicated to the public for use as a cemetery, the owner cannot afterward resume possession, or remove the bodies interred therein, although he has received no consideration for its use, and the interments were made merely by his consent. Beatty et al. v. Kurtz et al., 2 Pet. 568, 7 L. Ed. 521; Wolford v. Cemetery Association (Minn.) 56 N. W. 58; Hook v. Joyce (Ky.) 22 S. W. 651, 21 L. R. A. 96; Colbert v. Shepherd (Va.) 16 S. E. 246. This doctrine is somewhat anomalous, and is not to be extended beyond the principle upon which it is founded. That principle is that the most refined and sacred sentiments of humanity cluster around the graves of departed loved ones, and that when these sentiments have become associated and connected with a particular spot of ground by the invitation or consent of the owner, he shall not for any secular purpose disturb them. There is no right of property in a dead body, in the ordinary sense in which the word "property" is used, but the law recognizes a family right, which descends from generation to generation, to protect the bodies of deceased relatives from indignity, and the ground in which they are interred from unnecessary invasion or disturbance. 6 Cyc. 720. It does not follow, however, that there are no circumstances which will warrant a church in changing the location of its house of worship and removing the bodies interred on its ground. The very delicate question to be decided in each case is whether, having all the circumstances in view, the proposed removal should be regarded an undue intrusion on the tender sensibilities of those interested. In the consideration it should be remembered that in this comparatively new country the dead have often been buried in very unsuitable places, and that removals have often taken place in the exercise of the most tender sentiment, in view of the future forgetfulness and disregard of the old neighborhood graveyards as the country is changed and developed. If such removals by private individuals tend to promote, rather than destroy, reverence for the dead, the court should certainly hesitate to prevent such action by a church, when it seems to the court that such removal would have a like result. The evidence is clear that this cemetery is much neglected, and its condition is not such as to stimulate any of the finer sentiments of respect due to the dead. If the church is removed, it is extremely probable that it will be still more neglected. Nearly all those who are concerned have indicated their purpose to remove their dead to the new cemetery, and some have already done so. The few remaining graves will be left in the very midst of the most active business life. When those who now care for them as sacred shall pass away, and the relationship of future generations to these dead becomes more remote, there is little room to doubt that they will be almost, if not entirely, forgotten, and the land used for other purposes. So far, therefore, from the proposition of the church to sell the property and remove the dead to the city cemetery indicating any disregard of the sacredness of the association, we think, if carried out, it will promote in the highest degree the very high purpose which those who object wish to conserve. This conviction is much strengthened by the fact that most of those who have their dead interred here prefer to have their bodies removed. It is no light thing to disturb the resting place of the dead, but we think, in these exceptional circumstances, it is proper and right to do so.

It can hardly be contended that the interests of the church, in view of the peculiar facts, should be absolutely sacrificed to the wishes of a few of those whose dead have been buried in its land by its permission. The preservation of the solemnity and dignity so essential to public worship makes the removal absolutely necessary. It has been made to appear that this object probably cannot be accomplished without the sale of this property. The church proposes to remove and reinter the dead with respect and decency in a much more suitable place. While we entertain the highest respect and great sympathy for the sentiments of those who object to the removal of their dead, the court cannot, in the exercise of its discretion, stop the development of the church, when we do not think its contemplated action should be regarded as offending the most delicate sensibilities. This conclusion is well supported by authority. 1 Washburn on Real Property, 35; Windt v. Church, 4 Sandf. Ch. 471; Land Co. v. Jenkins (Ala.) 18 South. 565, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81; Price v. Church, 4 Ohio, 515.

While we have no doubt of the right of the church to sell property dedicated to its use, we do not discuss that question, because it does not appear the petitioners who make it are members of the church and have an interest in its decision.

For the reasons herein stated, the petition for injunction is denied.

LEAGUE v. STRADLEY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 20, 1904.)

NEGLIGENCE—DANGEROUS PREMISES.

1. Where a customer, by invitation of the merchant, places packages behind his counter, and thereafter in getting them falls through a trapdoor, shut at the time when the packages were placed there, but left open by the negligence of the merchant, he is liable for resulting injuries.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; Aldrich, Judge.

Action by Hattie K. League against C. D. Stradley. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Haynsworth, Parker & Patterson and B. A. Morgan, for appellant. McCullough & McSwain, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant to recover $5,000 damages by reason of her fall through a trapdoor in the defendant's store, in Greenville, S. C., on the 20th December, 1902; she having fractured a bone of her left limb, due, she claims, to the carelessness and negligence of the defendant, as proprietor of said store. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $500. After entry of judgment on the verdict, the defendant has appealed therefrom. His grounds of appeal are confined to the refusal of the circuit judge to grant the motion of the defendant for a nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's testimony. Such grounds of appeal are as follows:

"(1) It is submitted that the general invitation which a merchant extends to the public applies only to such portions of his premises as are open for the public, and not to those portions behind the counter or those reserved for the merchant and his employés; and it is further submitted that the evidence showed that the place where the plaintiff was injured was behind the counter, a place reserved for the defendant and his clerks, and, there being no evidence of any invitation from the defendant to enter thereon, his honor erred in not granting a nonsuit on these grounds

(2) It is submitted that there was no evidence tending to show that the plaintiff was invited by the defendant to go behind the counter, where she was injured; that all that the testimony could be considered as showing was that in going there the plaintiff was acting by consent or by license of the defendant, and his honor erred in not so holding and not granting a nonsuit. (3) That his honor erred in not holding that where the customer, by the mere consent or acquiescence of the storekeeper, goes behind the counter in a place not intended for the public, she does so at her own risk, and takes the premises as she finds them. (4) It is submitted that there was no evidence tending to show that the defendant knew, or ought to have known, that the trapdoor was open at the time the plaintiff went behind the counter, nor was there any evidence tending to show that he was negligent in this regard, and the circuit judge erred in not so holding and in not granting a nonsuit. (5) The complaint alleged an express invitation to the plaintiff by the defendant to go behind the counter. The action is one for compensatory damages solely. The evidence is that the plaintiff said: 'Mr. Stradley, I have come to call for my packages,' and that the defendant said, 'All right.' The issue of invitation was a vital one. The evidence totally failed to support this allegation, and his honor erred in refusing the nonsuit."

We deem it proper to reproduce in this opinion the complaint itself, which, omitting the caption and formal part, is as follows: "(1) That the plaintiff Hattie K. League is the wife of the plaintiff G. M. A. League, and they reside in the county and state aforesaid, and are the parents of 10 children, all of whom reside with them. (2) That the defendant resides in the county and state aforesaid, and was at the time hereinafter mentioned, and is now, engaged in the sale of dry goods in the city of Greenville, county and state aforesaid. (3) That on the 10th day of December, 1902, the plaintiff, Hattie K. League, by and with the knowledge and consent of the defendant, deposited certain packages of goods, which she had purchased from the defendant and others, in the storeroom of the defendant, in Greenville city, county and state aforesaid, she at that time being a customer of the said defendant. (4) That thereafter, to wit, on the said 19th day of December, 1902, she went into the place of business of the defendant and called for her packages, and was told by the defendant to go and get the same, which she proceeded to do; that she went behind the counter where she had placed the said packages, and by and with the knowledge and consent of the said defendant, and upon his invitation, in the manner aforesaid, and as she went behind the counter where her packages were deposited, she fell through an open trapdoor, which the defendant had, carelessly and negligently, subsequently opened, or permitted to be opened and let remain open there, without giving this plaintiff any notice or warning with reference thereto, and as to the existence of which she was ignorant, and the said plaintiff fell several feet through the said trapdoor. (5) That after the plaintiff, Hattie K. League, had fallen through said trapdoor, the defendant, hearing her cries and exclamation of pain, came to her assistance, and, instead of having her carried without effort upon her part from where she had fallen, as ordinary care would have dictated, caught hold of her arm, and tried to assist her in that way—the said plaintiff, Hattie K. League, exclaiming that she was unable to walk—and, as the said defendant had hold of her arm and was coaxing her to walk up the said steps, plaintiff felt her left leg give way, and she suffered also great, excruciating physical pain and mental anguish. (6) That as a result of the said injury, which was due to the carelessness and negligence of the defendant in the manner above detailed, the plaintiff, Hattie K. League, was confined to her bed some six weeks, suffered great and excruciating physical pain and mental anguish, and the plaintiff expended large sums of money in trying to cure her, the said Hattie K. League; and the plaintiff Hattie K. League is permanently disabled, so she is informed and believes, in the said left leg, and she is thereby prevented from discharging the ordinary duties of life, being now unable to walk, except by the use of crutches, all to her damage in the sum of $5,000. Wherefore plaintiff prays for judgment against the defendant for the said sum of $5,000 and the costs of this action."

The testimony offered by the plaintiff tending to establish these allegations of the complaint: That the plaintiff was the wife of G. M. A. League, and resided in the county of Greenville and state aforesaid, and was the mother of 10 children. That on the 20th day of December, 1902, the plaintiff, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant, deposited in the defendant's store, and at a point behind his counter selected by him, certain packages of goods that she had purchased from the defendant and others, at the same place, behind the counter first chosen by the defendant. That, in the afternoon of the same day, the plaintiff, entering the store of the defendant from a side entrance on Coffee street, in said city, and between 3:30 and 4 o'clock, found the defendant engaged in selling goods to a customer of his, and stated to him, "Mr. Stradley, I have come to call for my packages," and he said "All right." That the storeroom was at the time rather dark; that, in obedience to what the defendant said to her, she went behind the counter and fell through a trapdoor about eight feet long and two feet wide, by which fell the tibia bone of her left leg was fractured. That she had constant medical attention for the period of six weeks immediately thereafter, to wit, the services of

Dr. T. T. Earle and Dr. Goodett. That she is now, although months have elapsed, unable to walk except with the use of her crutches. That her physicians pronounce that the knee will be perfectly stiff. It should have been stated that she suffered great agony while her wounded leg was being treated. And further, that at the time the defendant sold her goods, early in the morning, the defendant stood upon the trapdoor, and that said trapdoor was not opened until a short while before she went in the store to get all of her packages. That the goods were deposited behind the counter, so that in going to get them it was necessary to pass over the spot where the trap was located. Such, in fact, seems to have been the testimony that tended to sustain the allegations of the complaint.

There was no objection offered by the defendant to the form of the complaint. There was no demurrer. Primarily, therefore, it appears that the complaint stated a cause of action. However, if this was so, it does not preclude the granting of the motion of defendant, if there should have been no testimony offered in support of the material allegations of the complaint. The circuit judge, in the interest of fairness, declined to give a résumé of the testimony which tended to support the allegations of the complaint, but contented himself with saying, "I think there is some testimony in support of the allegations of the complaint, and the motion for a nonsuit must be refused."

In the first ground of appeal, the appellant is correct in stating "that the general invitation which a merchant extends to the public applies only to such portions of his premises as are open for the public, and not to those portions behind the counter, or those reserved for the merchant and his employees." But it must be said that where a proprietor of a store notifies his customer to go behind his counter, or into that place usually set aside for the use of the merchant and his employees, he advances beyond the principle in which we have just announced our concurrence. As proprietor, he has a right to make and unmake rules for the government of his premises. Wherever, therefore, as is contended in this case, and to which testimony has been addressed under the very allegations of the complaint itself, the merchant places the plaintiff's goods, who is his customer, in rear of his counter, while she assists him, with his consent, in placing the goods behind the said counter, he to that extent has relaxed the rule announced by the appellant herein, to which we have given our concurrence, and substituted therefor a new rule. If the merchant, knowing that one of his customers, by his consent and at his invitation, places packages of goods behind his counter, it is an accommodation, it is true, and should merit consideration from the customer for such indulgence; but, in addition to all these matters, the customer comes for her goods and applies to him in the language of the witness: "Mr. Stradley, I have come to call for my packages;" he, being busy at the time in serving a customer, replied, "All right"—it is as far as if he had notified her to go behind his counter; and if the trapdoor was left open by the carelessness or negligence of the defendant, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, and testimony to these facts were adduced, it would present facts which it was necessary for the jury to pass upon. On this we must overrule this ground of exception.

As to the second exception, it seems to us that, in relating the circumstances testified to in our consideration of the first ground of appeal, this ground of exception cannot be sustained. What effect should be given to the language used by the plaintiff and that used by the defendant should be left for the jury, because they have the right to draw inferences naturally clustering about the language actually used.

Now, as to the third exception, we would sustain the position that the mere consent of the proprietor that the customer should, of his or her own motion, go in rear of the counter, entailed no serious responsibility upon the defendant. Yet, where a proprietor has placed the property already paid for by his customer in rear of the counter, and when applied to for said goods, at his consent or implied solicitation, she goes to that very spot selected by him in rear of his counter, at a trapdoor which has been left open without the knowledge of his customer, the circumstances are changed, and a different rule of conduct would be rendered necessary by the defendant.

In regard to the fourth exception, it seems to us that our case of Freer v. Cameron, 4 Rich. Law, 228, 55 Am. Dec. 663, is conclusive upon this point; for, in the case just cited, Judge Withers, announcing the judgment of the court, says: "The first ground of appeal questions the liability of defendant, assuming that the evidence makes a case sustainable against some one. In all that occurred between Mrs. Freer and her companion, the only witness in this case, and the defendant's agent or clerk, the latter was acting strictly in the lines of his employment, in capacity of representative of his principals. If, therefore, he was guilty of any negligence at all which was actionable, it must be, upon all reason and authority, such as involves the responsibility of the defendants." We might go further in our quotation from the case just cited, but it will only incur the record, although it does seem that there are many points of similarity between the case now at bar and the case just cited. This exception must be overruled.

Lastly, in relation to the fifth exception, we must agree with the respondent that there was no expressed invitation by the defendant to the plaintiff to go behind his counter, in the complaint, nor does the complaint so allege. An invitation may be implied as well as expressed, and it is the duty of the jury,

In coming to a conclusion on the testimony offered, to say whether the language used by the defendant in its connection involved an invitation to the plaintiff. It is no part of the duty of the circuit judge to determine the effect of oral testimony. The wisdom of the law has confined that duty to the jury. This exception is overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

ROBERT BUIST CO. v. LANCASTER MERCANTILE CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 20, 1904.)

NEW TRIAL—DISREGARD OF INSTRUCTIONS—CONTRACT OF SALE.

1. Where the instructions are disregarded by the jury, a new trial should be granted.

2. Where a written agreement for the sale of goods is silent as to the freight, the agreement of the parties as to the payment of the freight may be shown by parol.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Dantzler, Judge.

Action by the Robert Buist Company against the Lancaster Mercantile Company. From judgment for plaintiff, it appeals. Reversed.

R. E. & R. B. Allison, for appellant. Green & Hines, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. The Robert Buist Company, of Philadelphia, Pa., entered into a contract with the Lancaster Mercantile Company, a corporation located at Lancaster, S. C., of which the following is a copy:

"The consolidated order, marked 'A,' above, reads as follows:

"John Mahan. Order No. 192. Lancaster, Oct. 24, 1900. Robert Buist Co., Philadelphia, Pa. Order X sheet.

One bu. red val. beans, at $40.

"Signature, Lancaster Mercantile Co., Lancaster, S. C.

"Ship Feb. 1st."

"This order is absolute and not subject to countermand, but subject to any decline occurring on eastern grown stock to date of shipment.' I had to cut to get order. Confirm same if accepted."

The letter marked "B" reads as follows, to wit:

"Philadelphia, Pa., Nov. 2d, 1900. Lancaster Mercantile Co., Lancaster, S. C.—Gentlemen: We are in receipt of your valued order through our Mr. Mahan, which we accept, and will forward at the proper time as agreed. Yours very truly, Robert Buist Co."

Differences sprang up between the parties to the contract, which mainly related to the question as to the payment of freight from Philadelphia, Pa., to Lancaster, S. C., on the merchandise which was embraced in the contract. It so happened that 50 barrels of the seed Irish potatoes, under the contract, were delivered, and when the check for $97.40, which was the actual cost of the potatoes themselves, was sent to the Robert Buist Company, they returned same because the Robert Buist Company demanded that the Lancaster Mercantile Company should pay $36, which was the freight on the said 50 barrels of potatoes. It may be said that this was the beginning of their differences. And when the 75 barrels of seed Irish potatoes reached Lancaster, S. C., the Lancaster Mercantile Company refused to accept the same unless it was understood that they should pay no freight charges thereon. Whereupon the Robert Buist Company telegraphed them that they would order the 75 barrels reshipped to Philadelphia, but would hold the Lancaster Mercantile Company responsible for freight both ways, and expenses connected. Accordingly the 75 barrels were reshipped. Although the Robert Buist Company never accepted the check for $97.40, yet both parties admit that sum to be due. The Robert Buist Company, as plaintiff, brought this action in the court of common pleas for Lancaster against the Lancaster Mercantile Company, as defendant, to recover the sum of $241.40, which sum embraced $97.40, admitted by both sides, and also $36 freight on the first 50 barrels, and also $108 freight both ways on the 75 barrels. Defendant denied all liability, except for the $97.40.

At the trial, defendant sought to show that, while no reference is made in the contract as to freight, it was agreed at the time of the contract that the merchandise should be delivered at Lancaster, S. C., without any charge for freight against the defendant. Steady and serious contention was carried on in the effort to introduce testimony on this issue, but the circuit judge held that it was not competent for the defendant to enlarge the written contract, and further held that where a contract is silent in regard to the freight charges on merchandise shipped from one point to another, to wit, from the place of the seller to the place of the buyer, the law holds that the delivery is at the place of the seller, and consequently all costs for freight between the two points is to be paid by the buyer. This he held when testimony was offered, and he so charged the jury; it being his duty, as he stated to the jury, to construe the contract for them, it being in writing. But the jury disregarded this instruction of the presiding judge, and found a verdict for $97.40 for the plaintiff.

Among other grounds for a new trial, the plaintiff urged a disregard by the jury of the presiding judge's charge upon the law. In the case of Dent v. Bryce, 16 S. C. 14, the court, through the late Chief Justice Simpson as its organ, declared: "It needs no authority, then, to say that the jury is bound to take the law from the court. This principle applies in every class of cases, except one not necessary now to be considered. And when the law is announced by the court, it is the law of the case until overruled by a higher authority. It follows, then, that a verdict in direct conflict with the law of the court is a verdict against the law, and will in all cases be vacated in the first instance, either sua sponte by the judge, or on motion of the aggrieved party. * * * If the jury could question the charge of the judge, the result would be that in every case the whole case, both law and facts, would go to the jury, under the hope that, whatever might be the charge of the judge at the time, he could be satisfied afterwards that he was in error. This could not be tolerated. It would degrade the judiciary and unhinge the whole system. The argument of the respondent, by which he attempts to draw a distinction between a verdict contrary to the charge of the judge and one contrary to law, though ingenious, fails to meet the case. In fact, that doctrine would open the door to the very evil which a separation of the powers and duties of the court and jury was intended to prevent. So far as the jury is concerned, there is no such thing as the charge of the judge being contrary to law, because, whatever may be his charge, it is the law to them." There are other cases in our Reports which are fully in accord with what we have quoted. The circuit judge having charged the law, and it having been disregarded by the jury, there must of necessity be a new trial.

We think, however, that it was competent for the defendant, as purchaser, to rebut the presumption that he was to pay the freight, and to show by parol testimony that the plaintiff agreed to do so. The written agreement was silent on this subject, and such testimony would not alter or vary the contract as reduced to writing. 21 A. & E. Ency. Law, 1094. Of course, the plaintiff should be allowed to introduce testimony on this subject in reply.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged by this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the action remanded to that court for a new trial de novo.

STATE ex rel. GUENTHER et al. v.
CHARLESTON LIGHT & WATER CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 20, 1904.)

NAVIGABLE STREAM—OBSTRUCTIONS—MANDAMUS—NUISANCE.

1. Mandamus will not be granted to compel the removal of a dam obstructing a navigable stream, where petitioners show no special injury resulting to them other than that common to the general public.

2. A temporary obstruction of a navigable stream while remodeling a lock in a dam, the first one having proved defective, is not such an obstruction as will constitute a nuisance.

Petition, in the original jurisdiction of this court, by Pauline M. Guenther, C. O. Witte, A. M. Lee, Henry A. M. Smith, Henry E. Young, and Paul Grant, for writ of mandamus against the Charleston Light & Water Company. Writ denied.

Buist & Buist, Mitchell & Smith, and Smythe, Lee & Frost, for petitioners. W. O. Miller and P. H. Gadsden, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. The relators above named have applied to this court, in its original jurisdiction, for a writ of mandamus to compel the respondent to open up to navigation Goose creek, a navigable stream in the county of Berkeley, in the state aforesaid, across which, from side to side of said Goose creek, the respondent has placed a dam extending from bank to bank of said stream, thereby closing the same to all vessels, boats, etc.—which occurred early in December, 1903—demands having been made by the relators, who are the riparian owners of lands on each side of said Goose creek from the dam to some distance above said dam, upon the respondent to remove so much of said dam as is essential to the navigation of the waters of said Goose creek, which the respondent has declined to do. In order to correctly apprehend the issues tendered by the petition, as based upon the facts alleged therein, it will be necessary to set forth the petition in terms (omitting the caption). The following is a copy thereof:

"To the Supreme Court of the State of South Carolina: The petition of Pauline M. Guenther, C. O. Witte, A. M. Lee, Henry A. M. Smith, Henry E. Young, and Paul Grant, relators in the above-entitled proceedings, respectfully petitioning this honorable court, shows:

"First. That under and by virtue of article 5, § 4, of the Constitution of the state of South Carolina, and section 11 of the Code of Procedure of said state, the Supreme Court of South Carolina has power to issue writs or orders of mandamus, and other remedial and original writs.

"Second. That under and by virtue of an act of the General Assembly of South Carolina, entitled 'An act to incorporate the Charleston Light and Water Company,' approved the 19th day of February, 1898 [22 St. at Large, p. 984], the Charleston Light and Water Company became incorporated, and is a corporation carrying on business in the state, under the laws of South Carolina, and exercising its franchises thereunder, which act is in terms set out in Exhibit A, and made a part of this petition.

"Third. That on the 23d day of June, 1902 the Honorable Wm. Cary Sanger, Assistant Secretary of War, issued the following approval for respondent's dam, to wit: 'Whereas, by section 9 of an act of Congress, approved March 3, 1899 [30 Stat. 1151, c. 425 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3540)], entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," it is provided that bridges, dams, dikes, or causeways may be built under authority of the Legislature of a state across rivers and other waterways the navigable portion of which lies wholly within the limits of a single state, provided the location and plans thereof are submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War before construction is commenced: And whereas, the Charleston Light and Water Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the state of South Carolina, having authority of the Legislature of the state of South Carolina to construct a dam across Goose creek, in said state, has submitted a map of the location and plans of the same, which have been approved by the Chief of Engineers: Now, therefore, this is to certify that the map of location and plans of said dam, which are hereto attached, are hereby approved by the Secretary of War, subject to the following conditions: (1) That the engineer officer of the United States army, in charge of the district within which the dam is to be built, may supervise its construction, in order that said plans shall be complied with. (2) That the prolongation of the canal at both ends shall be dredged to full depth and width till it meets the channel of the creek. Witness my hand this 23d day of June, 1902. Wm. Cary Sanger, Assistant Secretary of War.' That the plans and specifications referred to above by the said Assistant Secretary of War provided for a canal and lock through said proposed dam, and connecting the said stream on either side of said dam, having the following dimensions, to wit, a length of 55 feet, a width of 18 feet, and a depth at low water of 7 feet.

"Fourth. That on or about the — day of January, 1904, the respondent presented to the engineer office of the United States, at Charleston, S. C., new plans and specifications providing for a canal and lock through said proposed dam, and connecting the said stream on either side of said dam, having the following dimensions, to wit, a length of 55 feet, a width of 18 feet, and a depth at low water of 7 feet, which plans and specifications do not materially differ from the former specifications above referred to, except as to the location and construction of the lock and spillway, and which have not yet been approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War.

"Fifth. That under a public call made by the captain of United States engineers stationed at Charleston, S. C., for objections, if any, to the aforesaid new proposed plans and specifications, the following propositions were submitted against them on January 11, 1904, to wit: '(1) That the dimensions of the locks embodied in the specifications submitted to the United States government are too small. (2) That the dam in its present state does not accord with the specifications assented to by the United States government, and blocks all traffic on the river, whereby the corporation has become criminally liable, and may be compelled to remove the said dam.'

"Sixth. That in the county of Berkeley, state of South Carolina, there flows a large navigable stream, known as Goose creek, in which the tide ebbs and flows, and which from time immemorial has been capable of navigation in fact, and has been freely and commonly used for navigation by the public in general, and especially by or in behalf of the riparian proprietors and owners of the lands, plantations, and fields lying upon the borders of said stream. That your relators herein are the owners of large tracts of lands bordering on said stream at points on which the said stream is navigable in fact, and lying above the dam, hereinbefore referred to, which is being erected by the said the Charleston Light & Water Company, through its agents or contractors, and which said stream as aforesaid was and is navigable in fact from the lands of your relators as aforesaid to its mouth, emptying into Cooper river, S. C., a large navigable stream, which in turn empties into Charleston harbor, and thence connects with the Atlantic Ocean; but that said navigation has been obstructed in the past few weeks by the said dam of the said the Charleston Light & Water Company, as will more fully hereafter appear.

"Seventh. That the said the Charleston Light & Water Company, through its agents and contractors, are erecting a dam across the said stream known as Goose creek, in the county of Berkeley, state of South Carolina, at a point next below the lands of all these relators on said stream, and at a point where said stream was navigable in fact; which said dam has and does cut off and prevent the continuous navigation of said stream from above to below said dam, and the opposite, to the detriment of the rights of the public to navigate the said stream, and especially of these relators, upper proprietors or owners on said stream, with regard to the right of navigation for themselves, agents, or servants to and from their said lands bordering on said stream.

"Eighth. That on the 23d day of December, 1903, the agent of these relators, while proceeding in a steamboat from the city of Charleston, S. C., to the said dam aforesaid, for the purpose of navigating the said stream to the said lands of the relators lying upon the same, arrived at the point on said stream where the said dam has been erected below the said lands of your relators, and found the same utterly impassable to navigation by reason of being obstructed by the said dam of the said the Charleston Light & Water Company. That then and there he requested and demanding a passageway through said dam, but the same was not given, as the said stream was closed at said point by said dam, so that the navigation of the same was obstructed and impassable, and was told by the party in charge of the construction of said dam that such had been the state of affairs for six weeks, and would continue for six weeks more.

"Ninth. That the following correspondence passed between the attorneys of the relators and respondent through letters which were delivered and received, to wit:

"'Charleston, S. C., December 31st, 1903. Mr. Morris Israel, Vice-President of The Charleston Light and Water Co., Charleston, S. C.—Gentlemen: In behalf of Pauline M. Guenther and other riparian proprietors owning lands located above your proposed dam on Goose Creek, we beg leave to respectfully demand that the said dam which now obstructs navigation be forthwith so conducted as to cease said obstruction. Your prompt reply is requested. Yours respectfully, Buist & Buist, Attorneys. Smythe, Lee & Frost, Attorneys. Mitchell & Smith, Attorneys.'

"'Charleston, S. C., Jan. 6, '04. Messrs. Buist & Buist, Smythe, Lee & Frost, and Mitchell & Smith, City—Gentlemen: Yours of the 31st received. In reply I beg to say that this company has made application to the United States engineer at Charleston for approval of plans and location of lock to be constructed on Goose Creek, which lock when constructed it is contemplated will remove all obstacles to navigation. I understand that the engineer will shortly give notice of public hearing on this matter, at which time we will be glad if you will present any objections which you may have to the proposed lock. Yours truly, M. Israel, V. P. Chas. Light and Water Co.'

"Tenth. That the navigation of the said stream as aforesaid still remains obstructed, and relators allege that it will take several months to construct the proposed lock above referred to.

"Eleventh. That, by the erection of said dam obstructing the navigation of the said stream as aforesaid, the said the Charleston Light & Water Company, if possessed of the right to construct a dam across said navigable stream (which relators do not admit), possessed it by reason of its charter and rights thereunder, and that it had violated its alleged charter powers as above set forth, in that it has failed to conduct the said dam across said navigable stream as aforesaid in such manner as shall not obstruct the navigation of the stream.

"Twelfth. That your relators have no other adequate remedy than the writ of mandamus, which is herein petitioned from your honorable court.

"Wherefore these relators pray that a writ of mandamus be issued by this honorable court commanding the Charleston Light & Water Company to forthwith conduct the said dam across the said navigable stream known as Goose creek so that the said dam shall not obstruct the navigation of said stream."

And Exhibit A, exhibited with said petition:

"An act to incorporate The Charleston Light and Water Company.

"Whereas, the General Assembly of this state has at the present session, by a two-thirds vote of each house on a concurrent resolution, allowed a bill for a special charter of 'The Charleston Light and Water Company' to be introduced:

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina, that Samuel Lapham, Charles R. Valk, W. H. Welch, R. G. Rhett, H. F. Bremer, George I. Cunningham, Morris Israel, John C. Simonds, and their associates and successors, shall be, and they are hereby, incorporated and declared a body politic and corporate under the name of 'The Charleston Light and Water Company,' for the purpose of introducing a water and light supply into the city of Charleston for its public purposes, which corporation shall have power to make, use, have and keep a common seal, and the same at will to alter; to make all necessary by-laws, not repugnant to the laws of the land, and to have succession of officers and members conformably to such by-laws; and to sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, in any court of law or equity in this state; and to have, use and enjoy all other rights and be subject to all other liabilities which are incident to other bodies corporate.

"Sec. 2. The said corporation may purchase and hold all such real and personal estate as may from time to time be required for its purposes, and may dispose of the same in such manner and on such terms as it may deem proper; it shall have full power to lease, sell, donate or convey the same to individuals or other corporations; or in the conduct and management of its business it shall have full power to invest the whole or any part or parts of its funds or property in the capital stock or bonds of and become a stockholder by subscription, either in cash or in property, real and personal, or by purchase of stock in any other corporation formed or to be formed, and to retain or dispose of such stock in whole or in part at pleasure, exercising all the rights and powers of stockholders in such corporations; to lease, construct and operate, or to assist other persons or corporations in such manner as the said corporation may deem desirable in leasing, constructing, owning and operating water works, gas, oil, electric or other lighting, heating and power plants, and at its pleasure to incorporate the same; to issue bonds from time to time, in such amounts as it may deem proper for the payment of money borrowed or for its indebtedness, and to secure the same by mortgage or mortgages on the whole or any part of its property.

"Sec. 3. The said company shall have full power and authority to take, hold and convey water from any point from any river, creek, springs or other sources within sixty-five miles of the city of Charleston, into and through the said city, with the consent of the city council of Charleston first had and obtained, and shall have full power and authority to make canals, build dams, erect locks, lay conduits or tunnels for the conveyance of said water, through, under or along any highway or railroad track or tracks in the country adjacent; or any street or streets, lane or lanes, alley or alleys of the city of Charleston, for the purpose of conveying and distributing said water; and the canals, locks, dams, conduits or tunnels from time to time to renew or repair, and for such purpose to dig, break up and open at their own expense all and any part of highways, streets, lanes and alleys and of the middle or side pavements thereof, leaving at all times a sufficient passage for carriages, horses and foot passengers, and restoring forthwith to their former condition all such highways, streets, lanes and alleys, and the pavements thereof, as may at any time be taken up, opened or dug; and as aforesaid, the said corporation may, by purchase or otherwise, take and hold any land necessary for the establishment of their works, and also all private rights of way, water courses or other easements which may be on or along the route through which such canals, locks, dams, conduits or tunnels shall pass, and may conduct such canals, locks, dams, conduits or tunnels over or through any public road, river, creek, water course or waters that may be on the route, but in such manner as shall not obstruct the passage of the public road or navigation of the stream.

"Sec. 4. The said corporation shall also have full power to do all acts necessary to open, construct and operate such system or systems of water works, electric, gas, oil or other lighting, heating or power plants as it may deem advisable, and to extend and enlarge the same from time to time as it may deem necessary; and so far as its water works are concerned, it shall be at liberty to draw water from such source or sources of water as may be most convenient; and to establish reservoirs, fountains and hydrants in such parts of the streets, lanes and alleys of the city of Charleston, with the consent of the city council of Charleston, first had and obtained, to be connected with the works, as they may think proper; and it shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, for any person in any way to defile or pollute the waters in any such source, water supply, canal, conduit or tunnel used, or to be used, by said company, or to obstruct or in any way damage the same, or divert the water therefrom, without permission from the said corporation, or to carry off without permission, break or injure any pipe, cock, valve, machinery or other property that may be used in connection with said water supply, or take water from any hydrant, cock or other fixtures connected with said water works, without permission from the said corporation, or for any person having charge or control of any hydrant or water pipe connected with said water works to allow or permit any other person to take, draw or use water from the same without permission from the said corporation, or for any person, by false key or otherwise, after the water shall have been shut off from the premises by said corporation, to cause or suffer the said premises to be again supplied with water from said water cocks without permission from the said corporation.

"Sec. 5. The said corporation, being for public purposes, shall have the right to condemn such property, rights of way or water sources as may be necessary to enable said company, or the corporation organized by it, or with its assistance, to successfully construct, erect and operate the said canals, locks, dams, conduits or tunnels, water works, electric, gas, oil or other lighting, heating and power plants, on payment to the owner or owners thereof of just compensation, such property, rights of way or water sources to be condemned and such condemnation to be determined in the manner now provided by law for the condemnation of lands and rights of way by railroad corporations.

"Sec. 6. The capital stock of the corporation shall consist of five hundred shares of one hundred dollars each, and may be organized by the said corporators, or a majority of them, upon the bona fide subscription of not less than fifty per cent. thereof and the payment of not less than twenty per cent. of the amount so subscribed to the corporators above named or their duly appointed treasurer: provided, however, that a majority of the board of directors of the said corporation shall have the power, from time to time, and as occasion may require, to increase the said capital stock to any extent not exceeding three million dollars, whenever they deem proper to do so; and the said corporation shall, by its by-laws, provide for the manner of raising and distributing such additional capital stock. Each stockholder shall be individually liable to the creditors thereof only to the extent of the amount remaining due to the corporation upon the stock owned by them.

"Sec. 7. Each stockholder shall have one vote for each share of the capital stock of the said corporation he may own or represent at all the elections and all meetings of the company; and the said corporation shall have the authority in its by-laws to make such regulations as may be deemed proper for representation by proxy of such stockholders as may be absent at such elections and meetings.

"Sec. 8. The capital stock of the said corporation shall be deemed personal property, and the said corporation shall have authority in its by-laws to make all such regulations as may be deemed necessary and proper for the issuing and transfer of such stock, for collecting and enforcing by sale or otherwise, all subscriptions made thereto.

"Sec. 9. That if any person or persons shall wantonly, negligently or maliciously divert the water, or any part thereof, of any ponds, streams or water sources which shall be taken by said company in pursuance of the provisions of this act, or shall corrupt the same, or render it impure or offensive by mingling other substances with it, or by washing or swimming in it, or by erecting any privy or nuisance near it, or by any other means whatever, or shall injure or destroy any dam, lock, aqueduct, pipe, wire, conduit, tunnel, hydrant, machinery or any other property held, owned or used by the said company, its lessees or assigns, by the authority and for the purposes of this act, any such person or persons shall forfeit and pay the said company, its lessees and assigns, treble the amount of damages sustained by such injury, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction; and any such person or persons shall moreover be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and may on indictment and conviction thereof be punished by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court.

"Sec. 10. That any such action or complaint by said company, its lessees or assigns, against any person or persons whomsoever on account of or grounded on a trespass or injury done to the said work, or any dam, lock, aqueduct, pipe, wire, conduit, tunnel, hydrant, machinery or other property of said company, or appertaining to the same, shall in every instance be held and deemed as transitory in its nature, and may be brought, sustained and tried in any court of this state having jurisdiction in such like case; and nothing in this act providing for special remedies of the said company, its lessees or assigns, shall be construed to deprive them of the right or impair the same of bringing any suit, in law or equity, to which they would otherwise be entitled.

"Approved the 19th day of February, A. D. 1898." (22 St. at Large, pp. 934-939.)

On the 14th day of January an order was passed by this court requiring the respondent on the 22d day of January, 1904, to make a return to said petition. Accordingly, on the said 22d day of January, 1904, the respondent made its full return; and on the date fixed for hearing, after said return had been submitted to the court, the respondent interposed its demurrer to the complaint, which was as follows (omitting the caption):

"The defendant, the Charleston Light & Water Company, demurs to the petition herein, upon the ground that said petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that it appears upon the face thereof that the relators are not entitled to the relief prayed for, in that: First. It appears from the allegations of the said petition that the petitioners are not entitled to a writ of mandamus, but that their only remedy is by indictment. Second. In that said petition does not allege any peculiar or special damage suffered by the petitioners."

The consideration of the demurrer will render unnecessary the reproduction in this opinion of the respondent's return to the rule. The province in law of a writ in mandamus is to afford redress where a party has a right to have anything done and has no other specific means of compelling its performance. The writ is also applicable in certain cases where a duty is imposed by statute for the benefit of an individual. Thus it lies to compel a railway company to comply with the provisions of its charter for the benefit of private persons, e. g., to build a bridge, open a road, etc. R. & L. Law Dictionary, p. 787. Or, as is said in State v. Appleby, 25 S. C. 100, "Mandamus only issues when there is a specific legal right or a positive duty to be performed and there is no other appropriate remedy." To the same effect, State v. Hagood, 30 S. C. 519, 9 S. E. 686, 3 L. R. A. 841; State v. Knight, 31 S. C. 81, 9 S. E. 692; State v. Burnside, 33 S. C. 276, 11 S. E. 787; Ex parte Mackey, 15 S. C. 322. In the last case cited this court said: "It is sometimes said that mandamus is not a writ of right, but lies in the discretion of the court, and in granting or refusing it the court should be governed by what seems to be necessary and proper to be done in the premises for the purpose of justice. If this means that it is in the absolute discretion of the judge to grant or refuse it, there could be no appealable error in the order of the judge refusing it, for to say that a matter is within the discretion of the judge is but another mode of saying that it is beyond control. But we understand the discretion here spoken of to be that defined by Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Wilkes: 'Discretion, when applied to a court of justice, means sound discretion guided by law. It must be governed by rule, not by humor; it must not be arbitrary, vague, and fanciful, but legal and regular.'"

The object of the writ in this case, as before stated, is to remove an obstacle in this navigable stream, which by law is open to the use of every person desiring to navigate it. A navigable stream is but a highway open to the use of all. The law is well settled in this state, in regard to highways; that an obstacle therein, unless the same cause special or peculiar injury to a particular individual, is only an invasion of the rights of the public. If the rights of the public are affected, redress of this wrong must be by indictment. If a special or peculiar injury is wrought to any individual, a writ of action or an application for a writ of mandamus will lie at the instance of said special individual. This is no new question in this state. There are many cases in our reports which so assert the law to be; for instance,

Carey v. Brooks, 1 Hill, 365; Steamboat Company v. Railroad Company, 30 S. C. 539, 9 S. E. 650, 4 L. R. A. 209, 14 Am. St. Rep. 923; Steamboat Company v. Railroad Company, 46 S. C. 327, 24 S. E. 337, 33 L. R. A. 541, 57 Am. St. Rep. 688. In Steamboat Company v. Railroad Company, supra, the late Chief Justice McIver, as the organ of this court, said: "There can be no doubt that the Congaree, being a navigable river, is a public highway, the obstruction of which constitutes a public nuisance, the remedy for which is by indictment; and that remedy, it seems, has already been applied in the case of this obstruction. State v. South Carolina Railway Company, 28 S. C. 23 [4 S. E. 796]. It is, however, true that an individual who has sustained any particular or special injury over and above that sustained by the public generally, as the direct result of such obstruction, may also sustain a civil action to recover damages for such injury; * * * while it seems to be very generally, if not universally, conceded, that, in order to sustain such an action as this the plaintiff must allege and prove some special, particular, or peculiar injury beyond that sustained by the public generally. * * * Without going here into a detailed examination of the cases in England and other states, many of which we have examined, it seems to us that the true rule to be deduced from them is that the injury must be particular—as several of the cases express it, 'special or peculiar'—must result directly from the obstruction, and not as a secondary consequence thereof, and must differ in kind, and not merely in degree or extent, from that which the general public sustains. This rule is fully supported by what few authorities we have in this state upon the subject."

Now, coming to the question presented by the case at bar, we must say that there is no special or peculiar injury alleged in the complaint as existing to any one or all of the relators as to put himself or herself within the rule we have already announced. Any remedy, therefore, is not theirs specially, but that of the general public.

There is another view presented by the respondent: That the failure of the respondent to have a lock inserted in the dam, so as to allow full navigation of the waters of Goose creek, is but a temporary condition. The respondent had a lock inserted in their dam, but being defectively constructed, although approved by the United States government, it failed to give the public the advantage which was expected from it, and a new lock is being constructed as expeditiously as the respondents can do so. So this case does not fall within the rules governing permanent obstructions, but, on the contrary, belongs to that class of cases, such as obstructions in the highway, where material is placed in said highway in order to have a building erected alongside of the highway.

The views we have herein presented negative the rights of the relators to the relief prayed for. It is therefore the judgment of this court that the writ of mandamus shall not issue, and that the petition is dismissed.

(68 S. C. 539)

Ex parte GOLDSMITH.

FURMAN UNIVERSITY v. HUFF et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 20, 1904.)

HOMESTEAD — ABANDONMENT — JUDGMENT — ENFORCEMENT.

1. An owner of land executed a bond in 1880 on land on which he and his family were living, and moved off the same in 1887, and sold the land, taking purchase-money mortgages therefor. A portion of the land was thereafter reconveyed to him, but neither he nor his family again resided thereon. Held that, on foreclosure of a mortgage executed by him, his widow could not claim homestead in the balance of the proceeds as against a judgment on the bond.

2. Though a judgment cannot be enforced by execution, 20 years not having elapsed since its rendition, it may be proved against the estate of the judgment debtor.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville; Purdy, Judge.

Action by the Furman University against Mary C. Huff and others. William Goldsmith, Jr., intervened, and from decree rendered appealed. Modified.

Haynsworth, Parker & Paterson, for appellant. McCullough & McSwain and Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for respondents.

POPE, C. J. The action has already ripened into a judgment in favor of the Furman University. All the lands covered by the mortgage have been sold, and by agreement of counsel the proceeds of such sale are retained by the court, as if said lands had not been converted into cash. There remaining $1,500 or $1,600 in cash, which will be sufficient to pay the dower adjudged in this action to be paid Mrs. Mary C. Huff as dowress, and still leave a balance, the question of homestead of $1,000, claimed by Mrs. Mary C. Huff, awaits adjudication. This question was submitted to his honor Judge Purdy under the following agreed statements of facts, to wit:

"This is an action to foreclose a mortgage owned by plaintiff, and the interests of the parties hereto are set forth in the complaint and the respective answers. Mary C. Huff, the widow of the deceased mortgagor, by her answer, among other things, claims homestead as such widow, and also one-sixth of the selling price of the land as her dower. Inasmuch as the plaintiff's mortgage debt will be paid anyway, it is not interested in the widow's claim for dower and homestead, subject to the determination of the only remaining question in the case, which grows out of these facts: On the 23d day of January, 1880, F. L. Huff made a bond, as guardian for an infant, to the judge of probate for this county, and J. A. Stone and Jas. W. Huff, the deceased mortgagor, signed the same as sureties. In 1888 proceedings were commenced in the probate court against F. L. Huff for an accounting as guardian, and judgment was rendered against him for the sum of $696.50. Afterwards action was instituted in the court of common pleas by the probate judge on the bond against Jas. W. Huff, who accepted service, and let judgment go by default on the 25th day of September, 1889, for $732.80. This judgment was duly assigned to Julius C. Smith, as administrator of the estate of J. A. Stone, and he now seeks to hold the estate of Jas. Huff liable for one-half the amount of said judgment, with interest on same, amounting to $366.40, with interest from September 25, 1889. The records of both courts have been introduced, and may be referred to for more definite information. Jas. W. Huff, the deceased mortgagor, and surety aforesaid, was married on April 9, 1878, and immediately removed to the place which was sold in this action, and in which the homestead is claimed, and after that time resided continuously on said place until the fall of 1887, when he removed away about five miles, but did not acquire any other land, and did not own any other land at the time of his death. The wife he married in 1878 survives him, and is now claiming homestead. This land was conveyed to Jas. W. Huff by his mother, Louisa A. Huff, on December 29, 1873, as will appear by reference to the complaint. The land was mortgaged by Jas. W. Huff in 1886 as 600 acres, more or less, and in the fall of 1887 he sold it off as 616 acres, in several tracts, as appear by list attached, for which purchase-money mortgages were taken, which had not been paid when suit was instituted herein; and in 1897 sixty-five acres were reconveyed to Jas. W. Huff, and in 1899 216 acres were reconveyed to Huff. The question presented is whether Mary C. Huff, the widow, is entitled to claim, as against petitioner's debt, the fund as exempt under the homestead laws. If not, then the decree should direct payment of petitioner's debt out of any surplus remaining after payment of plaintiff's debt. The foregoing is to be used by the circuit judge in formulating his decree. April 16, 1908. Haynsworth, Parker & Patterson, Attorneys for Petitioner. McCullough & McSwain, Cothran & Cothran, Attorneys for Mary C. Huff, Widow of Jas. W. Huff."

Then follows the list of bonds and mortgages from the parties who had purchased lands from James W. Huff under deeds from him, and who executed to him mortgages for the purchase money.

His honor Judge Purdy, by his decree, held, amongst other things, that Mrs. Mary C. Huff was entitled to her homestead of $1,000. Within due time, exceptions were filed to so much of said decree as allowed this homestead exemption of $1,000, as follows:

"(1) In holding that Mary C. Huff is entitled to a homestead exemption in the funds now in hand to the extent of $1,000.

"(2) In adopting the views set out in the argument of the attorneys for Mary C. Huff, it being submitted that said views are erroneous, as follows: (a) In holding that J. W. Huff, by removing from the mortgaged tract of land, and selling off the same to various persons and taking back purchase-money mortgages, did little more than make a lease of the premises to the various grantees, and in treating said lands as though they were merely rented by the said J. W. Huff, whereas it should have been held that such transaction or transactions amounted to an abandonment of said lands as homestead or place of residence, or as being appurtenant to the homestead. (b) In holding that the right of homestead in the said lands was not subsequently divested by any act of the said J. W. Huff; it being submitted that his removal therefrom in the fall of 1887, and his sale of the said lands, divested his legal title, and was an abandonment of the said land as a residence or homestead, and that this terminated the right of the said J. W. Huff and of his widow to claim the same as exempt under the homestead law, and his honor erred in not so holding. (c) He erred in holding that J. W. Huff, after the sale by him in the fall of 1887, continued to rent these lands; this holding being against the agreed statement of facts. (d) In holding that the purchase-money mortgages vested in J. W. Huff 'the highest equitable interest in said lands,' it being submitted that J. W. Huff, by virtue of these mortgages, had no title in the said lands, but only a lien thereon, and his honor erred in not so holding. (e) In holding that the right to have the said lands exempt as a homestead was not afterwards lost. It is submitted that, when the said land was abandoned as a family homestead, the right to thereafter claim the same as exempt ceased. (f) In holding that the obligation of the contract would not be impaired by the allowance of the homestead in the proceeds of sale; it being submitted that, under the homestead laws of force at the date of the contract, the said proceeds of sale are not exempt, and to allow the same would be an impairment of the obligation of the contract. (g) In holding that article 1, § 20, of the Constitution of 1868, placed no limitation on the nature of the property or on its conditions in the allowance of the exemption; it being submitted that this section should be construed in connection with article 2, § 32, and that the exemption in lands would apply only as to the family homestead and lands appurtenant thereto. (h) In holding that the act of 1872, p. 231, gave the widow the right to claim exemption in land not a part of the family homestead; it being submitted that, under the terms of this act of the Constitution of 1868, she is entitled to an exemption in such lands only as constituted the family homestead or residence, or as appurtenant to it. (i) In holding that the liability of J. W. Huff as surety did not accrue until judgment was rendered against the principal, in 1888, whereas he should have held that the obligation of the contract was of the date of the administration bond, to wit, January 23, 1880. (j) In not holding that the question of exemption as against the claim of Julius C. Smith as administrator [now of Wm. Goldsmith, as administrator d. b. n. of J. A. Stone, deceased] must be determined under the homestead law as it stood on January 23, 1880, the date of the bond.

"(3) He erred in not holding that J. W. Huff had in 1887 abandoned said lands as a homestead, and that he never thereafter adopted them as a homestead.

"(4) He erred in not holding that the said lands having been abandoned in 1887 as a family homestead, and never having been thereafter adopted as a family homestead by either the said J. W. Huff or his widow, she is not entitled to claim an exemption in said lands, or in the proceeds of sale thereof.

"(5) He erred in holding that the proceeds of those portions of said tract not reconveyed to him were exempt as a homestead in lands; it being submitted that J. W. Huff had only a lien on said portions by virtue of his mortgages, and that under the homestead law as it stood on January 23, 1880, there was no exemption in either money or mortgages, and that he therefore erred in not directing the application of the proceeds of sale of said portions to the payment of the claim of Julius C. Smith as administrator."

The respondent gave notice of motion to sustain the circuit decree upon the following grounds:

"You will take notice that in case the Supreme Court be unable to sustain the conclusion of the circuit judge, R. O. Purdy, we will move the court to sustain same upon the additional grounds, as follows:

"That upon the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of the answer of respondent to the petition herein, Julius C. Smith has no right to intervene in this action; that the judgment which is the basis of his claim has no active energy; is but an ordinary indebtedness liquidated; that he has no lien upon the subject-matter of this action; has not pursued the proper course to satisfy his indebtedness; and that the said circuit judge erred in not dismissing said petition, and erred in hearing same, and erred in refusing to dismiss same, and erred in not holding that petitioner is and has not pursued the proper course, and in not holding that he has no standing in this case, and no right to intervene herein as he has sought to do.

"That, at the time of the conveyance of James W. Huff of the land described in the complaint, he was entitled to homestead therein, and that by his deeds his homestead exemption has passed to his grantees, and that upon the reconveyance to James W. Huff, after the year 1896, of 281 acres of said land, his right of homestead and that of his surviving widow attached to said 281 acres of land, under the law then and now existing, and that, under the Constitution of 1895, the mortgage must be paid, so far as possible, out of the premises sold under the order of the court herein, to which the homestead exemption did not extend, and said mortgage debt cannot first exhaust the proceeds of the sale of the said 281 acres of land conveyed to James W. Huff after 1895."

We will now proceed to dispose of the questions raised by the appeal. At the risk of repetition, we will state what we understand to be undisputed facts: (a) By referring to the statement agreed to by the attorneys on each side of the controversy, the circuit judge was to formulate his decree, so far as the homestead was concerned, in answer to the following question: "Whether Mary C. Huff, the widow, is entitled to claim, as against petitioner's debt, the fund as exempt under the homestead laws? If not, then the decree should direct payment of petitioner's debt out of any surplus remaining after the payment of plaintiff's debt." (b) Mary C. Huff, as the wife of James W. Huff, lived with her said husband, James W. Huff, upon the 616 acres of land, as a place of residence, from the year 1878 to the fall of the year 1887, when the said husband and wife removed from said 616 acres of land, and took up a home at a distance of five miles from said 616 acres of land, which latter home they have never changed, but they did not purchase their new home. And the said James W. Huff in the fall of the year 1887 sold and conveyed by deed every portion of said 616 acres of land, and the said wife renounced her dower on each of the deeds to the 616 acres of land in favor of the respective purchasers thereof. (c) James W. Huff mortgaged for his own debt the whole of said 616 acres of land to Furman University on the — day of —, 1880. (d) James W. Huff became surety on the guardianship bond of F. L. Huff on the 23d January, 1880, in the penalty of two thousand dollars. His principal, the guardian, made default in the discharge of his duties as such guardian, and by proper proceedings the amount of such default was ascertained to be $716.80. The holder of said bond sued the said James W. Huff as said surety on said bond, and obtained judgment against him on the 25th day of September, 1889. One J. A. Stone was a co-surety with James W. Huff on said guardianship bond, and, he (Stone) having died intestate, Julius C. Smith became his administrator, and, as such administrator, paid to the holder of the guardianship bond the amount of the judgment against James W. Huff, and had said judgment duly assigned to him as said administrator, which said judgment is now held by the petitioner, William Goldsmith, the younger, as the successor of the said Julius C. Smith, who has departed this life, and the petitioner now claims one-half of the $716.80.

We are now prepared, so far as the facts are concerned, to go forward with the determination of the question, is there a homestead for Mrs. Mary C. Huff? If there is a homestead, it must have existed prior to the 23d day of January, 1880, but it may be asked, why is that date adopted? Under the Constitution of the United States, every state of the United States is forbidden to pass any law impairing a contract in existence at the time of the enactment of any such law. For the present we will say we assume that the contract of the guardian for whom James W. Huff became surety on the 23d day of January, 1880, operates from that date. Hence no legislation of this state after that date would be constitutional. What was the homestead law of this state in existence on the 23d day of January, 1880? First. The Constitution of this state, adopted in the year 1868, in section 20 of article 1, provided: " * * And a reasonable amount of property as a homestead shall be exempted from seizure or sale for payment of any debts or liabilities, except for the payment of such obligations as are provided for in this Constitution." Second. The Constitution of this state, in section 32 of article 2, provided: "The family homestead of the head of each family residing in this state, such homestead consisting of dwelling house, outbuilding and land appurtenant, not to exceed the value of one thousand dollars, and yearly product thereof, shall be exempt from attachment, levy or sale on any mesne or final process issued from any court. To secure the full enjoyment of said homestead exemption to the person entitled thereto, or to the head of any family, the personal property of such person of the following character, to wit: household furniture, beds and bedding, family library, arms, carts, wagons, farming implements, tools, neat cattle, work animals, swine, goats and sheep, not to exceed in value in the aggregate sum of five hundred dollars, shall be subject to like exemption as said homestead, and there shall be exemption in addition thereto all necessary wearing apparel: provided, that no property shall be exempt from attachment, levy or sale, for taxes or for payment of obligations contracted for the purchase of said homestead or the erection of improvements thereon: provided, further, that the yearly products of said homestead shall not be exempt from attachment, levy or sale for the payment of obligations contracted in the production of the same. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly at their first session to enforce the provisions of this section by suitable legislation."

There can be no longer any doubt that these two sections must be construed together, for, as was said in Norton v. Bradham, 21 S. C. 379: "It will be observed that these two provisions are placed in different articles—one in the article designated 'Declaration of Rights,' while the other is in the article designated 'Legislative Department.' As might have been expected, therefore, the former is confined to a simple declaration of the general right of exemption, and its concluding words manifestly point to some other provision of the Constitution where the general right thus declared is to be specifically defined and qualified. The latter, however, is specific in its terms, and declares to the lawmaking power what shall be the specific character and qualifications of the right which had been previously declared in general terms. We think, therefore, that, in considering the question of the limits of legislative power upon this subject, it would be erroneous to confine our attention to the provisions of article 1, § 20, but, on the contrary, that section should be regarded as a mere general declaration of a right which is subsequently defined and limited by the provisions of article 2, § 32. If the framers of the Constitution had contented themselves simply with the insertion of section 20 of article 1, then, clearly, the Legislature would have had the power to enact any law upon the subject not inconsistent with the general right thus guaranteed. They could have fixed the amount and character of property to be exempted, as well as the mode of proceeding by which such claim should be asserted. But when the people, in their sovereign capacity, acting through a convention, went on, and, by section 32 of article 2, prescribed what should be the nature and character of the homestead and personal property exempted, describing what it should be, the particular kind of property, its amount and value, and to whose benefit it should inure, all these matters were placed beyond the domain of legislative power, and nothing was left for the General Assembly to do, except what was prescribed in the last clause of the section—pass the laws necessary and suitable 'to enforce the provisions of this section.' Hence, whenever the Legislature undertakes to interpolate other provisions than those prescribed in that section, instead of simply confining themselves, as directed by the organic law, to the enactment of laws suitable for carrying into effect the provisions there prescribed, they are invading a province already fully occupied by the Constitution, and transcending the limitation placed upon their powers by that instrument."

Thus it will be seen that this court has spoken, and requires that these two sections shall be construed together. Norton v. Bradham, supra, also declares: "The debt upon which the judgment in favor of respondents was recovered having been contracted prior to the constitutional amendment of 1880, it is quite clear that the question made by this appeal must be determined by the law as it stood previous to the adoption of that amendment. Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall.

610, 21 L. Ed. 212; Cochrane v. Darcy, 5 S. C. 125." See, also, De La Howe v. Harper, 5 S. C. 472; Sloan v. Hunter, 65 S. C. 237, 43 S. E. 789, where Mr. Justice Gary, as the organ of the court, declares: "The rule is well settled in this state that the right of homestead is to be determined by the laws of force when the debt was contracted." Also 15 A. & E. Encyclopædia of Law, p. 634, where it is said: "The date of the execution of the contract, and not that of the breach of it, governs in respect to the priority of the creditors over that of the homestead."

Thus it is manifest that the provisions of our Constitution and acts of the Legislature of the General Assembly in pursuance thereof are to govern, where such legislation is prior to the 23d of January, 1880, and also that the date of the 23d of January, 1880, when the bond was signed, fixed the limit beyond which the homesteader cannot claim. But in the next place the circuit judge, in his decree, seems to have fallen into the error of supposing that there was any doubt that when James W. Huff, in the year 1887, left the 616 acres of land, and settled with his family at a distance of five miles therefrom, having sold and conveyed by deed all of the 616 acres of land in the same year (1887), he thereby abandoned his right of homestead in said lands. To our minds it is clear that the homestead was thus then abandoned, and there is nothing in the case going to show that he or Mrs. Mary C. Huff, his wife, ever again took possession of said lands to reside thereon. By our decisions, the law in existence governing homesteads on the 23d of January, 1880, guarantied to no person a homestead in lands, except where resided upon, and the land appurtenant to said residence. Chafee v. Rainey, 21 S. C. 19; Rollings v. Evans, 23 S. C. 328; Chalmers v. Turnipseed, 21 S. C. 137; Trimmier v. Winsmith, 41 S. C. 116, 19 S. E. 283.

Again, we do not see how Mrs. Mary C. Huff can hope to obtain a homestead exemption, when the mortgages are considered. This question was flatly decided against her contention in Union Bank v. Northrop, 19 S. C. 476. It is thus apparent that we must sustain all the exceptions of the appellant.

We will not consider respondent's notice of motion to sustain the circuit decree. While we admit that the answer of Mrs. Mary C. Huff to the petition herein does set up certain rights as against said petitioner, yet, when she saw proper, through her attorneys, to sign the agreement which has been hereinbefore set forth, a portion of which we quoted in the beginning of our consideration of the appeal, we must hold that she abandoned all said claims, and based her defense upon her claim to homestead, and really consented that a decree should go against her if said claim of homestead should be rejected. But if we are at liberty to consider the questions she now seeks to raise against the right of the petitioner to have one-half of his judgment paid out of the funds now in court, we could not sustain the same, for, granted that the judgment cannot be enforced by execution, having lost its active energy, still 20 years have not elapsed since the rendition of the judgment, and, under the laws of this state regulating the payment of claims against the estate of an intestate, such judgment would operate as a judgment against such estate. This motion of respondent must be overruled.

It follows from what we have hereinbefore said that the decree of the circuit judge must be so modified that the claim of homestead to Mrs. Mary C. Huff is denied, and that the judgment presented by the petitioner as established must be paid. In all other respects the circuit decree is affirmed.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be modified as hereinbefore required, and, after such modification shall have been made, such decree shall be affirmed.

OLIVER et al. v. SOUTH CAROLINA INTERSTATE & WEST INDIAN EXPOSITION CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 21, 1904.)

RECEIVERS—COUNSEL—COMPENSATION.

1. A previous agreement of parties or an order of the court that a receiver should employ counsel without compensation is not binding on the court in equity, and, whenever it may determine that counsel should be compensated for preserving a fund in court, it may direct a fee to be paid receiver's counsel out of such fund in disregard of the agreement.

Pope, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Purdy, Judge.

Action by Henry Oliver and others against the South Carolina Interstate & West Indian Exposition Company. From an order of the circuit court, plaintiff Oliver appeals. Modified.

T. Moultrie Mordecai and J. P. K. Bryan, for appellant. M. Rutledge Rivers, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This action is in the nature of a creditors' bill brought by Henry Oliver, the American Lucol Company, and the Darlington Electric Fountain & Supply Company in behalf of themselves and other creditors who might come in. The object of the action was to obtain the appointment of a receiver for the defendant insolvent company, and the collection and distribution of the assets among the creditors under the direction of the court.

The appeal is from the following order:

"In view of the stipulation entered into soon after the commencement of the litigation tion in this matter, a serious question has arisen as to the allowance of counsel fees to the counsel engaged in this cause. The counsel engaged in behalf of the receivers having declined to act further in the matter, the receivers found themselves in a position in which they had to employ counsel. They were trustees accountable for the carrying out in a proper manner the matter confided to their trust. They deemed it necessary to have counsel to assist them in this undertaking. Being without counsel in this changed state of affairs, if they had applied, they would have been permitted to have employed counsel and to have compensated such counsel. It is a fundamental rule that where trustees act bona fide for the purpose of carrying out their trust, and do any act or acts for the benefit of those interested, the court will sanction such act. In my opinion, the receiver acted wisely in employing counsel, and such counsel should be paid. This matter has not been contested before me by a great majority of the creditors, who coincide with the views herein expressed; but the position is contested by the counsel for Mr. Wagener, not because the work has not been done, and faithfully done, by the counsel now seeking compensation, but for the reason that, for the protection of the interests of his client, he thinks he should object, in view of the stipulation entered into as before stated. The matter being contested, I will not attempt to refer it entirely to the master, but will seek his aid in obtaining testimony, so that the court may fix the proper fee for the attorney for the receivers, and may have before it testimony as to fees for the other counsel. It is therefore ordered that it be referred to G. H. Sass, Esq., one of the masters for said county, to take testimony as to the amount that should be allowed to M. Rutledge Rivers, Esq., as counsel for the receivers, and to take testimony as to the nature and value of the services rendered by the other counsel respectively engaged in the case. As to the said M. Rutledge Rivers, representing the receivers, I hold that he is entitled to compensation, for the reasons hereinbefore stated, leaving the amount to be fixed by future order of this court upon the coming in of the master's report, and as to the other counsel engaged in the case, upon the coming in of the master's report, leaving the question then to be determined as to whether they are entitled to compensation, and, if so, the amount of the same. At such reference, of course, all the counsel engaged in the cause will be notified, and then the stipulation entered into and all other such matters as those objecting deem material may be put in evidence and brought to the attention of the court."

The appellant's exceptions are as follows:

"(1) That the presiding judge erred in holding that M. Rutledge Rivers, Esq., receiver's counsel, was entitled to compensation to be paid out of the funds herein.

"(2) That the presiding judge erred in referring it to the master to ascertain and report what amount should be allowed M. Rutledge Rivers, Esq., as his compensation.

"(3) That the record in this case disclosing the fact that the entire scheme of these proceedings was that neither receivers nor counsel, whether representing parties or receivers, should be paid fees from the funds realized in this case, the presiding judge erred in allowing compensation to one attorney in the case, without also allowing compensation to other attorneys whose services had been rendered in the creation and preservation of the fund, and especially to the counsel for the plaintiffs, who had filed this proceeding to raise a fund for the payment of the creditors of said company, and who, as plaintiffs, had the carriage of the cause."

Waiving the objection that the objection raising the question whether the appellant should not be required to contribute out of his pro rata of the fund in court toward the payment of Mr. Rivers' fee is too general for consideration, because it fails to point out specifically wherein there was error, it nevertheless cannot be sustained. The agreement entered into before the receiver was appointed could not have the effect of limiting the powers of the court of equity so as to prevent it from exercising full control over the property which it took in charge. Nor did the first order, providing that counsel employed by the receiver should not have compensation, prevent the court from passing a subsequent order allowing compensation when it became necessary to preserve the fund in its keeping.

The question raised by the third exception is not properly before this court for consideration, as it has not yet been determined by the circuit court, but, as it may save the trouble and expense of another appeal, we will not decline to dispose of it. The services of the other attorneys were not rendered in preserving the fund in the hands of the court, and this question is not governed by the principle applicable to the fee of Mr. Rivers.

It is the judgment of the court that the order of the circuit court be modified.

POPE, O. J. (dissenting). This action is in the nature of a creditors' bill brought by Henry Oliver, the American Lucol Company, and the Darlington Electric Fountain & Supply Company, in behalf of themselves and other creditors who might come in. The object of the action was to obtain the appointment of a receiver for the defendant insolvent company, and the collection and distribution of the assets among its creditors under the direction of the court. It was agreed among counsel that no counsel fees should be charged or claimed against the fund to be raised in said cause. This agreement was as follows:

"Duryea & Oliver vs. South Carolina Interstate and West Indian Exposition Company. Charleston, S. C., May 17, 1902. Wm. Mosely Fitch, Esq., Messrs. T. M. Mordecai and others, Plaintiffs' Attorneys—Dear Sirs: I agree to hold in trust all receipts of the Exposition Company hereafter accruing since the filing of the above bill, including the First National Bank deposit, paying therefrom only actual current operating expenses, and if there be a balance after such expenses are paid, and also the two-thirds gross gate receipts are also paid, I will hold such balance subject to order of Court in both the Duryea and Potter and Oliver cases; and if I shall pay out an excess by reason thereof, I am to be a preferred creditor therefor, and except as to any funds to be appropriated by the city council, any amount heretofore paid by me out of my own funds for United States government amount to be repaid me out of the first money so appropriated as such amounts.

"The board of directors to be receivers after June 1, 1902, without bond, and neither receivers nor any lawyer in case to charge or take fee in these cases above mentioned.

"May 17, 1902. [Signed] F. W. Wagener.

"The within is agreed to. [Signed] W. M. Fitch, Attorneys, Duryea & Potter, T. M. Mordecai, Bulst & Bulst, J. P. K. Bryan."

The order appointing receivers made the same provision as to receivers and the counsel for receivers. The order is as follows:

"On hearing read the verified complaint herein, and after due consideration thereof, it appearing to the court that receivers should be appointed, it is ordered:

"First. That the president and directors of said company, to wit, F. W. Wagener, W. H. Welch, F. K. Cary, J. L. David, John F. Ficken, C. S. Gadsden, J. C. Hemphill, Wiley Jones, and Samuel Lapham, be, and they are hereby, appointed receivers, without compensation and bond, of all and singular the property and assets of the said South Carolina Interstate & West Indian Exposition Company, the defendant herein, with the usual powers of receivers, and with leave to apply to this court for any further orders which may be desired for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the intention of this order.

"Second. That said receivers do forthwith take possession of all of the property and assets, and thereupon cause to be prepared and filed in this court forthwith a sufficient and proper inventory and list of the same, and a schedule of present employes and salaries, and their recommendation as to the smallest possible force to operate this receivership.

"Third. That the said receivers be allowed to employ counsel, but without compensation.

"Fourth. That except as herein provided, and until the further order of this court, the said South Carolina Interstate & West Indian Exposition Company, its agents, servants, officers, and attorneys, are hereby restrained and enjoined from parting with or disposing of any of its property or assets, excepting to deliver the same to the receivers hereinbefore appointed.

"Fifth. That all of the defendants herein and all other creditors of the said South Carolina Interstate & West Indian Exposition Company be, and are hereby, each severally and respectively enjoined from prosecuting any action in this court, or taking part in any other cause instituted or to be instituted in this court in the present proceedings.

"Sixth. That a copy of this order be forthwith served upon each of the receivers herein appointed, each of whom shall within five days severally file in this court their written acceptance of such appointment; otherwise such appointment to be void.

"It is further ordered that the stipulation in writing heretofore made in this case be forthwith filed of record.

"9 June, 1902.

"Geo. W. Gage, Circuit Judge.

"We consent to the above-named order, and to its being made at chambers and without the county of Charleston. T. Moultrie Mordecai, Bulst & Bulst, Ficken, Hughes & Ficken, W. M. Fitch, J. P. K. Bryan."

The receivers subsequently reported as follows:

"The undersigned, as receivers, ask leave to file herewith a supplementary inventory containing additional items of property of the exposition company not included in the first inventory filed herein. They also ask leave to report that, under special authority given in a former order of this honorable court, they have appointed M. Rutledge Rivers, Esq., as the counsel and legal adviser of the receivers. The undersigned would further report that the Southern Railway Company hold a claim against the exposition company for the sum of $563.20, which the United States Treasury Department is ready to pay out of the special appropriation of $90,000. This appropriation is payable directly to the exposition company as a reimbursement for advances made to claimants. Heretofore, however, the directors of said company, instead of advancing the amount of the claim, have given a power of attorney to the railway company to collect such claim directly from the government. It is now requested that the receivers execute such power of attorney, and this request is respectfully submitted for the consideration of the court, and for such order in the premises as may be proper. Respectfully submitted. J. L. David, W. H. Welch, Jno. F. Ficken, Receivers."

On the 26th of September, 1903, the receivers reported as follows:

"The undersigned, receivers of the above-named exposition company, respectfully report:

"(1) That since their appointment they have continuously performed the exacting and laborious duties of their office, expending thereon much time and labor.

"(2) That among other things requiring their care and attention were many matters rendering it incumbent on them, and absolutely necessary, to secure the aid and services of counsel for a proper disposal thereof. And this court, recognizing that counsel would probably be needed, provided in the order appointing the undersigned as receivers that counsel might be employed, but withheld the means of procuring same, by directing that said employment should be without compensation.

"(3) That the receivers were unable to obtain counsel upon such terms, and, soon after assuming their office, found that they could not conduct the affairs of their responsible position without counsel; that claims were filed requiring contest before the master, actions had been commenced and were pending; claims were outstanding in favor of the exposition company that had to be sued. Various and complex legal questions were continually arising, to be considered and acted upon, and that it was impossible for the receivers either to keep informed about the affairs of the exposition company, or properly to guard the interests of the creditors, without having a representative in court.

"(4) That they thereupon sought the services of Mr. M. Rutledge Rivers, and employed him as their counsel, with the understanding that they would report to the court the difficulties they had experienced, and the utter impracticability of the aforesaid provision of the order appointing them, in withholding compensation from their legal representative, and, further, that they would urge upon the court, in view of the above-stated condition of affairs, the propriety and justice of allowing proper compensation for their counsel.

"(5) That Mr. Rivers has for the past year zealously and efficiently attended to the duties of his office as attorney for the receivers, and, as a matter of justice to him, they heartily and cheerfully request the court to grant him such compensation for his services as may be meet and proper.

"All of which is respectfully submitted.
[Signed] Jno. F. Ficken, W. H. Welch, J. L. David, C. S. Gadsden, J. C. Hemphill.
Dated July 11, 1903. Filed September 26, 1903."

Whereupon the court made the order appealed from, set out in the main opinion.

It is quite evident that the purpose at the outset was to avoid the charges for counsel fees, receivers' compensation, and compensation for the receivers' solicitor. No doubt, the object of the enterprise was so beneficent in its scope, affecting, as it did, not only the city of Charleston, but the whole state of South Carolina as well, that the misfortunes that attended the exposition itself caused all parties to this action to bend every energy, without compensation therefor, to the collection and distribution of the assets of the exposition among its creditors. At the beginning counsel for the plaintiffs stipulated that they would not demand or expect compensation. The board of directors of the exposition, who were made receivers, so stipulated, and the court so ordered in regard to the attorney or attorneys for the receivers. The first report of the court stated that the receivers had chosen Mr. M. Rutledge Rivers, of the Charleston bar, as their counsel, and no mention was at that time made of compensation for such attorney. A year afterwards, however, realizing the immense labor and most valuable services of Mr. Rivers as counsel for the receivers, such receivers, in their report of the 26th of September, 1903, sought the interposition of the court in behalf of their attorney. Their words, as appear by such report, which has already been herein incorporated, speak most loudly and appealingly for compensation on behalf of their attorney, Mr. Rivers. It has always seemed to us to be most unwise in practice to expect valuable service of attorneys in carrying into execution trusts such as herein involved, and action gratuitously on the part of the said attorney to be most unwise and just. Still, parties, when they come into court, have the right to make stipulations and agreements which will be carried out by the court. Any change in the conditions which thereafter arise should only be made where it is the unanimous wish of parties originally affected thereby.

Judge Gage's order of the 9th of June, 1902, hereinbefore set out in full, was the chart, so to speak, by which the court in this cause should be governed. So, therefore, to our minds, it seems that the plaintiff (appellant), Mr. Henry Oliver, has a right to call upon the courts to enforce the agreements hereinbefore recited. His position is the same as of a party to a consent decree. No party bound thereby could upset it. Jones & Parker v. Webb, 8 S. C. 202. "A judgment by consent of parties is in the nature of contract between them, and cannot be set aside, when fraud or mistake is not alleged, merely because of some irregularity of procedure." But this is a court of equity. All the creditors of the South Carolina Interstate & West Indian Exposition Company are parties to this record, and, if they see proper to waive the stipulations as to payment of counsel fees, they have a right to do so; and the court of equity will facilitate in every respect their desire that full justice shall be done to their attorney, who has so assiduously and ably preserved their interests as affected by this cause. This court is pleased to recall the following statement:

"The undersigned, all of whom represent the creditors of the above-named exposition company, desire to submit to this court in this cause the following statement, which was submitted to the court below by counsel in behalf of the attorney for receivers:

We understand that in the inception of the cause, when a receivership was first appointed, the agreement set out on page 4 of the printed case had been entered into. This was not entered into by any of the undersigned. With the exception of Jno. F. Ficken, Esq., and his firm of Ficken, Hughes & Ficken, none of the undersigned were engaged in the cause, nor were they interested in the same until subsequently, when it was found necessary to liquidate and settle up the entire affairs of the exposition company, and all its creditors were called in. In doing this, it became absolutely necessary to thoroughly sift and adjust a very large number of claims against the company, so as to exclude from sharing in its assets claims not properly entitled so to do. The doing of this cast upon the receivers of the company and their counsel the performance of a great amount of work, which we are satisfied was not had in contemplation either by the parties or the court when the original stipulation was made. To our knowledge, Mr. M. Rutledge Rivers, who was appointed counsel for the receivers, performed in this behalf most meritorious services to all the parties interested in the fund for distribution to the creditors of the said exposition company. He performed the work of sifting the accounts against the company, going over the claims of the creditors, putting in shape the testimony against such of those claims as were resisted by the receivers or any creditor, and attended faithfully and continuously before the master upon the taking of the testimony and the argument of such claims as were resisted, as well as performing the work set forth in the report of the receivers, at folio 17 of the printed case. All the creditors of the company in this way have been benefited by the services which Mr. Rivers someritoriously rendered to the fund, and all creditors interested therein. For this reason, we think it only fair and proper that he should receive a fair remuneration for his labor. The circumstances under which he acted are entirely different from those that existed when the stipulation was made, and he was not a party to said stipulation. On behalf of the creditors represented by us, we therefore desire to state to the court that we admit that a fair compensation to be paid to Mr. Rivers is fairly and equitably a just charge upon the fund, inasmuch as the parties interested therein have benefited by his services. Ficken, Hughes & Ficken. Jno. F. Ficken. Nathan & Sinkler. Smythe, Lee & Frost. Jos. W. Barnwell, for Trustees under Mortgage. Wm. Henry Parker, Jr. George H. Moffett. B. A. Hagood. Legare & Holman. Mitchell & Smith. Asher D. Cohen. Miller & Whaley. W. Huger Fitzsimons.

"We, the undersigned, who signed the stipulation above referred to, concur in the foregoing statement. Buist & Buist."

This handsome conduct in Mr. Rivers' behalf demands that this court shall modify the order of reference made by Judge Purdy, by directing that it be referred to the master, G. H. Sass, Esq., to ascertain and report a reasonable counsel fee to be paid out of the funds in court belonging to all parties, except Henry Oliver; for I have already held that Mr. Oliver is to be freed from payment of any part of the counsel fees for the receivers out of his funds in court. But it is my duty to hold that there are no other fees to be paid to any parties, for such fees cannot be paid under the stipulation made by the plaintiffs and defendants at the commencement of this action. The circuit judge was in error in referring it to the master to ascertain if fees other than Mr. Rivers' should be paid. The circuit decree is therefore erroneous in referring it to the master to ascertain what fee shall be paid to plaintiffs' attorneys. The majority of the court differ from me as to the fee to be ascertained for Mr. Rivers, holding that he is entitled to a fee to be paid by all.

EAKIN et al. v. TAYLOR et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

April 22, 1904.)

EQUITY — JURISDICTION — TITLE TO LANDS — REMEDY AT LAW.

1. Point 1 of syllabus in case of Freer v. Davis, 43 S. E. 164, 52 W. Va. 1, 94 Am. St. Rep. 896, reaffirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Calhoun County; Warren Miller, Judge.

Bill by Justus Eakin and others against Tasril Taylor and others. Verdict for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Modified.

T. P. Jacobs and E. B. Snodgrass, for appellants. Linn & Hamilton, for appellees.

McWHORTER, J. On the 8th day of August, 1902, Justus Eakin, D. H. Cox, Thomas Mills, and E. E. L. Snodgrass presented their bill to the judge of the circuit court of Calhoun county praying for the cancellation of a lease made by Tasril Taylor to the Lowther Oil Company as a cloud upon their title to 100 acres of land on Yellow creek, in the county of Calhoun, and to enjoin the Lowther Oil Company and the Eureka Pipe Line Company from paying over to or delivering to said Taylor any portion of the oil produced from said tract, and that said Taylor be required to account to plaintiffs; that the transfer of money or funds from said Taylor to his son, Amnon Taylor, be canceled, and the said Amnon Taylor be required to account to them for the same, and the Calhoun County Bank be enjoined from paying over to said Amnon Taylor in any manner any funds due his account in said bank derived from the sale of oil and placed in his hands by his father Tasril Taylor; and praying for process against all of said parties defendants.

Plaintiffs alleged in their bill: That they were the owners, among other things, of a tract of 100 acres of land described in the bill by metes and bounds, on Yellow creek, in that part of Calhoun county being formerly Lewis county, which was granted to John Walden in 1844. That Walden died intestate, leaving surviving him two sons, Gilbert Walden and ——— Walden, and possibly a widow. That some time after the death of John Walden his son ——— Walden, and brother of Gilbert, died intestate, unmarried, and without issue, leaving said Gilbert Walden as the only son and heir at law of said John Walden, deceased, and of his deceased brother, whereby the said Gilbert Walden became and was the sole tenant in fee-simple absolute to said tract of land. By deed dated the 4th day of May, 1901, said Gilbert Walden, being sole and unmarried, conveyed with covenant of general warranty to plaintiffs all the right, title, and interest and claim which his father, John Walden, ever had in and to, among other things, said tract of 100 acres of land, and filed with their bill what purported to be a copy of the patent to John Walden for the said 100 acres of land, marked "Exhibit A." Also as "Exhibit B" they filed what they termed a copy of the said deed of May 4, 1901, from Gilbert Walden to themselves, and alleged that Tasril Taylor had entered upon said tract of land without their consent, and was in the possession thereof, claiming the same against plaintiffs, and excluded them from the possession of the same. He had professed, as plaintiffs were informed, to execute an oil and gas lease upon said tract of land to the Lowther Oil Company, or to some one who had assigned such lease to the said oil company. That in pursuance of such pretended lease said oil company had entered upon and drilled and operated the same for the production of oil and gas, and had produced the same in paying quantities, and were paying over a certain portion thereof to said Taylor. That said entry upon the land by Taylor and the Lowther Oil Company was without the plaintiffs' knowledge and consent, and that the taking of oil and gas from said land under said so-called lease constituted, as to plaintiffs, an irreparable damage to said tract of land, and the taking of such oil and gas operated as a waste. That large quantities of oil had been taken out by said company, and the royalty paid, and was being paid, to said Taylor, and that said Taylor for the purpose of avoiding any liability to plaintiffs transferred the proceeds of sale of such royalty oil to other and different parties. That, as they were informed, a large portion of such money derived from the sale of royalty oil had been so transferred with the purpose to wrong, cheat, and defraud plaintiffs, to his son, Amnon Taylor, and that he kept the same on deposit in the Calhoun County Bank. That plaintiffs were willing that said oil company might develop said tract of land for oil and gas purposes under a lease or contract with them to pay the royalty oil to them, but were not willing that they should operate it under the Taylor lease, and to pay the royalty to him. That the oil so developed and produced from said tract of land was being run into the lines of the Eureka Pipe Line Company, and transported beyond the limits and boundaries of the state, and they had no means of knowing accurately the amount of said product. The defendant filed his demurrer to the bill, and his answer, in which he denied all the material allegations thereof, and alleged that plaintiffs had full notice of his claim and possession before they received any deed for the land claimed by them, and filed with his answer a contract in writing, signed by G. D. Camden for himself and J. Walden, dated December 10, 1870, agreeing to sell to him, for the sum of $250, of which the sum of $100 had been paid, and the residue to be paid at times mentioned—October 1, 1871, and October 1, 1872; under which agreement defendant had taken possession of said land, and had been in said possession ever since, and under which purchase he was still claiming, and which agreement was entered of record in the clerk's office of the county court of Calhoun county, and which defendant avers in his answer was seen on the record and discussed by plaintiffs, whereby they had full notice of defendant's claim. He also filed a letter or power of attorney made by John Walden to Gideon D. Camden, dated November 6, 1865, which was duly acknowledged and entered of record April 25, 1872, in the same clerk's office, which power of attorney authorized said Camden to sell the interest of said John Walden in the lands owned by him, and to make special or general warranty deeds therefor; and the defendant relied upon the gross laches and negligence of plaintiffs, and those under whom they claimed, in asserting demand for said land, and relief upon the staleness of such demand, and that, if any equity ever did appertain to them, it was lost; and prayed for a dissolution of the injunction and dismissal of plaintiffs' bill, and decree for costs. The plaintiffs took and filed in the cause the deposition of Gilbert Walden. On the 10th day of October, 1902, the following final decree was entered in the cause: "This cause coming on this day to be heard upon the bill of complaint of the plaintiffs and the exhibits therewith filed upon each of which exhibits there are indorsed certain exceptions by the defendant Tasril Taylor, and, the grounds of such exceptions being ascertained to be true by inspection, the court doth sustain said exceptions; upon the answer of the defendant Tasril Taylor, and the exhibits therewith filed, the signature of G. D. Camden to Exhibit B. being proved in open court by the oath of R. G. Linn; upon the bill taken for confessed as to the other defendants therein named; upon process which appears to have been executed for the time required by law; and upon the cause regularly proceeded in at rules and set for hearing as to them, and upon the bill now here taken for confessed as to all the defendants except Tasril Taylor; upon an attested copy of a certain writing under seal, dated on the 26th day of August, 1876, executed by John Walden to E. E. Gray, deputy sheriff of Fauquier county, Virginia, certified by L. H. Trippett, clerk of the county court of Calhoun county, wherein the same was duly recorded on the 19th day of September, 1876, when said writing was this day produced and filed as evidence on behalf of the defendant Tasril Taylor, and a certain agreement in writing executed by John Walden and G. D. Camden under their respective seals, bearing date on the 4th day of August, 1843, which was likewise produced at the bar of the court and filed herein by the said defendant Tasril Taylor, and which the said Tasril Taylor is permitted to withdraw from the files of this cause upon leaving an attested copy and upon the deposition of Gilbert Walden taken and filed on behalf of the plaintiffs; and upon the motion of the defendant Tasril Taylor this day made to dissolve the injunction heretofore awarded in this cause, and was argued by counsel. Upon consideration whereof it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the injunction heretofore awarded in this cause be, and the same is hereby, dissolved, and that the plaintiffs' bill in this cause be dismissed, and that the plaintiffs do pay to the defendant Tasril Taylor his costs by him about his defense in this behalf expended."

The plaintiffs have a clear and adequate remedy at law, and fail to show any equity against the defendant Tasril Taylor. This proceeding on the part of plaintiffs is an action of ejectment under the garb of a suit in equity alleging fraud on the part of defendant, as well as irreparable damages by the removing of the oil from the premises, in order to get equity jurisdiction. All the rights of plaintiffs are dependent upon their legal title, which has never been established by law. They do not show that an action had been commenced or contemplated for the recovery of the possession of the land which is conceded to be in the possession of defendant at least under claim of title. This case comes clearly under the rulings of this court in the case of Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 43 S. E. 104, 94 Am. St. Rep. 895, where it is held (Syl., point 1): "A court of equity has no jurisdiction to settle the title and boundary of lands between adverse claimants when the plaintiff has no equity against the party claiming adversely to him."

The decree of the circuit court of Calhoun county should be modified so as to reserve the right of plaintiffs to bring this action at law if they be so advised, and with such modifications the decree is affirmed.

AMERICAN SURETY CO. OF NEW YORK v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

CORPORATIONS — CHARTER FEE — LICENSE — STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION — CORPORATIONS EXEMPT FROM OBLIGATION OF STATUTE.

1. Code 1887, § 1104, as amended by Act May 15, 1903, providing that a corporation which has already paid a fee or tax for authority to transact business in the state shall not again be liable for such fee before securing a license from the State Corporation Commission, contemplates the charter fee required by Acts 1902-1904, p. 360, and does not refer to the annual license tax.

2. Const. art. 12, § 156a, provides that, subject to the provisions of the Constitution, and to such regulations as may be prescribed by law, the State Corporation Commission shall be the department of government through which all licenses to foreign corporations shall issue, and through which shall be carried out all the provisions of the Constitution for the regulation and control of such corporations. Code 1887, § 1104, as amended by Acts 1902-1904, p. 360, provides that every incorporated company doing business in the state must pay a charter fee. Held, that every corporation which has not paid a fee is required to do so, all prior enactments relieving any corporation or class of corporations from the payment of the fee being repealed.

Appeal from State Corporation Commission.

Appeal by the American Surety Company of New York from a decision of the State Corporation Commission imposing a fine on appellant for transacting business without having obtained the license required by law. Affirmed.

Wyndham R. Meredith, for appellant.
William A. Anderson, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

KEITH, P. This is an appeal from a decision of the State Corporation Commission imposing a fine upon appellant for transacting business in the state of Virginia without having obtained a license in accordance with section 1104 of the Code of 1887, as amended by an act of Assembly approved May 15, 1903. That section provides that "every incorporated company doing business in this state shall have an office in the state, at which all claims against such company due residents of the state may be audited, settled and paid. Every such company incorporated under a jurisdiction beyond the limits of this state (and hereinafter designated as a foreign corporation) shall, before doing business in this state, present to the State Corporation Commission (a) a written power of attorney, executed in duplicate, appointing some person residing in this state its agent, upon whom all legal process against the corporation may be served, and who shall be authorized to enter an appearance in its behalf; (b) two duly authenticated copies of the charter of the corporation, and (c) a certificate of the Auditor of Public Accounts, showing the payment into the treasury of the fee required by law to be paid by such corporation; and shall obtain from said Corporation Commission a license to transact business in the state. If it shall be made to appear to the State Corporation Commission that said corporation has complied with the law relative to the licensing of a foreign corporation of the character of the applicant corporation, then said Corporation Commission shall issue to said corporation a license to transact business in the state." There are other provisions of this section which need not be, at present, adverted to.

This law is broad and comprehensive in its terms. It applies to every incorporated company doing business in the state, and, upon its face, embraces foreign as well as domestic corporations.

The appellant, having been served with notice by the State Corporation Commission to appear and show cause why a fine should not be imposed upon it for doing business without having complied with the section just quoted, appeared and answered, resting its defense upon two grounds: First, that sections 1104 and 1105, as amended, were not intended to apply to it, but that it was governed by a special law, found, as originally passed, in Acts 1893-94, pp. 758, 764, cc. 661, 662, and amended at the session of 1895-96 (Acts 1895-96, pp. 284, 423, cc. 248, 406); and, second, that it had tendered to the Auditor the specific license tax of $200 imposed upon it for the year 1904, and that section 1104 has reference to this license fee, and not to the charter fee required in sections 37-40, inclusive, found at pages 178-180, Acts Assem. 1902-1904; and, further, that, even though a charter fee was by law required of it, it comes within the exception found in section 40, supra, which provides that "nothing contained in this section, or the three preceding sections, shall be construed to impose a fee for a charter or for authority to transact business in this state, upon any company which has already paid the fee or tax heretofore imposed by law upon its charter or for authority to transact its business in this state."

Dealing with the last defense first, it seems clear that the fee required by section 1104 is what is known as a "charter fee." This appears from the concluding portion of that section: "Any foreign corporation which has heretofore paid the fee required by law to entitle it to transact business in this state, and has otherwise complied with the laws heretofore existing relative thereto, shall not, on application for license to transact business in this state, be required to pay such fee again, nor to file a copy of the charter with the Secretary of the Commonwealth, if a copy thereof is already on file in his office." It seems too plain for argument that this has reference to a charge which is paid once for all, and not to the license tax which is paid each and every year. Nor does the appellant, in any event, come within the exception, for it nowhere appears that it has at any time paid this charter fee. Its statement upon this subject is cautiously made. Referring to section 1104, as amended, appellant says in its petition to the Corporation Commission for license to do business in the state for the year 1904 that "it only required those foreign corporations which have always been governed by section 1104 to pay the charter fee where such corporations are attempting to do business without ever complying with that section, or with the law relating to charter fees. All such foreign corporations are by the act of May 15, 1903, required to now pay this charter fee. The act leaves untouched that class of foreign corporations which were not governed by section 1104, as is the case with surety companies, and your petitioner in particular. In other words, if a right to transact business in this state has once been granted on the payment of a charter fee and an annual license tax, or on the payment of a license tax only, the state cannot, or at least does not intend to, now attach the requirement of the payment of a charter fee to the foreign corporation which has already obtained and been granted the right to do business in this state." This is certainly not an averment that it had paid the charter fee. Its whole insistence, indeed, is that it was never liable for the charter fee, but that it had been permitted to do business without the payment of such fee, and was therefore entitled to continue its business upon the same terms. There is neither allegation nor proof of the payment of the charter fee, and therefore appellant is not within the terms of the exception to the operation of sections 37-40.

The case of appellant must stand or fall by its first contention. Is it controlled by the law applicable to corporations in general, whether foreign or domestic, or is there a special law which applies to that particular class of corporations to which appellant belongs?

The Constitution of Virginia (section 156a, art. 12) provides that, "subject to the provisions of this Constitution and to such requirements, rules and regulations as may be prescribed by law, the State Corporation Commission shall be the department of government through which shall be issued all charters and amendments or extensions thereof, for domestic corporations, and all licenses to do business in this state to foreign corporations; and through which shall be carried out all the provisions of this Constitution, and of the laws made in pursuance thereof, for the creation, visitation, supervision, regulation and control of corporations chartered by, or doing business in, this state." By section 1104, as found in the Acts of 1902-1904, at page 360, and which has already been quoted, every incorporated company doing business in this state is required to pay a charter fee. The amount of that charter fee is fixed by sections 37-40, already referred to, and the penalty for doing business without complying with the law is imposed by section 1105.

Whatever may have been the interpretation of the law as it existed before the adoption of the Constitution now in force, and the passage of the laws in pursuance thereof, including section 1104 as amended, there seems no room for question that appellant, in common with every incorporated company doing business in this state, must pay a charter fee, or bring itself within the operation of the exception. It would serve no useful purpose to inquire whether, by a true construction of the statutes upon the subject in force prior to the adoption of the Constitution, the appellant was liable to pay the tax, and escaped by the oversight or inadvertence of those charged with the execution of the laws, or whether the Legislature had seen fit to place such companies upon a more favorable footing than all other corporations doing business in the state, for, whether this company has hitherto escaped by inadvertence, or in accordance with the intent of the Legislature, there is nothing in the nature of a contract, nothing in the nature of an estoppel upon the state to interfere with its unquestioned power of taxation. Therefore, whatever opinion might be entertained with reference to the laws as they heretofore existed, the Constitution and laws as they now stand unmistakably place all corporations upon a footing of equality, and all are required to pay a charter fee as the condition precedent to doing business in this state, with a proviso that this charter fee shall not be exacted of those corporations by which this fee has been at any time paid. The Corporation Commission, which is the department specially charged with the duty of granting licenses to do business in this state to foreign corporations, has given this matter careful consideration; has found that the laws do not discriminate in favor of appellant; that it is not within any exception; that it was doing business in violation of the law; and has imposed upon it the minimum penalty for its offense. We discover no error in its ruling, and it is therefore affirmed.

HORTENSTINE v. VIRGINIA-CAROLINA RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 23, 1904.)

RAILROADS — INJURY TO TRESPASSER — NEGLIGENCE — PLEADING — RATE OF SPEED — SIGNALS.

1. A declaration for injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant must show that from the relation existing between the plaintiff and defendant a legal duty was owing from the latter to the former, the failure to discharge which caused the injury.

2. In an action by trespasser upon a railroad track to recover for injuries, the declaration must aver that after the railroad company discovered his peril it could in the exercise of ordinary care have avoided injury to him.

3. A railroad company owes to trespassers and licensees no duty of providing reasonably safe and proper appliances.

4. A railroad company owes to a trespasser upon its track no duty in regard to the rate of speed or schedule time upon which it shall run its trains.

5. Section 2900, of the Code of 1887, preserving to any person injured by a violation of the statute the right to maintain an action for injury, was designed only to preserve such right where it existed at common law, and not to give a right of action where none existed.

6. The statute requiring a railroad company to sound the whistle of its engine before reaching a crossing was not made for trespassers nor licensees, and it owes no such duty to them.

7. In actions for tort the declaration must state sufficient facts to enable the court to say upon demurrer whether, if the facts stated are proved, plaintiff would be entitled to recover.

Error to Circuit Court, Washington County.

Action by J. W. Hortenstine, administrator of W. P. Richards, against the Virginia-Carolina Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

John W. Neal and L. P. Summers, for plaintiff in error. White & Penn, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. This action was brought in the circuit court of the county of Washington by the administrator of W. P. Richards, deceased, against the Virginia-Carolina Railway Company, to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, caused, as alleged, by the negligence of the defendant company. The declaration contains seven counts, and the defendant company demurred to it and to each count thereof, which demurrers were sustained, and a final judgment rendered in favor of the defendant company. To this judgment this writ of error was awarded.

Substantially, the allegation of the first count in the declaration is that the defendant company was possessed of certain engines and cars, used and employed in carrying passengers and freight along the line of its railway in Washington county, Va., and that on the 10th day of November, 1901, the defendant company conducted itself so negligently and unskillfully in the operation of its said business as to inflict upon the plaintiff's intestate severe bodily injuries, by reason whereof he died. It is insisted that this count measures up to the requirements of a declaration in such actions, as laid down in B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Sherman's Adm'r, 30 Grat. 602, and approved in N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Harman's Adm'r, 83 Va. 553, 8 S. E. 251, Seaboard, etc., R. R. Co. v. Joyner's Adm'r, 92 Va. 354, 23 S. E. 773, and Birch- head v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 95 Va. 648, 29 S. E. 678, since by these authorities it is sufficient to set forth the cause of action in general terms, and aver that the injury was inflicted by the wrongful act, neglect, and default of the defendant.

In B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Whittington's Adm'r, 30 Grat. 805, the same judges who decided the case of B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Sherman's Adm'r, evinced an apprehension that they had gone further in that case than in principle they should have gone. The only material difference between the declarations in the two cases is that in the last named the place where the alleged negligent act was committed is designated, while in the first named it is not; and the first count in the declaration in the case at bar is in form and substance the second count in the declaration in the Whittington Case, where in the opinion by Staples, J., sustaining a demurrer to that count, it is said: "Now, whether the plaintiff's intestate was at the time a passenger on the train and received his injuries as such, or whether he was an employé of the company and was injured while engaged in its service, or whether he was a stranger crossing the track of the company's road, or whether he was on the track at all, or in the cars, or at the station, or in what manner he was injured, the declaration does not inform us. It was impossible for the defendants to learn from this declaration the grounds upon which plaintiff was proceeding. The declaration amounted to an averment, simply, that the plaintiff's intestate was injured by the negligence of the defendants in the operation of their business in using and employing their engines on their railway." And then, after stating the object of a declaration, which is too well understood to be repeated here, the learned judge continues: "It is very true that in actions for torts it is frequently sufficient to describe the injury generally, without setting out the particulars of the defendant's misconduct. In such cases great latitude of statement is allowed. But this rule does not justify a general and indefinite mode of declaring, admitting of almost any proof. * * * The learned counsel for the plaintiff insists that, if greater particularity is required in stating the cause of action, the plaintiff is liable to be defeated on the trial by a variance between the allegations and the proofs. A declaration can, however, subserve no good purpose unless it be sufficiently specific to inform the adverse party of the ground of complaint. If it is deficient in that particular, it may as well be dispensed with altogether. The plaintiff is presumed to have some knowledge of the facts upon which his action is founded. If he is in doubt as to the precise nature of the evidence, he may frame his declaration with different counts, varying his statements to meet every possible phase of the testimony."

The language just quoted applies with all of its force to the first count of the declaration here under consideration, and is inapplicable to the declaration in the Sherman Case only in one particular, viz., the fact that the declaration in the last-named case states that Sherman, the person injured, was "on the track" of the defendant at the time of his injury, while the first count in the declaration at bar utterly fails to designate where plaintiff's intestate was when he received the alleged injuries from which he died; and in this failure, at least, to designate the place, it is different from the declaration in the Sherman Case, and conforms to that in the Whittington Case.

The second count states that on the day of the alleged accident plaintiff's intestate was on a certain pump or hand car which was then and there being used on the said railroad, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant company, etc.

As remarked by counsel for the defendant company in the argument here, "This may be said of every railroad company in the state, as they all have hand cars, which are being used daily on their roads. But the duties which these companies owe to persons upon these hand cars is determined by the capacity in which they are there." In what capacity, and by what right, was plaintiff's intestate on this particular hand car on the day of the accident? Was he there as an employé of the defendant company, engaged in its business? Or was he a stranger, who was there, assuming all the attendant risks, without the knowledge and consent of the defendant company, and to whom it owed no duty, except not willfully or intentionally to injure him after discovering his peril? As to these matters the declaration is silent. While the declaration states that plaintiff's intestate was upon the hand car, it fails to state where the hand car was at the time of the accident, or that it was on the track at that time. Stress is laid in the argument for the plaintiff upon the averment that the hand car, on the day stated, was being used on the railroad with the consent of the defendant company, but the declaration nowhere states that plaintiff's intestate was on the hand car with either the knowledge or the consent of the defendant company. Consent is either expressed or implied, and it is not claimed that the consent of the defendant company to the use of the hand car was express; and, if the plaintiff intended to rely upon an implied consent, it was but fair to the defendant company that the facts to be relied on to warrant an implied consent be stated in the declaration. The relation which actually existed between the plaintiff's intestate and the defendant company at the time of the alleged injury may have been one or several, out of which different measures of duty from the defendant company would arise, and unless the duty owing, and which the defendant company failed to discharge, was a legal duty, it would not be liable for the injury. The duty must be owing to the party injured, and the declaration must show this, otherwise it is clearly demurrable. N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Wood, 99 Va. 156, 37 S. E. 846, Carson Lime Co. v. Rutherford, 102 Va. —, 46 S. E. 304.

In the first-named case (which was similar in many respects to the case at bar) the opinion by Buchanan, J., says: "It has been held in several cases by this court that it was not necessary in cases like this to aver in terms the relation which existed between the plaintiff and defendant at the time of the injury (though that is clearly the better practice), but that it is sufficient if such averments are made as to the circumstances under which the plaintiff was injured as will show the existence of the duty which it is averred has been neglected, and which neglect has caused plaintiff's injury." In other words, the declaration must show that from the relation existing between the plaintiff and the defendant a legal duty was owing from the latter to the former, the failure to discharge which caused the injury for which the action is brought, or make such averments as to the circumstances under which the plaintiff was injured as will show the existence of the duty which it is claimed has been neglected, and which neglect has caused the plaintiff's injury.

The third count in the declaration under discussion differs from the second in two particulars: (1) In the addition that on the day named, etc., plaintiff's intestate had been hurt and placed or laid on the hand car, and (2) in the omission to state that the hand car was out and being run on the defendant company's track with its consent; and this omission is material. The fact that the plaintiff's intestate had been hurt and placed on the hand car cannot enlarge the responsibility sought to be laid at the door of the defendant company, unless this fact was known to the company, and it is not averred that it was so known. It might be true that the defendant company had knowledge that the hand car was out on the day named, but at the same time it might also be true that this hand car had been taken without the company's consent, and run out on its track by reckless parties as a prank or for their amusement. If the latter were shown to be the fact, these parties were trespassers pure and simple, who were not only endangering their own lives, but the lives of all parties engaged in the business of the company in running its engines and cars, as well as passengers who may have been upon its trains, and the defendant company would have owed them only the duty it would, under the law, owe to any other trespasser upon its track. It would not have been the duty of the company to keep a constant lookout for these trespassers. If so, this lookout must have been at every foot of the progress of the train, as the company could not have anticipated that it would run upon the hand car at one point rather than another. Under the circumstances stated, the defendant company could not be held responsible for the alleged injury to plaintiff's intestate, unless it was shown that, after it discovered his peril, it could, in the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the injury. This third count of the declaration making no such averment, it is clearly demurrable.

The negligence charged in the fourth count is that it was the duty of the defendant company to have its engines equipped with ordinary and proper appliances, so that said engines could and would be under the immediate control of the engineer, whereby the said engines should not be run upon and against plaintiff's intestate, etc.

Conceding the existence of this rule, the only statement in the count that the appliances were not safe and proper is by way of recital, and not by a positive averment. Nor is there sufficient averment that the failure to have safe and proper appliances was the cause of the accident, nor that the engineer could, with proper appliances and the use of the same, have stopped the engine in question after discovering plaintiff's intestate upon the track. Had the averments, however, been sufficient to show a failure on the part of the defendant company to discharge the alleged duty, still the declaration would have been fatally defective, because it stated no fact which showed that the duty was owing from the defendant company to the plaintiff's intestate. As between a railroad company and parties bearing a certain relation to it, such as passengers and employes, there exists the duty of providing reasonably safe and proper appliances. But there exists no such duty as to trespassers, or even a bare licensee, and such a party cannot complain though the appliances be ever so unsafe. N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Wood, supra, and authorities there cited.

In support of this count, counsel for the plaintiff cite the cases of Richmond Ry. & Elec. Co. v. Garthright, 92 Va. 627, 24 S. E. 267, 32 L. R. A. 220, 58 Am. St. Rep. 839, and Thompson v. Salt L. R. T. Co. (Utah) 52 Pac. 92, 40 L. R. A. 172, 67 Am. St. Rep. 621, but all that need be said of these cases is that they are wholly unlike the case under consideration, since the accident in each occurred on the streets of a city, where pedestrians had equal rights with the railroad companies. The principles which govern that class of cases have been very fully and clearly set out in the opinion of this court by Buchanan, J., in Bass' Adm'r v. N. Ry., etc., Co., 100 Va. 1, 40 S. E. 100.

The fifth count of the declaration under consideration proceeds upon the idea that it was the duty of the defendant company not to run its engines at such an unusual rate of speed, or at a time different from the schedule of any train running in the same direction, and passing the point at which the alleged accident happened, or, if so run, it was the duty of the defendant company to have given notice of the change of running said engine, so that it should not be run upon plaintiff's intestate, etc.

When commenting upon such regulations as are referred to in this fifth count, Moncure, P., in B. & O. Ry. Co. v. Sherman's Adm'r, supra, says: "They are adopted for the convenience and safety of the defendant and those who travel upon the road as passengers in the cars of the defendant, or those who cross the road at a place where they have a legal right to cross, and not for those who may choose to walk upon the road for their own convenience or pleasure." To the same effect is N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Wood, supra.

In support of the fifth count several cases are cited, and we will review them, as far as we deem it necessary, in the order cited. As to the first (B. & O. R. Co. v. Whittington's Adm'r), it need only be said that the party injured was an employé of the defendant company. In the second (Roberts v. A. & F. R. Co., 83 Va. 314, 2 S. E. 518), the party injured was a traveler upon the highway, just about to cross the railroad track at a highway crossing, and the court rightly held it to be "negligence to run an unscheduled train at an extraordinary speed across a public highway, without signaling its approach by bell and whistle." The principles laid down in that case, as well as in the case just before it mentioned, are wholly inapplicable to the case at bar, where the party injured was where he had no right to be, or was, at most, a bare licensee. A wholly different rule as to the duty of the railroad company to the parties injured applied to the two cases named from that applicable to the case at bar. The third case cited is L. & W. R. Co. v. Hall (Ga.) 85 S. E. 159. In that case the ruling was not upon the sufficiency of the declaration, but only upon the refusal of the lower court to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant, and upon an instruction given. The sufficiency of the declaration seems not to have been called in question. The fourth and last case cited is Ashworth v. Southern Ry. Co. (Ga.) 43 S. E. 36. That case is clearly in accord with the decisions in this state as to the duty which a railroad company owes to a trespasser upon or about its property. True, it held that the rule in such cases does not relieve the company under all circumstances from anticipating the presence of a trespasser upon its property, and from taking proper precautions to prevent injury to him. The real point decided was that the petition (declaration) set forth facts which brought the case under an exception to the general rule, and should not have been dismissed on a general demurrer. It has no bearing whatever upon the sufficiency of the declaration in this case.

The sixth count in the declaration under discussion proceeds upon the idea that it was the duty of the defendant company to abstain from running its engine on the day of the injury to plaintiff's intestate, that day being Sunday, and that the running of its engine on that day was a violation of the statute—section 3801, Code 1887—whereby a right of action accrued to the plaintiff to recover damages of the defendant company by reason of section 2900 of the Code; in other words, that the defendant company is liable for the injury to plaintiff's intestate, simply because the injury was by reason of the company's engine being run on Sunday. The declaration does not state that the day named was Sunday, but merely states that it was the duty of the defendant company to abstain from running its engine on that day, and that it was so run, etc., in violation of the laws of the commonwealth. Section 3801, prohibiting the running of the engines and trains of a railroad company on Sunday in this state, contains several exceptions, and, granting that the court should take judicial notice of the fact that the 10th day of November, 1901, was Sunday, and conceding, further, for the sake of argument, that the bare violation of the statute gave the plaintiff a right of action, his declaration is still bad on demurrer, as it does not state that the defendant company, in the running of its engine and train on the day named, and which inflicted the injury to plaintiff's intestate, did not come within the exceptions contained in the statute. Section 2900 of the Code confers no new or enlarged right upon a party injured as a result of the violation of a statute. A party suing for an injury arising from an act of a defendant in violation of a statute, claiming damages, and not merely the penalty prescribed in the act, would have to allege and prove the same facts which he would have to allege and prove if the act of negligence complained of was not in violation of a statute, since the purpose of section 2900 of the Code was merely to preserve to the person injured the right to maintain his action for the injury he may have sustained by reason of the wrongdoing of another, and to prevent the wrongdoer from setting up the defense that he had paid the penalty imposed under a penal statute. Connelly v. W. U. Tel. Co., 100 Va. 51, 40 S. E. 618, 56 L. R. A. 663, 93 Am. St. Rep. 919.

The authorities cited in support of the sixth count of plaintiff's declaration, as far as we have been able to examine them, do not sustain his contention.

The seventh count of the declaration sets out the liability of the defendant company as arising out of its failure to sound the whistle of its engine, as required by statute, before reaching the crossing, near which the alleged injury to plaintiff's intestate occurred. What was said with reference to appliances, speed of train, etc., above applies here. The statute was not intended to protect all persons indiscriminately, but only those upon the highway, or who are lawfully at or near a crossing of a railroad in pursuit of their legitimate business, and intending to cross the railroad, and was not made for trespassers, or even licensees. B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Sherman's Adm'r, supra; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Wood, supra. If the view contended for by counsel for the plaintiff were correct, viz., that the duty imposed by the statute refers to all persons who, being lawfully at or in the vicinity of the crossing, may be subjected to accident and injury by the passing of engines at that place, still the declaration is fatally defective in not stating that the plaintiff's intestate was lawfully at the place of his injury, or in failing to show, from facts or circumstances stated, that he was lawfully there. No rule of pleading is better settled in this state than that a declaration must inform the defendant of the nature of the demand made upon him.

If it could be said that the first count in this declaration states that plaintiff's intestate was upon the track of the defendant company at the time of the accident, then, under the facts stated in this count, and in the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh, he was unquestionably a trespasser. And if the second count stated specifically that he had taken the hand car, or was upon it, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant company, this would be sufficient to show, so far as that count is concerned, that he was not upon the track as a trespasser, but it would not be sufficient to show that he was there with any greater rights than a bare licensee. Whether plaintiff's intestate was a trespasser or a mere licensee at the time of the accident, each count in the declaration is defective, in that it does not aver that the defendant company intentionally or willfully injured him, or that, after it saw or knew of his peril, it could have avoided injuring him. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Wood, supra.

This declaration is but an illustration of the extent to which the rule having its origin in B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Sherman's Adm'r, supra, has led the bar of this state into relying upon loose and insufficient pleading in actions of this nature. Though not unmindful that that rule has been followed or reluctantly approved by this court in the cases cited by counsel for the plaintiff, we have pointed out that the apprehension of the judges who sat in the case in which the rule had its origin, that the case had gone too far, was soon evinced in B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Whittington, supra. In N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Joyner's Adm'r, supra, the court seemed to feel constrained to approve the rule, but in truth there was no occasion to either follow or approve it, as the opinion clearly shows that the declaration in that case stated a good cause of action independent of the rule. And in Birckhead v. O. & O. Ry. Co., supra, it is apparent that the rule was sanctioned with reluctance. Be that as it may, the court, upon mature consideration, has reached the conclusion that in actions for a tort the declaration must state sufficient facts to enable the court to say upon demurrer whether, if the facts stated are proved, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover; and in so far as the rule originating in the case of B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Sherman's Adm'r, supra, impinges upon this conclusion, it is not approved, and will not be hereafter followed. This conclusion is in accordance with the established rule everywhere but in Virginia, with perhaps a few exceptions. It is imposing no hardship on a plaintiff, is but fairness to the defendant, and will at the same time, in many instances, save valuable time to the trial courts and jurors in going through trials, often of days' duration, to reach the same conclusion.

It follows that we are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment of the circuit court of Washington county, complained of in this case, and therefore it must be affirmed.

HICKS v. CITY OF BRISTOL.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—SPECIAL ASSESSMENT—CHARTER—REPEAL BY CONSTITUTION.

1. The Constitution which went into effect June 10, 1902, provides in section 170 that no city shall impose any tax or assessment on abutting landowners for public improvements, except for sidewalks and improving and paving existing alleys, or for the use of sewers. Section 117 provides that every city having at the time of the adoption of the Constitution a municipal charter may retain the same, except in so far as it shall be repealed or amended by the General Assembly, but provides that every such charter is amended so as to conform to the limitation and powers contained in the Constitution. Section 3 of the schedule of the Constitution provides that, except as modified by the Constitution, all actions and causes of action of bodies corporate or politic shall continue, and section 4 of the schedule provides that all taxes accrued or accruing to any political subdivision of the commonwealth, under laws in force, shall inure to the use of such subdivision. A city charter at the time of the taking effect of the Constitution authorized the city to pave its streets, and to determine what portion of the expense should be assessed on real estate benefited, and provided for a board of assessors to make such determination. Held, that even conceding that the phrase "all taxes," as used in the schedule to the Constitution, was broad enough to include a local assessment for paving a street, an assessment which had not been made at the time that the Constitution took effect was invalid.

Appeal from Circuit Court of City of Bristol.

Action by the city of Bristol against one Hicks. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. E. Penn, John W. Price, J. S. Ashworth, and Bullitt & Kelley, for appellant. S. V. Fulkerson, Peters & Lavender, and I. C. Byars, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. The question involved in this case is the validity of a local assessment made upon abutting lands for paving a portion of one of the streets of the city of Bristol.

The legality of the assessment is attacked upon two grounds: First: That the assessment is in violation of article 170 of the Constitution; second, that, if the assessment be not unconstitutional, the irregularities in the proceedings making it are fatal to its validity.

By section 72 of its charter (Acts Assem. 1890-1900, pp. 627, 640, c. 611), the city of Bristol was given the power, among other things, to pave its streets, and to determine what portion, if any, of the whole expense should be paid from the treasury of the city, and what portion thereof should be assessed upon the real estate which, in the opinion of the city council, would be benefited by such improvements. It was further provided that, if the council should determine at any time to make such improvements, it might order them to be made, and after the work had been completed the judge of the corporation court of the city should appoint a board of assessors to go upon the premises and levy a local assessment upon each piece of the abutting lands or lots to meet the expenses of the improvements in front of or along such real estate, as would be in proportion and according to the benefits accruing to the same by reason of the improvement for the payment of which the assessment was made. The pavement in question was completed some months prior to July 10, 1902, the time when the present Constitution of the state went into effect, paid for by the city, and assessors appointed by the corporation court to assess the benefits, if any, accruing to the abutting property owners by reason of the paving. The assessors were directed to perform their duties in accordance with a prior order of the court entered January 23, 1901. That order provided that, before levying or making the assessment required, the assessors should give notice to each of such abutting owners of the time and place they would meet, and that, after due service of the notice required, they should go upon the premises and levy a local assessment separately against each of the abutting lots of land, which would be in proportion to the benefits accruing to each lot by reason of the paving, and, where no benefits had accrued, no assessment was to be made.

On the 15th of July, 1902, the assessors gave notice, or attempted to do so (the sufficiency of the notice is denied by the plaintiffs in error), that they would meet on the 31st of that month at a certain hour and place, and proceed to levy the local assessment which they were required to make. This they did, and reported their action to the corporation court, and filed their report in the clerk's office of that court on the 3d day of November, 1902.

By the provisions of the same section (72) of the charter, any person or corporation who felt aggrieved by the report had the right to file exceptions to it. The court, after the report had been filed 10 days, could act upon it. If no exceptions were filed to the report, the court was required to confirm it, and order the assessment to be paid by the abutting owners of the lots, as their interests in the same should appear, to the treasurer of the city, within such time and on such terms as the city council might direct. If exceptions were filed to the report, the court was required to hear and determine such exceptions, and upon any question involved to hear evidence, with the right to increase or decrease the assessments if it appeared that they were not levied in proportion to the benefits to the abutting lots, and to make any correction therein which might seem equitable and just, or to recommit the report for cause. That section further provided that such assessments, when the report of the assessors was confirmed, should be a lien on the abutting lands or lots.

Exceptions were filed to the report. On the 19th of February, 1903, the court overruled the exceptions of the plaintiffs in error, and confirmed the report as to them, declared the sum assessed against each lot to be a lien thereon, and ordered the owners of the lots to pay the same, with interest thereon from November 3, 1902, in 10 annual installments; the first being payable November 4, 1903.

By section 170 of the Constitution which went into effect July 10, 1902, it is provided that "no city or town shall impose any tax or assessment upon abutting land owners for street or other public local improvements, except for making and improving the walkways upon existing streets, and improving and paving the existing alleys and for their construction, or for the use of sewers; and the same when imposed shall not be in excess of the peculiar benefits resulting therefrom to such abutting land owners."

The power to impose local assessments for paving streets was expressly prohibited by section 170 of the Constitution, and by section 117 of that instrument it is provided that each of the cities and towns of the state having at the time of the adoption of the Constitution a municipal charter may retain the same, except in so far as it shall be repealed or amended by the General Assembly, "provided that every such charter is hereby amended so as to conform to all the provisions, restrictions, limitations and powers set forth in this article, or otherwise provided in this Constitution." The effect of the provisions contained in sections 170 and 117 of the Constitution was to repeal the charter of the city of Bristol, so far as it authorized a local assessment for street paving.

"The repeal of a tax law," says Cooley on Taxation (2d Ed.) p. 21, "puts an end to all right to proceed to a levy of taxes under it, even in cases already commenced, unless the right is reserved in the repealing statute, and statutory remedies for the enforcement of a tax are gone when the statute is repealed without a saving."

The same result must follow where the authority of municipal corporations to impose a local assessment for a particular purpose has been repealed.

It is insisted that sections 3 and 4 of the schedule to the Constitution saved to the city the power to make the assessments in question.

The portion of section 3 relied on is as follows: "Except as modified by this Constitution, all writs, actions, and causes of action, prosecutions, rights of individuals, of bodies corporate or politic, and of the state, shall continue."

The only saving in the provision quoted which could by possibility, as it seems to us, have any application to the taxing power of the city, is that which declares that the "rights of * * * bodies corporate or politic * * * shall continue." Whatever may be the scope of that provision, it is clear, we think, that it was not intended to continue a right which was expressly taken away by the Constitution.

The saving relied on in section 4 of the schedule is as follows: "All taxes, fines, penalties, forfeitures, and escheats, accrued or accruing to the commonwealth, or to any political sub-division thereof, under the present Constitution, or under the laws now in force, shall, under this Constitution, enure to the use of the commonwealth, or of such sub-division thereof."

Conceding that the term "all taxes," as used in that section, is broad enough to include local assessments, the local assessments in question had neither accrued, nor were they accruing, when the Constitution went into effect. At that time they had not been assessed, and could not be without further exercise of a power which the city no longer had since the provision in its charter which conferred the power had been repealed by the Constitution.

Having reached the conclusion that the local assessments in question were invalid because in violation of the Constitution, it is unnecessary to consider the questions raised as to the regularity of the proceedings by which the assessments were made.

We are of opinion, therefore, to reverse the judgment of the circuit court, and will enter such judgment as the circuit court ought to have entered, dismissing the proceedings against the plaintiffs in error.

VIRGINIA & S. W. RY. CO. v. CLOWERS' ADM'X.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

RAILROADS—MASTER AND SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS—CONSTITUTIONAL RULE—LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEER AND TELEGRAPH OPERATOR.

1. Const. § 162, in effect relaxing the stringency of existing precedents as to fellow servants, in the interests of employes of railroad companies, is not to be strictly construed, but the true method of construction is to discover the intention of the framers of the Constitution.

2. Const. § 162, declares that a servant employed by a railroad company, and engaged in any work in the operation of an engine, shall be entitled to recover for injuries sustained because of the negligence of any one charged with dispatching trains or transmitting telegraphic or telephonic orders therefor. Held, that a railroad company is liable to a locomotive engineer for injuries caused by the failure of a telegraph operator to transmit an order sent out from the train dispatcher's office in regard to the movement of trains.

Error to Corporation Court of Bristol.

Action by W. B. Clowers' administratrix against the Virginia & Southwestern Railway Company. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Bullitt & Kelley and D. D. Hull, for plaintiff in error. H. G. Peters, W. F. Rhea, and E. Lee Twinkle, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This is an action of trespass on the case, brought by the administratrix of W. B. Clowers against the Virginia & Southwestern Railway Company, to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate by the defendant company. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $5,000, the judgment upon which is the subject of review.

It is conceded that plaintiff's intestate, who was a locomotive engineer in the employment of the defendant company, lost his life in a collision between two of the trains of that company, occasioned by the failure of its telegraph operator at Big Stone Gap to transmit or deliver an order sent out from the train dispatcher's office at Bristol to the conductor of one of the colliding trains. The single question therefore presented for decision is, were the telegraph operator and the engineer fellow servants, in contemplation of section 162 of the Constitution of Virginia?

The trial court instructed the jury that "if they believed from the evidence that the operator of the defendant company failed to deliver the message to the conductor on the train coming from Big Stone Gap to Bristol, and that by reason thereof the accident resulted which caused the death of plaintiff's intestate, then they should find for the plaintiff."

The instruction, it will be observed, was equivalent to telling the jury that plaintiff's intestate and the telegraph operator were not fellow servants, within the meaning of section 162. Counsel admit that prior to the promulgation of the Constitution, July 10, 1902, the parties would have been declared fellow servants, under the decisions of this court, and there could not have been a recovery against the company upon the facts of this case. The controlling question, then, is whether or not the telegraph operator falls within any of the exceptions of section 162, taking him out of the category of fellow servant of plaintiff's intestate.

"The doctrine of fellow-servant, so far as it affects the liability of the master for injuries to his servant resulting from the acts or omissions of any other servant or servants of the common master, is to the extent hereinafter stated, abolished as to every employee of a railroad company, engaged in the physical construction, repair or maintenance of its roadway, track or any of the structures connected therewith, or in any work in or upon a car or engine standing upon a track, or in the physical operation of a train, car, engine, or switch, or in any service requiring his presence upon a train, car or engine; and every such employee shall have the same right to recover for every injury suffered by him from the acts or omissions of any other employee or employees of the common master, that a servant would have (at the time when this Constitution goes into effect), if such acts or omissions were those of the master himself in the performance of a non-assignable duty: provided, that the injury, so suffered by such railroad employee, result from the negligence of an officer, or agent, of the company of a higher grade of service than himself, or from that of a person, employed by the company, having the right, or charged with the duty, to control or direct the general services or the immediate work of the party injured, or the general services or the immediate work of the co-employee through, or by, whose act or omission he is injured; or that it result from the negligence of a co-employee engaged in another department of labor, or engaged upon, or in charge of, any car upon which, or upon the train of which it is a part, the injured employee is not at the time of receiving the injury, or who is in charge of any switch, signal point, or locomotive engine, or is charged with dispatching trains or transmitting telegraphic or telephonic orders therefor; and whether such negligence be in the performance of an assignable or non-assignable duty. The physical construction, repair or maintenance of the roadway, track or any of the structures connected therewith, and the physical construction, repair, maintenance, cleaning or operation of trains, cars or engines, shall be regarded as different departments of labor within the meaning of this section. Knowledge, by any such railroad employee injured, of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, appliances or structures, shall be no defence to an action for injury caused thereby. When death, whether instantaneous or not, results to such an employee from any injury for which he could have recovered, under the above provisions, had death not occurred, then his legal or personal representative, surviving consort, and relatives (and any trustee, curator, committee or guardian of such consort or relatives) shall, respectively, have the same rights and remedies with respect thereto as if his death had been caused by the negligence of a co-employee while in the performance as vice-principal, of a non-assignable duty of the master. Every contract or agreement, express or implied, made by an employee, to waive the benefit of this section, shall be null and void. This section shall not be construed to deprive any employee, or his legal or personal representative, surviving consort or relatives (or any trustee, curator, committee or guardian of such consort or relatives), of any rights or remedies that he or they may have by the law of the land, at the time this Constitution goes into effect. Nothing contained in this section shall restrict the power of the General Assembly to further enlarge, for the above-named class of employees, the rights and remedies hereinbefore provided for, or to extend the rights and remedies to, or otherwise enlarge the present rights and remedies of, any other class of employees of railroads or of employees of any person, firm or corporation."

The defendant company insists that inasmuch as the foregoing section tends to increase the common-law liability of railroad companies, it ought to be strictly construed, and that, when so construed, it leaves unchanged the relations which previously existed between these employees. Whatever may be said of the soundness of that proposition with respect to the construction of statutes in derogation of the common law, the rule has no application to remedial provisions of a Constitution ordained for the obvious purpose of relaxing the stringency of existing precedents in the interest of employees engaged in the dangerous occupation of constructing, maintaining, and operating railroads. The constitutional convention, in its wisdom, has deemed it salutary and just to employees to modify the common-law fellow-servant doctrine so as to meet the exigencies arising from changed conditions in modern railroading. Under such circumstances it is the duty of the courts to give effect to that policy, rather than to defeat it by resort to narrow and technical rules of construction. The true purpose of construction is, at least, to discover the intention of the framers of the Constitution, and to promote the objects for the attainment of which that instrument was ordained; and, to that end, a fair interpretation must be given to the language employed, construing the words in their ordinary and popular acceptance, unless it clearly appears that they were intended to be used in some other sense. When language is plain and its meaning obvious, there is no room for construction. The popular rule for the exposition of a Constitution is thus stated by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations:

"It is also a very reasonable rule that a state Constitution shall be understood and construed in the light and by the assistance of the common law, and with the fact in view that its rules are still left in force. By this we do not mean that the common law is to control the Constitution, or that the latter is to be warped and perverted in its meaning, in order that no inroads, or as few as possible, may be made in the system of common-law rules, but only that for its definitions we are to draw from that great fountain, and that, in judging what it means, we are to keep in mind that it is not the beginning of law for the state, but that it assumes the existence of a well-understood system which is still to remain in force and be administered, but under such limitations and restrictions as that instrument imposes. It is a maxim with the courts that statutes in derogation of the common law shall be construed strictly—a maxim which we fear is sometimes perverted to the overthrow of the legislative intent—but there can seldom be either propriety or safety in applying this maxim to Constitutions. When these instruments assume to make any change in the common law, the change designed is generally a radical one; but as they do not go minutely into particulars, as do statutes, it will sometimes be easy to defeat a provision, if courts are at liberty to say that they will presume against any intention to alter common law further than is expressly declared. A reasonable construction is what such an instrument demands and should receive, and the real question is what the people meant, and not how meaningless their words can be made by the application of arbitrary rules." Cooley on Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) p. 94.

In light of these principles, this court has no difficulty in expounding that part of section 162 applicable to the case in judgment. The clause, in terms, abolishes the fellow-servant doctrine, so far as it affects the liability of the master for injuries to his servant resulting from the acts or omissions of a co-employee "charged with dispatching trains or transmitting telegraphic or telephonic orders therefor." The object of train dispatching is to place in the hands of conductors who manage the trains of the company proper and safe orders for their guidance. The source of such orders is the office of the train dispatcher, from which they emanate, and their destination is the hand of the conductor of the train whose movements they are intended to direct and control. The order is in transitu from the time it leaves the one until it reaches the other, and every agent of the company through whose hands the order passes is necessarily engaged in its transmission until it reaches its ultimate destination. There can be no reason for holding, under the language of this provision, that a train dispatcher is not a fellow servant of the trainmen to be affected by the order, but that a telegraph operator, through whom the order is to be transmitted to the conductor, and the trainmen are fellow servants. Each constitutes part of a conduit through which the order is transmitted from its source to its destination, and the omission of either to discharge his important function defeats that object. The purpose of the provision is to hold the company responsible for the consequences of the negligence of its agents in dispatching trains or transmitting orders, and there is nothing in the language employed to justify the contention of the company that no operator on the line, except the dispatcher in the train dispatcher's office, is charged with the duty of dispatching trains or transmitting telegraphic orders therefor.

If "transmitting orders" for the movement of trains were synonymous with "dispatching trains," then there would have been no necessity for the use of both terms in the connection in which they occur. Nor is any authority adduced in support of the proposition that "transmitting" an order is to be construed to mean transmitting it by telegraph only. To subject the provision to that restricted interpretation would not only do violence to the language used, but would also defeat the manifest object of the framers of the Constitution. The clause means what the words import, and includes all agents of the company whose duty it is to transmit telegraphic or telephonic orders for the movement of trains to the conductors of such trains, no matter what instrumentalities may be employed to accomplish that purpose. It would be a vain thing for the framers of the Constitution to protect trainmen against the negligence of a train dispatcher, and leave them exposed to the carelessness of other agents of the company, through whom the train dispatcher's orders must be transmitted before reaching their final destination.

WHEBY et al. v. MOIR et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 18, 1904.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—GROUNDS OF INVALIDITY—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—APPEAL—JURISDICTION.

1. To set aside a sale as fraudulent as to creditors, it must be alleged and proved that the sale was made with intent to defraud, of which intent the buyer had knowledge.

¶ 1. See Fraudulent Conveyances, vol. 24, Cent. Dig. §§ 10, 498.

2. Evidence in a suit to set aside a sale of a stock of merchandise and other goods as fraudulent towards creditors examined, and held insufficient to charge the buyer with knowledge of the seller's fraudulent intent.

3. Where, in a suit to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent as to creditors, the various sums decreed against the purchaser in favor of several creditors exceed in the aggregate the amount necessary to confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court of Appeals, the appeal by the purchaser will not be dismissed because the sum due to the parties summoned as appellees is less than $500, where there is a general appearance by counsel for appellees; and, in the absence of such general appearance, the court will direct process to issue against the parties not served.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Roanoke.

Suit by one Moir and others against Jabborien E. Wheby and another. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendant J. E. Wheby appeals. Reversed.

Edward Lyle and S. H. Hoge, for appellant. H. T. Hall, for appellees.

KEITH, P. The appellees filed their bill in the corporation court of the city of Roanoke, in which they alleged that Charles Wheby had for some time past been conducting a general merchandise store in that city; that they had extended credit to him upon the faith of goods contained in his store; and that on June 18, 1902, he and his wife executed a deed of bargain and sale to one Jabborien Elias Wheby of all their stock of merchandise and other goods and chattels. The alleged consideration for this deed was the sum of $1,053.39, cash in hand, the receipt of which was acknowledged. The bill alleges that the said conveyance of June 18, 1902, is fraudulent, and that no part of the consideration mentioned was paid; that it was executed for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of Charles Wheby, and especially the complainants, in the collection of their debts—a fraud of which the said Jabborien Elias Wheby had knowledge and in which he participated.

The defendants answered, and admitted the purchase and sale of the stock of merchandise, goods, and chattels; alleged that it was for a valuable consideration paid in cash; and denied that it was made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of Charles Wheby in the collection of their debts, but, on the contrary, alleged that the several articles enumerated in said conveyance were sold in good faith for a valuable consideration, and without fraudulent intent.

Numerous depositions were taken, and the case came on to be heard before the corporation court, which decreed that the sale of the stock of goods referred to in the bill be set aside and annulled, as made with intent to hinder and delay the creditors of Charles Wheby. From that decree the purchaser, Jabborien Elias Wheby, obtained an appeal.

It is settled by the decisions of this court that, where fraud is relied upon to set aside a conveyance, it must be plainly averred and distinctly proved. In this case it was necessary to aver and prove that Charles Wheby executed the bill of sale of the merchandise and other goods and chattels which passed by his deed of the 18th of June, 1902, with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, of which intent the vendee, Jabborien Elias Wheby, had knowledge.

It may be conceded that Charles Wheby, the vendor, was actuated by the intention to defraud his creditors, but the proof is wholly insufficient to bring home knowledge of such purpose to his vendee. The vendor and vendee are brothers, and form part of a colony of Syrians living in the city of Roanoke, most of whom appear to be engaged in merchandising. Jabborien was a peddler. He seems to have been industrious and frugal. The percentage of profit from the business in which he was engaged is believed to have been large. His expenses were insignificant. The evidence which he adduces is to be found in the testimony of those with whom he had business transactions. They are people of his own race and nation, whose manners, habits, customs, and methods of business are very different from ours. They speak our language imperfectly, and appear to understand it with difficulty. It cannot be denied that these circumstances place them somewhat at a disadvantage. It is true that this may work both ways, and that, while it may render it more difficult for them to establish the truth of a transaction, if it be a fair one, it, on the other hand, renders more difficult the discovery of fraud, where it has been perpetrated. They come before this court, however, attended by all the presumptions of innocence. We cannot assume their guilt because they are strangers, nor condemn them as dishonest because they are ignorant of our language, our customs, and our laws.

The proof is that the whole of the purchase money was paid in cash in the presence of witnesses, and the individuals are named from whom Jabborien Wheby collected the several sums which, added together, made up the price he paid for the goods. There is no evidence that he knew that Charles Wheby was indebted, or that he entertained the purpose of defrauding his creditors. There are slight circumstances of suspicion. They appear to have taken unusual precautions with reference to the execution of the conveyance, and the inventory and transfer of the possession of the goods which passed under it, and it is argued that men engaged in an honest transaction do not anticipate the accusation of fraud. It is true that "the wicked flee when no man pursueth," but, on the other hand, the absence of witnesses might have subjected them to the imputation that there was something to conceal. In our opinion, the testimony falls far short of that probative force which is necessary to establish a fraud.

Upon the merits of the case, therefore, we are of opinion that the hustings court erred in setting aside as fraudulent the deed of June 18, 1902.

It is claimed on the part of appellees that the case is not properly before this court, because the sum due to the parties who have been summoned as appellees is less than $500, which was necessary to give this court jurisdiction at the date when the appeal in this case was allowed.

The decree appealed from is copied into the petition for appeal. It appears from an inspection of that decree that the several sums decreed against the appellant aggregated more than $500, and it is conceded that, under the decisions of this court, it had jurisdiction to entertain this appeal if the process had been issued against all of the creditors named in the decree appealed from. When the petition and record were presented to the judge of this court, and the appeal awarded, its effect was to bring up for review the entire record, so that any error to the prejudice of appellant might be corrected, and, if it were necessary to protect appellant in the enjoyment of this right, we would now direct process to issue against those parties upon whom it has not been heretofore served, in order that what is at most an omission on the part of the clerk might be corrected; but counsel, by entering a general appearance for appellees, have obviated the necessity for this, all of the appellees having identical interests in this controversy.

We think the motion to dismiss should be overruled, and, this court proceeding to enter such decree as the hustings court ought to have entered, it is ordered that the decree complained of be reversed, and the bill of complainants be dismissed, with costs to the appellant.

RAMEY v. COUNTS.

(102 Va. 902)

INJUNCTION—CUTTING OF TIMBER—POSSESSION OF PLAINTIFF.

1. Upon an application for an injunction to restrain a defendant from trespassing upon land or cutting timber therefrom, the plaintiff must either allege that he is in possession, or allege a state of facts that he is entitled to the injunction without being in possession, or that he has pending an action to recover possession, or is about to institute such an action, in which last case the court will enjoin until the right of possession is determined.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wise County.

Bill by B. C. Ramey against R. L. Counts. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bond & Bunce, for appellant. Alderson & Alderson and Bullitt & Kelley, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. The bill in this case alleges that the appellant, B. C. Ramey, is the owner in fee simple of a valuable tract of land in Wise county, containing about six or eight acres; that said land is covered with very valuable timber, and that recently the appellee, R. L. Counts, had gone on the land, and was then cutting and removing the timber therefrom; that he had already removed timber to the value of at least $250; and that, unless he was enjoined and restrained from cutting and removing timber from the said land, irreparable injury would result to the appellant. Following these brief allegations, the prayer of the bill is that the appellee and his agents and employes be enjoined and restrained from further going upon said land, or cutting and removing the timber therefrom, that judgment be given against the appellee for the value of the timber already removed, and that all such general relief be granted as to equity might seem proper.

In accordance with the prayer of the bill, an injunction was granted on the 5th of March, 1903, enjoining and restraining the appellee, his agents and employes, from going upon the tract of land mentioned in the bill, and from cutting and removing the timber, or otherwise trespassing thereon, until the further order of the court. Thereupon the appellee filed his demurrer to the bill, assigning, among others, the following grounds in support thereof: That the bill does not allege that the complainant is in possession of the land, and does not allege that he has brought an action of ejectment or other possessory action to obtain possession of the same, and does not allege that the defendant is not in possession thereof. On the 9th of April, 1903, the cause was heard upon the bill and demurrer, upon consideration whereof the court sustained the demurrer, and dissolved the injunction theretofore granted.

The sole question presented by this appeal is, did the circuit court err in sustaining the demurrer to the bill?

The bill is very meager with respect to the allegations usually made in such cases. Practically the only allegation is that appellant is the fee-simple owner of the land, and that irreparable injury will be done him unless the appellee is enjoined.

Upon an application for an injunction to restrain a defendant from going upon land or cutting timber thereon, the plaintiff must either allege that he is in possession, or allege a state of facts showing that he is entitled to the injunction without being in possession. Or he must allege that he has pending an action to recover possession, or is about to institute an action to recover such possession, in which latter case the court will enjoin until the right of possession is determined. Daniell's Ch. Pr. p. 1632; Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 43 S. E. 164, 94 Am. St. Rep. 895; Callaway v. Webster, 98 Va. 790, 37 S. E. 276.

The rule that the plaintiff must allege possession in a case like this can work no delay or hardship, for if he is not in possession, and has the right of possession, he can immediately institute his action of ejectment to recover the possession, and, under the authorities, base his right to an injunction upon the pendency of that proceeding in which the right of possession is to be determined.

Without undertaking to consider all of the grounds of demurrer relied on, we are of opinion that the failure of the appellant to allege that he was in possession of the land, or to allege any special circumstances showing his right to an injunction without being in possession, was sufficient to sustain the action of the lower court, and for this reason the decree appealed from must be affirmed.

RATLIFF v. RATLIFF et al.

CHANCERY PRACTICE—BILL OF INTERPLEADER—WITNESS—COMPETENCY—DESCENT OF REALTY—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—CURTESY.

1. One who has been induced by a party to convey land to him which on the face of the contract belonged to others, and is threatened with suit in consequence of this act, may, in a suit to enforce his vendor's lien, convene all parties in interest, and have their respective rights determined and the deed reformed.

2. A witness otherwise incompetent is made competent for all purposes if called by the other party to the litigation.

3. An equitable interest in real estate descends just as a legal estate.

4. One who has conveyed land to another to defraud his creditors is estopped from denying the validity of the conveyance.

5. A husband is not entitled to curtesy in the statutory separate estate of his wife, which he has created for her benefit without reservation of his marital rights.

Keith, P., and Cardwell, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Washington County.

Action by John B. Hamilton against M. S. Ratliff and others. From the decree, M. S. Ratliff appeals. Reversed.

Daniel Trigg and L. P. Summers, for appellant. White & Penn and M. H. Honaker, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. In the fall of 1886 John B. Hamilton executed to Lucinda Ratliff and John R. Ratliff, one of her sons, a title bond for a tract of land near Abingdon, Va., in consideration of $6,500, of which $3,000 was paid in cash; the residue being evidenced by the joint bonds of the vendees. On the 11th of January, 1887, for reasons satisfactory to the parties, this title bond and deferred purchase-money bonds were surrendered to Hamilton, an additional $1,000 paid on the purchase, and a new title bond executed by Hamilton to Lucinda Ratliff and Floyd A. Ratliff, another son, which acknowledges the receipt of $4,000 in cash; it being provided that the residue of the purchase money should be paid in four equal annual installments, evidenced by the notes of Lucinda and Floyd A. Ratliff, and providing that the vendor should execute a good and sufficient deed as soon as the land was run off and the notes delivered. The grantee, Lucinda Ratliff, died in the fall of 1887, leaving her husband, M. S. Ratliff, and 11 children surviving her. On the 9th of February, 1891, Floyd A. Ratliff assigned to his father, M. S. Ratliff, all interest that he might have under and by virtue of the contract or title bond; the consideration for this assignment being that the assignee should pay the balance of purchase money then due on the land, amounting to $1,816. This assignment expressly provides that it shall not apply to the interest of the assignor in the land as one of the heirs of his mother, Lucinda Ratliff.

On September 4, 1896, John B. Hamilton, the vendor in the title bond, without the knowledge or authority of the heirs of Lucinda Ratliff, conveyed the land in question to M. S. Ratliff, the husband and father of the vendees named in the title bond, reserving a vendor's lien for a small balance of purchase money, amounting to $362.46. After this deed was recorded, Hamilton, being informed that the heirs of Lucinda Ratliff would contest his right to make the deed to their father, M. S. Ratliff, filed his original bill, seeking to enforce the payment of the balance of the purchase money due to him, and convening all the parties, in order that the deed might be reformed in accordance with their respective rights. Subsequently an amended bill was filed, bringing in additional parties and repeating the allegations of the original bill. To these bills M. S. Ratliff filed his demurrer and answer; denying in general terms that the land was sold to Lucinda Ratliff, and insisting that all the negotiations leading up to the purchase were alone with him, and that the entire purchase money was paid by him from his own resources. Subsequently J. M., J. R., and F. A. Ratliff, three of the adult heirs of Lucinda Ratliff, filed their answers, asking that they be treated as cross-bills, in which they assert that the land in question was bought and paid for by their mother, Lucinda Ratliff, and that the deed from Hamilton to M. S. Ratliff was without authority, and praying that it be set aside and the heirs of Lucinda Ratliff restored to their rights under the title bond. M. S. Ratliff filed his demurrer and answer to these cross-bills, reiterating the position taken in his answer to the original and amended bills—that the land was bought and paid for with his own means and belonged to him.

The circuit court held that M. S. Ratliff could not defeat the rights of the heirs of Lucinda Ratliff under the title bond of January 11, 1887, and that the deed from Hamilton to M. S. Ratliff was without authority and must be set aside. The court further held that M. S. Ratliff was entitled to the interest bought by him from F. A. Ratliff under the assignment mentioned of February 9, 1891, the nature and extent of which were fully known to him; that under this assignment he was entitled to an undivided interest in the land, in the proportion that $1,816, the balance of purchase money which he then agreed to pay, bore to $6,500, the whole purchase money agreed to be paid for said land. From this decree M. S. Ratliff has appealed.

The first assignment of error is to the action of the court in overruling the demurrer of appellant to the original and amended bills.

John B. Hamilton had, upon the inducement of the appellant, made him a deed to land which on the face of his contract belonged to other parties. He was threatened with suit in consequence of this act, and we are of opinion that, in a suit to enforce payment of his vendor's lien, he had a right to convene all parties in interest, and to ask a court of equity to determine their respective rights in the land, and, if necessary, to set aside the deed he had made, and direct to whom the land should be conveyed. The bill, in addition to seeking a satisfaction of the balance of the purchase money, was in the nature of a bill of interpleader, convening adverse claimants in order that the complainant, who occupied the position of a disinterested stakeholder, might be saved harmless. We are therefore of opinion that the demurrers to the original and amended bills, and also to the cross-bills, were properly overruled.

A further assignment of error is to the action of the court in not excluding the testimony of John R. and F. A. Ratliff.

John R. Ratliff was not a party to the contract or title bond which is the subject of dispute. This contract was with Lucinda Ratliff and F. A. Ratliff. Besides, M. S. Ratliff, an adverse party, having been examined for himself, John R. was thereby made competent, if otherwise incompetent. As to F. A. Ratliff, if he were incompetent, having been called as a witness by M. S. Ratliff, he was made competent for all purposes.

The fifth and sixth assignments of error seem to assert the proposition that even though Lucinda Ratliff may have been entitled to the land in question, or a part thereof, still, as she died without having the legal title thereto, her interest was not descendible to her heirs. This position is without merit. An equitable interest in real estate descends just as a legal estate.

The remaining assignments of error call in question the respective rights of the parties in and to the land in controversy.

It appears from the record that prior to the purchase of the land in question the appellant and his family lived in Tazewell county, and that he and his wife, between them, owned in Tazewell and Buchanan counties considerable real estate, the title to the greater part of which was in his wife. Although the title to these lands was in Lucinda Ratliff, the appellant insists that, as a matter of fact, they belonged to him. His explanation of the title to these lands being in his wife, and of the title bond for the Hamilton land being in her name, is stated in his deposition as follows: "Me and Gordon Rife had been in the mercantile business and failed, and we compromised with our creditors, and give a deed of trust on our property—each one on our separate properties. Each one was to pay his half of the indebtedness, and, upon doing so, was to be released from the other. It was recorded in Buchanan county. The courthouse was burned, and those papers was burned; and I paid my part of the indebtedness, and Mr. Rife never paid any of his, and for that reason I was afraid that I would have to pay unjust money, and that was the reason why I had that bond drawn the way I did." In answer to a subsequent question with respect to the Buchanan lands, he says: "I had them conveyed to my wife because I was afraid I would have some of Gordon Rife's debts to pay." Lucinda Ratliff derived part of the lands in Tazewell county from her father's estate. It is very clear from the pleadings and evidence in the cause on behalf of the appellant that such of said lands as she held the title to at his instance and request were conveyed to the wife for a fraudulent purpose. The appellant cannot now rely upon his own wrong to defeat the title of the wife to the Tazewell and Buchanan lands, which had been conveyed to her. He would, in effect, be asking the court to interfere, and by its decree to relieve him from the consequences of his own fraud. This a court of equity will never do. The authorities speak with one voice on this subject. Harris v. Harris, Ex'r, 23 Grat. 737; Garner v. Second Nat. Bank, etc., 151 U. S. 420, 14 Sup. Ct. 390, 38 L. Ed. 218.

Section 2458 of the Code (1887) provides that "every bond or other writing given with intent to delay, hinder or defraud creditors, purchasers, or other persons, or from what they are or may be entitled to, shall as to such creditors, purchasers, or other persons, their representatives or assigns, be void." This section, as well as the unvarying decisions of this court, however, declares that, as between the parties, such a writing shall be binding and valid. Harris v. Harris, supra.

So that the lands in Tazewell and Buchanan counties which had been conveyed to Lucinda Ratliff at the instance and request of the appellant belonged to her, and her heirs are entitled to an interest in the Hamilton land to the extent that it was paid for with the proceeds of the sale of their mother's land in Tazewell and Buchanan counties, whether derived from her father, or conveyed to her at the instance and request of the appellant.

Lucinda Ratliff and F. A. Ratliff were co-tenants under the title bond of January 11, 1887, executed by Hamilton for the land in question; each being, as between themselves, bound for one-half of the purchase money. Under the assignment by F. A. Ratliff of February, 1891, the appellant took his assignor's shoes, and became a tenant in common with the heirs of Lucinda Ratliff, and is entitled to an interest in the land to the extent that he has paid the purchase money. Grove v. Grove, 100 Va. 556, 42 S. E. 312. It was therefore error in the court to limit the interest of the appellant to the extent of the unpaid purchase money due at the date of the assignment.

It is impossible to determine from the record what proportion of the purchase money for the land in controversy was paid with the proceeds of the sale of the real estate, the title to which was in Lucinda Ratliff. It is evident that the first payment of $3,000 came from that source, for it was evidenced by the check of the purchasers of her land, which was payable to Lucinda Ratliff, and by her indorsed to John B. Hamilton, her vendor. It is also quite clear that $632.16 of the second payment of $1,000 came from that source, for it was a check of the same purchasers of her land, and went to the credit of John B. Hamilton in bank on the same day that the cash payment of $1,000 was made. Further than this, however, we are unable to go without danger of doing injustice. The case must be referred to a commissioner, to ascertain what part of the land in controversy was paid for from the proceeds of the sale of the real estate of Lucinda Ratliff, and what proportion was paid for by the appellant, taking any additional evidence that may be necessary to facilitate the inquiry, and upon the coming in of that report the court can determine and fix the interest in the land of each of the parties to this controversy.

There are two assignments of cross-error under rule 9. The first of these is disposed of by the views already expressed. The second is that the court erred in holding that the appellant was entitled to curtesy in that portion of the land which belonged to the heirs of Lucinda Ratliff.

The lands in Tazewell and Buchanan counties, the title to which was in Lucinda Ratliff, constituted a separate statutory estate, except the land derived from her father; and, when the proceeds of those lands was reinvested under the title bond executed by Hamilton to Mrs. Ratliff, the lands thus acquired continued to be her separate statutory estate. This court has held that a husband is not entitled to curtesy in the equitable separate estate of his wife which he has created for her benefit; that he is excluded by the nature of the transaction. Jones v. Jones, Ex'r, 96 Va. 749, 32 S. E. 463. We are of opinion that the reasons given in the case cited for excluding the husband from curtesy in the equitable separate estate which he has created with equal force deny his right to curtesy in lands that he has conveyed or caused to be conveyed to her without reservation of his marital rights, where such lands constitute, as in the case at bar, statutory separate estate. See note to Jones v. Jones' Ex'r, supra, found in 4 Va. Law Reg. 821, 822, by the author of Burk's Separate Estates. We are therefore of opinion that the appellant was not entitled to curtesy in such of the Tazewell and Buchanan lands as were conveyed to Lucinda Ratliff by her husband, or by others at his instance and request, and hence is not entitled to curtesy in that part of the Hamilton lands paid for with the proceeds of such lands.

For these reasons the decree complained of must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

CARDWELL, J. (dissenting). The doctrine that a litigant will not be heard to assert his own wrong to defeat a right claimed by another, or to defend a right he claims against the right claimed by another, has, in my judgment, no application to this case. If, in point of fact, M. S. Ratliff intended to perpetrate a fraud upon his creditors in putting the title to the lands in question here, or those in Tazewell and Buchanan counties, in his wife, Lucinda Ratliff, which were sold in her lifetime, and the proceeds of which sales went into the purchase of the lands here in question, and his wife knew of his wrongful intent and participated in it, then she is, with respect to the transactions, equally guilty, and the maxim, "In pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis," applies to her. If, on the other hand, she was ignorant of his wrongful purpose, but did not in fact furnish any portion of the purchase money, she and those claiming under her are mere volunteers. As such, they are in the attitude of plaintiffs seeking specific performance of a contract—a relief which is never granted except to a plaintiff who stands upon a contract supported by a valuable consideration. In this case the legal title is in the husband, and rightly in him, to the extent that the consideration emanated from him. He asks nothing except to be let alone. Neither courts of law nor equity have jurisdiction to punish the actors in a fraudulent transaction by force of the maxim invoked in the opinion of the court. All that the courts can do is to withhold all aid in the enforcement of such contracts. Here the husband asks nothing at the hands of the court, but stands upon his legal right as the holder of the legal title, and that position should prevail until it is assailed by some one with a better equity. A volunteer has not only no better equity, but he has no equity whatever. I think the inquiry directed by the court is too narrow. The transactions should be probed to the bottom, and all the facts brought to light. Let it be made to appear who paid for the Tazewell and Buchanan lands, and then, with full knowledge of the entire case from its inception, the court will be in a position to balance the equities between the parties, and with confidence determine their respective rights.

From so much of the opinion of the court, therefore, as narrows the inquiry to be made upon the case going back to the circuit court so as to exclude inquiry as to who in fact paid the purchase money for the Tazewell and Buchanan lands, I dissent.

PARDEE v. COMMONWEALTH.

TAXATION—MINERAL LAND.

1. Under the act approved May 13, 1903, providing for special and separate assessment of taxes on mineral land, the same are to be assessed as of the 1st day of February, in accordance with the general scheme of the statutes regulating taxation.

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Application by Calvin Pardee to correct an assessment on certain mineral land. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

R. T. Irvine and Bullitt & Kelley, for plaintiff in error. W. W. G. Dotson, for the Commonwealth.

WHITTLE, J. This was an application by appellant, Calvin Pardee, to the circuit court of Wise county, under section 3 of an act of the General Assembly, approved May 13, 1903, entitled "An act to provide for the special and separate assessment of taxes on mineral lands and on the improvements, fixtures, and machinery thereon," to correct an erroneous assessment of improvements on certain mineral land of appellant situated in that county.

It appears that prior to December, 1902, the land in question was unimproved, but at that time appellant commenced the erection of a coal and coke plant upon the property, and had expended thereon, up to and including the month of July, 1903, the following amounts:

In December, 1902.....	$ 2,215 15
In January, 1903.....	2,506 35
In February, 1903.....	4,293 90
In March, 1903.....	7,533 44
In April, 1903.....	19,041 07
In May, 1903.....	24,100 96
In June, 1903.....	10,001 83
In July, 1903.....	21,724 15

Total $91,416 85

It also appears that similar improvements in that county are assessed at from 60 to 70 per cent. of the money actually expended upon them.

The circuit court, by the order complained of, sustained the action of the commissioner of the revenue in assessing these improvements for the year 1903 at $80,000.

The contention of appellant is that, according to the proper construction of the act in question, he was only assessable for that year with $4,721.50, the aggregate amount invested in improvements up to and including February 1st, at which date the ownership of property, both real and personal, is ascertained, and the value of improvements determined, for taxation under the general revenue law of the commonwealth.

The act was passed in pursuance of section 172 of the Constitution, and section 1 reads:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Virginia as follows: The several commissioners of the revenue in this state shall, on or before the first day of August, 1903, and every second year thereafter on or before the fifteenth day of May, specially and separately assess at the fair cash value all mineral lands, and the improvements, fixtures, and machinery thereon, within their respective districts, and shall enter the same on the land books of their respective districts separately from other lands charged thereon, and shall extend the taxes upon said lands, improvements, fixtures and machinery, assessed as aforesaid, at the rate fixed by law upon tangible property." Acts 1902-03-04, p. 320.

It will be observed that, whereas this statute provides for biennial assessments of mineral lands, other lands are only assessed every fifth year. Code 1887, § 437; Acts 1902-03-04, p. 610. While the provision for more frequent assessments of that species of property is doubtless due to the circumstance that mineral lands are at present in process of development and rapidly enhancing in value, there is nothing in the enactment calling for a construction which would result in the establishment of one period of the tax year for ascertaining the ownership and value of mineral property, and a different period for determining the same facts with respect to other property. Such an interpretation could serve no wise purpose, but would tend to introduce elements of uncertainty and inequality into a system which, according to the spirit of the Constitution, should be homogeneous and uniform. In some instances the construction adopted by the commissioner and approved by the court would leave the question as to whether one person or another should be chargeable with taxes on property for any particular year to the caprice of the commissioner. Thus, where land had changed ownership between February 1, and August 1, 1903 (May 1st in subsequent years), the commissioner could impose the burden on the vendor or vendee, at his election.

Again, in the case at bar, it was the duty of the commissioner to assess the cash in the hands of appellant on February 1, 1903. Subsequently that same money was expended in improving appellant's mineral land, and on July 25th the commissioner assessed the improvements also. Unless the language of the act is imperative, a construction leading to such results ought not to be adopted. According to the uniform interpretation placed upon the revenue laws of this state, February 1st, the day which separates one tax year from another, has been fixed upon as the time for ascertaining the ownership and value of property for taxation, and a departure from that rule can only result in confusion and inconvenience.

The order appealed from is therefore erroneous, and must be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings to be had therein in conformity with this opinion.

ASHWORTH et al. v. TRAMMELL.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1904.)

ESTOPPEL—SET-OFF—DECREE—FINAL—DEBTOR'S RIGHT TO SATISFY—COSTS—INTEREST.

1. Circumstances which do not mislead one to his prejudice do not create an estoppel in his favor.

2. A losing party is properly required to pay the costs of the litigation.

3. A purchaser of judgments against a person who died subsequent to the date of their rendition is not entitled to have them allowed against a demand due from the purchaser to the decedent arising out of a purchase of property, and secured by a lien thereon.

4. A decree confirming a sale of property to enforce a lien of a deed of trust to the creditor therein, as purchaser, which adjudged that the cash payment should be paid to prior lienors, which, after providing for costs, credited the balance of the price on the debt of the creditor in the deed, which gave a decree against the debtor for the residue, which appointed a commissioner to convey the land to the purchaser, which directed a writ of possession to issue, and which extended to the debtor the privilege of filing an upset bid in 30 days, is a final decree, speaking from the day of its rendition, subject to become inoperative on the debtor availing himself of the privilege given him.

5. As a general rule, interest will not be allowed on amounts recovered as costs.

6. A decree adjudging that a debtor is indebted to the amount therein stated, and directing a sale of property subject to a lien for that amount, which is suspended for 60 days to allow time for an appeal therefrom, gives the debtor 60 days in which to satisfy the demand of his creditor and thus obviate a sale of the property.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Bristol.

Suit by one Trammell against M. J. Ashworth and others. From a decree for complainant, defendants appeal. Modified.

John W. Price and A. H. Blanchard, for appellants. H. G. Peters, W. H. Sutherland, A. B. Whitaker, and Bailey & Byars, for appellee.

KEITH, P. This is a sequel to the case of Trammell v. Ashworth et al., which was decided by this court in June, 1901, and is reported in 99 Va. 646, 39 S. E. 593. The cause was remanded to the corporation court of the city of Bristol to ascertain the liens upon certain real estate, and to its decree upon that subject this appeal was allowed.

The first error assigned is to the lien reported in favor of the administratrix of Rives Walker for the sum of $316. This debt had its origin in a note given for the purchase of property by Mrs. M. J. Ashworth to Rives Walker, who assigned one-half of it to William H. Trammell to pay a debt due him of $350. There was an arrangement between Trammell and M. J. Ashworth, the debtor, with respect to one-half of this note; but there is no evidence that the balance due Walker after the payment of his note to Trammell had ever been paid by any one, and the commissioner was fully justified in finding it to be a valid and subsisting obligation.

The circumstances relied upon by M. J. Ashworth as creating an estoppel with respect to the collection of that half of this demand which was not actually paid by her is wholly without merit, as she has been in no degree misled to her prejudice.

Nor is there any merit in the contention that there is no pleading by Walker or his administratrix upon which relief can be given them with respect to this debt. Rives Walker offered to file an amended and supplemental answer and cross-bill, but the court very properly declined to allow him to do so, because under the pleadings and decrees in the cause as it stood, all the rights of Walker or his administratrix could be settled and reported upon by the commissioner.

Nor is there any merit in the contention of M. J. Ashworth with respect to the imposition of costs. She was the losing party, and was properly required to pay the cost of the litigation.

It is assigned as error that certain judgments against Rives Walker which had been assigned to M. J. Ashworth were not allowed her as set-offs against the judgment in favor of Rives Walker reported in this cause.

When a party relies upon this plea, the set-off must be in such a condition and of such a character as that the court may appropriate it to the demand. Now, when these judgments were assigned, Rives Walker was dead, and his estate had passed into the hands of his administratrix. His creditors were only entitled to be paid upon a settlement of the estate, and that could not be done in this suit. Nor would it be reasonable or just to delay the parties to this litigation, to await the termination of an independent suit brought for the administration of Rives Walker's estate, and for the ascertainment of the amount which his creditors, upon a settlement, would be entitled to recover against his administratrix. The idea of having such a settlement in this suit cannot for a moment be entertained. The inconvenience and delay would be intolerable.

In Robnett's Adm'r v. Mitchell et al., 101 Va. 762, 45 S. E. 287, it was held that where a creditor comes in under an order for an account of debts against a decedent's estate, and proves a debt upon which a third person is jointly bound with the decedent, such third person is not a necessary party to the suit, as no relief is there sought against him, and it is not the practice of the courts, nor is it the policy of the law, to encumber suits for the administration of assets of decedent's estates with collateral issues affecting the adjustment of equities between persons having no privity with many of the other creditors. In that case the court refused to require a joint debtor to be made a party, because of the delay and inconvenience which would result from that practice.

In Wytheville Crystal Ice, etc., Co. v. Frick Co., 98 Va. 141, 30 S. E. 491, quoted with approval in the case just cited, it is said: "If these persons were made defendants, any liens on their lands would have to be ascertained, which, upon the same principle, would compel the making of any other persons parties defendants who were defendants to judgments constituting liens on their lands, thereby adding new parties from time to time without end, at the expense and delay of the creditor, and to the great prejudice of his rights."

These decisions are cited as being in some degree analogous to the case under consideration, and as illustrating the inconvenience, delay, and injustice which would inevitably result if this court were to require the parties to wait for a settlement of the estate of Rives Walker, in order to furnish appellant the proof of set-off. There was no error in refusing to permit the judgments against Rives Walker's estate to be set off against the demand in this cause made by his administratrix.

Among the debts reported is one in favor of the National Mutual Building & Loan Association for $372.31, with interest from May 10, 1898. It appears there was a bill pending in the circuit court of Washington county, brought by the building and loan association against M. J. Ashworth, to enforce the lien of a deed of trust. The property covered by this deed was sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the debt secured, leaving a balance over and above due by M. J. Ashworth of $372.31. The circuit court of Washington county confirmed the sale to the trust creditor, decreed that the cash payment should be paid to the prior lienors, and, after providing for costs, credited the balance of the purchase price on the debt of the purchaser, and gave a decree against M. J. Ashworth for the residue, appointed a commissioner to convey the land to the purchaser, and directed a writ of possession to issue, with the privilege extended to M. J. Ashworth to file an upset bid within 30 days. That decree was final. It disposed of all matters in controversy, and left nothing to be decided by the court. As a matter of grace to M. J. Ashworth it gave her 30 days within which to file an upset bid. Had she availed herself of that privilege, the case would have been reopened and the decree would have been inoperative; but this she did not do, and the decree against her speaks from the date of its rendition, on the 10th of May, 1898. It therefore has priority over the judgment in the name of Kendrick against Ashworth, which was rendered on the 10th day of June, 1898.

Among the judgments reported is one in favor of the National Mutual Building & Loan Association against M. J. Ashworth for $210.91, with interest from July 18, 1895. The exception with respect to this judgment is to the allowance of interest upon it. The principal of the judgment is for the costs adjudged against M. J. Ashworth in this court, and we are of opinion that it was error to allow interest upon it.

Said Judge Roane in McRea v. Brown, 2 Munf. 46: "The general principle is that costs are considered as an appendage to the judgment, rather than a part of the judgment itself; that they are considered, in some sense, as damages, and are always entered, in effect, as an increase of damages by the court. This doctrine is to be found in 3 Blackstone's Com. 399. I presume it was on the ground of this general principle that this court reversed the judgment in the case of Hudson v. Johnson, which gave damages on the costs, for, as costs are in the nature of damages, and damages and interest are considered in some sense as the same, it might seem that the judgment gave, in effect, interest upon interest, or compound interest, which has been always highly discountenanced by the courts and the Legislature."

In Baum v. Reed, 74 Pa. 322, Justice Agnew, of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, said: "It is certainly the settled general rule in this state that costs do not bear interest. The best evidence of this is the universal practice of indorsing executions. On the fi. fa. or other writ the debt is stated, followed by the date from which interest is to be computed, and then come the costs, without date of interest. Such is the mode of indorsement, no matter how many years have elapsed from the entry of the judgment. Even after a revival of the judgment the same practice is pursued; the first costs being marked as on the original, and the second as on the scire facias."

There are cases in which interest will be allowed upon costs. An instance of this kind will be found in Shipman v. Fletcher's Adm'r, 95 Va. 585, 29 S. E. 325. But under the circumstances of this case, we are of opinion that interest should not have been computed.

The decree appealed from does not, in terms, give the defendant a day in which to pay the sums decreed against her, but directs the property to be sold. At the instance of the defendants, however, the operation of this decree was suspended for 60 days to allow them time to present a petition for an appeal. Doubtless, if they had asked for a suspension, in order that they might have opportunity to raise the money and pay the debts, it would have been gladly afforded the defendants, and would have obviated the necessity for the suspension granted them in order to make application to this court. The court might well have thought that, having suspended the operation of the decree for 60 days, it was unnecessary to say that the defendant might within the 60 days pay the debt. The effect was the same. The decree during the time of its suspension remained a dead letter, and, whether given in the one form or the other, gave to the defendant the same benefit and afforded her the same opportunity to satisfy the demands of her creditors, and to obviate the necessity for a sale. To reverse the decree upon this ground would indeed be to stick in the bark.

As we have discovered no error in the decree appealed from, except with respect to the allowance of interest upon the judgment for costs, we shall amend it in that respect; and, it appearing that the appellees have substantially prevailed in this court, the decree will be affirmed, with costs.

HENINGER v. PEERY et al.

HIGHWAYS — ESTABLISHMENT — OBJECTION — BURDEN OF PROOF — COMPENSATION TO LANDOWNER — DAMAGES.

1. Where landowners are summoned under Code 1887, § 949, relative to the establishment of public roads, and providing that, on the favorable report of the viewers, if the court be in favor of establishing the road, it shall award process to summon proprietors to show cause against the establishment of the road, the burden of proof is on the landowners to overcome the prima facie case made by the report of the viewers.

2. Where, on proceedings for the establishment of a public road, it appears that it will be free and common to all citizens, it is a public road, notwithstanding it will be a greater benefit to the applicant than to the public generally.

3. Under Code 1887, § 1078, relative to the establishment of public roads, and providing that a landowner whose land is taken shall receive compensation for the land taken, and for the damage to the residue beyond the peculiar benefits to be derived in respect to the residue, the benefits are to be confined to such as are direct and peculiar to the landowner, as distinguished from those benefits shared by him in common with other citizens.

4. Code 1887, § 1078, provides that, on the laying out of a public road, a landowner whose land is condemned shall receive just compensation for the land taken, and for the damage to the residue of the tract beyond the peculiar benefits to be derived in respect to such residue. Held, that where the object of a road over the lands of an individual was to enable others to reach mountain lands for grazing purposes, and the road extended no farther than the grazing lands, and afforded the landowner no outlet in that direction, and the necessities of his own land were already provided for by a private road, the allowance to him of damages in a sum not sufficient to enable him to protect his property by the erection of fences along the sides of the public road—he having, over his protest, been subjected to the inconvenience of a pent or gated road—was erroneous.

Error to Circuit Court, Bland County.

Proceedings instituted by Thomas E. Peery and others for the establishment of a public road through the lands of Samuel T. Heninger. A judgment of the circuit court affirmed an order of the county court establishing the road, and Heninger brings error. Reversed.

S. W. Williams and J. H. Fulton, for plaintiff in error. A. A. Phlegar, for defendants in error.

WHITTLE, J. This is a writ of error and supersedeas to an order of the circuit court of Bland county affirming an order of the county court of that county establishing a public road through the lands of plaintiff in error, Samuel T. Heninger.

It appears that the defendant in error Thomas E. Peery, one of the original applicants for the road, is the owner of 822 acres of land on Chestnut Ridge, in that county, which, with several adjoining tracts, is entirely isolated from any public road; the proprietors being dependent upon the sufferance of other landowners for ingress and egress to and from their respective properties. Peery had been accustomed to drive his cattle over the lands of Heninger to his own land, but in the year 1898 the latter prosecuted, and procured a fine to be imposed upon, an employé of Peery for trespassing upon his premises in the manner indicated. Thereupon Peery and others, who were thus debarred from the only practicable approach to their lands, instituted these proceedings for the establishment of the road in controversy. Viewers were appointed from time to time, all of whom reported favorably to opening the proposed road; but, with the exception of the last report, approved and confirmed by the order complained of, all these reports were quashed.

From the confirmed report it appears that the road will extend 568¾ poles through the lands of Heninger, 208¼ poles of which distance is traversed by a private road constructed and maintained by him for his own convenience and at his own expense. The viewers further report that if the road should be established as provided by statute—that is to say, 30 feet wide and without gates—Heninger would, in their judgment, be damaged to the amount of $250, but that a road 15 feet wide, with gates at all necessary points, would meet the present necessities of the public as well as the applicants; and, if such a road or gated way be established, the damage to Heninger would, in their judgment, be $100, for the land taken and necessary gates, but that the remainder of the land would not be damaged in excess of the benefits accruing to Heninger from the establishment of the road.

While a number of errors are alleged in the proceeding, the three following are all that the court deems it necessary to notice:

1. The first assignment is to the action of the trial court in requiring Heninger to introduce his evidence in the first instance.

It is a rule of practice of universal application that the litigant upon whom the burden of proof rests must open the evidence. In this case the report of the viewers had satisfied the court that the road ought to be established, unless cause was shown to the contrary; otherwise it would have been unnecessary to summon the landowners, as provided by section 949 of the Code of 1887. By express terms of the statute, the contestant is summoned to show cause against the report; and, if none be shown, and no evidence is adduced, nothing further remains for the applicant to do, and the report is confirmed and the road established. This necessarily brings the contestant within the influence of the rule adverted to, and casts upon him the burden of overcoming by satisfactory proof the prima facie case made by the adverse report of the viewers. The question is controlled by the case of Mitchell v. Thornton, 21 Grat. 104. See, also, Cranford Paving Co. v. Baum, 97 Va. 503, 24 S. E. 906. The first assignment is therefore without merit.

2. Upon the second assignment it is contended that the case involves the condemnation of private property for private use, which, of course, is not permissible.

The circumstance that the road will be of greater benefit to the applicants than to the public generally is not the criterion in such case. Indeed, that fact might be affirmed of all mere "neighborhood roads." "The test is not simply how many do actually use them, but how many may have a free and unrestricted right in common to use them." Elliott on Roads & Streets, § 192. "If it is free and common to all citizens, then, no matter whether it is or is not of great length, or whether it leads to or from a city, village, or hamlet, or whether it is much or little used, it is a public road." Id. § 11.

As was said in Lewis v. Washington, 5 Grat. 265: "No limitation to the power of the county court to establish a road is to be found in the degree of accommodation which it may afford to the public at large. That is a matter which addresses itself, not to the authority, but the discretion, of the court."

A cognate question to the one involved has recently received the consideration of this court in the case of Zircle v. Southern Ry. Co., 102 Va. —, 45 S. E. 802.

3. The third and last assignment assails the report on the grounds that the compensation allowed the contestant is inadequate, and the method of arriving at the amount fixed was illegal.

Under the Virginia statute two elements enter into the question of remuneration to a party whose private property is condemned for a public road, namely, just compensation for the land actually taken, and also a fair recompense for damage to the residue of the tract beyond the peculiar benefits to be derived in respect to the residue of the land from the road to be established. Va. Code 1887, § 1078. But the benefits contemplated by the statute to be considered in reduction of damages in condemnation proceedings are confined to such as are direct and peculiar to the owner of the land, as distinguished from those which are shared by him in common with other citizens. Mitchell v. Thornton, supra; Ry. Co. v. Foreman, 24 W. Va. 673.

Subjected to that test, it is apparent from a careful consideration of the record that Heninger has not received adequate compensation for the injury that will be inflicted upon him by the sequestration of his property for public use. The object of the road is to enable Peery and others to reach their mountain lands, chiefly for grazing purposes. The road extends no farther, and affords no outlet to Heninger in that direction. The necessities of his own land are already provided for by the private road. So far, therefore, from deriving peculiar benefits from the establishment of the proposed road, it is obvious that it must entail upon him serious injury and inconvenience. Confessedly, he has not been allowed a sum sufficient to enable him to protect his property by the erection of fences along the sides of the public road, but, over his protest, he has been subjected to the inconvenience of a pent or gated road (a perpetual menace to the security of his crops and stock), and has been improved out of all compensation in damages for the infliction of this manifest injury to his property upon the erroneous and unsustained theory that he will be the recipient of direct and peculiar benefits from the construction of the road. The court recognizes the expediency and wisdom of the rule that great weight is to be allowed to the report of the commissioners to assess damages in condemnation proceedings. Cranford Paving Co. v. Baum, supra. Nevertheless, where it plainly appears that the report is based upon a false premise, and the commissioners have omitted an essential element affecting the amount of compensation to which the landowner is entitled, it will not hesitate to quash the report for that reason, and appoint a new commission to reassess the damages.

The report in the case in judgment is amenable to the objection indicated, and on that ground the order confirming it is erroneous, and must be reversed and annulled, and the case remanded to the circuit court of Bland county for further proceedings to be had therein not in conflict with this opinion.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS.

CRUMLEY v. STATE. (Supreme Court of Georgia. May 10, 1904.) Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge. James Crumley was convicted of a crime, and brings error. Affirmed. J. R. Williams, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Ausley, Jr., Sol., for the State.

EVANS, J. No error of law is alleged to have been committed, and the evidence was sufficient to authorize the verdict, which is approved by the trial judge. The judgment overruling the motion for a new trial is affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

BATTERY PARK BANK v. MADISON COUNTY COM'RS. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 3, 1904.) Appeal from Superior Court, Madison County; E. B. Jones, Judge. Action by the Battery Park Bank against the commissioners of Madison county. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed. T. S. Rollins and Gudger & McElroy, for appellants. Frank Carter and H. C. Chedester, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The facts in this case are substantially the same as in Jones v. Commissioners, 47 S. E. 753; the only difference being that the plaintiff here alleges that he holds $722 of the scrip issued by the county for necessary expenses, and for which he wishes county bonds, and in Jones v. Commissioners the plaintiff held bonds which are not yet due, but which he wished refunded in new bonds. Whatever distinction this may make in the rights of the plaintiff, if any, our decision in Jones v. Commissioners is not based upon such difference, but upon the fact that chapter 289, Laws 1903, is not mandatory, and places the issuance of bonds in the discretion of the board of county commissioners, who are merely "authorized and empowered" to make such issue. For the reasons given in that case, the judgment herein, which peremptorily orders bonds issued to the plaintiff, is likewise reversed.

CONNOR, J. (dissenting). This is a controversy submitted without action, under section 567 of the Code, upon an agreed state of facts. The plaintiff is a corporation. The county of Madison is indebted to divers and sundry persons, including the plaintiff, in a sum aggregating $70,000 or thereabouts, as nearly as the parties can ascertain, said indebtedness consisting (1) of bonds of said county issued under and by virtue of chapter 398, p. 696, Pub. Laws 1887, and not yet due, amounting to $25,000 or thereabout, and (2) of the present floating debt of said county, incurred for the necessary expenses thereof prior to January 1, 1903, all of which is past due and bears interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, amounting to about $45,000; this last-named item including an indebtedness to the plaintiff of $722.93, as nearly as the parties can ascertain, of which sum $500 is principal, and bears interest from the date hereof until paid at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. The aforesaid debt and claim of the plaintiff against said county has been duly presented to and passed upon by the special board of audit created by section 7, c. 289, Pub. Laws 1903, and by said board has been duly proved, declared, and reported to be a valid, subsisting obligation of said county, and to be past due, and to have been contracted for the necessary expenses of said county prior to January 1, 1903. The General Assembly of North Carolina at its session of 1903 passed an act entitled "An act to liquidate and settle the outstanding indebtedness of Madison county, and to authorize the issue of a series of bonds for the purpose of paying off the floating debt, old bonds, etc., contracted for the necessary expenses of said county." Pub. Laws 1903, p. 490, c. 289. At a special session held on April 20, 1903, the defendant board of commissioners made the following order, as the same appears on the minutes of said board: "Whereas, the General Assembly of North Carolina for the year 1903 passed an act authorizing the board of commissioners of Madison county to issue bonds in an amount not exceeding $75,000 to pay off all the debt of said county contracted prior to the first day of January, 1903, for the necessary expenses of said county: Therefore be it resolved by the board that this county issue its bonds to an amount sufficient to pay off the said debt, not to exceed $75,000, and to issue the amount audited as found by the auditing board. It is further ordered that notice be issued to all creditors of said county to present their claims for audit before said board of audit authorized by said act, on the 28th day of May, 1903, so that the same may be passed upon as required by said act; thirty days' notice to be given of the time and place of meeting of said board of audit." Thereafter, to wit, at their regular meeting in May, 1903, the said defendant board of commissioners made the following order, as the same appears on the minutes of said board: "Ordered by the board that the order made at its called session of April 20, 1903, authorizing the issue of bonds, be, and the same is hereby, revoked; and it is further ordered that no bonds be issued under the recent bonding act passed by the last Legislature relative to Madison county." The plaintiff has demanded of the defendants that they issue the bonds authorized by the above-recited act of 1903, and place the same in the hands of the treasurer of said county, pursuant to the provisions of said act, which the said defendants have failed and refused to do. The court, upon the foregoing state of facts, ordered and adjudged that the defendant board of commissioners and W. L. George, chairman of said board, and V. B. Davis, register of deeds, execute and issue the bonds of said county authorized by the said act, in accordance with the terms and provisions of said act of 1903, and that said bonds be delivered to the treasurer of Madison county to be held and disposed of, and the proceeds thereof applied by him in the manner and for the purposes declared, defined, and specified in the said act, and that a peremptory writ of mandamus be issued to that end. From this judgment the defendants appealed.

The preamble of chapter 289, p. 490, Laws 1903, is as follows: "The General Assembly of North Carolina do enact: Whereas, by an act of the General Assembly of North Carolina, Public Laws 1887, chapter 398, hereinafter referred to, the commissioners of Madison county were authorized to issue the bonds of the county, not to exceed the sum of $25,000, bearing interest at 6 per cent. payable semiannually, and in conformity with the said act, the board of commissioners of Madison county issued the bonds of the said county, amounting in all to $21,000, with coupons attached; and whereas, the said bonds are now an outstanding indebtedness against said county, and the said county will not be able to pay the principal of the same at maturity; and whereas, it is to the best interest of the taxpayers of the said county that the said bonds shall be renewed, before their maturity, by refunding the same at a lower rate of interest than 6 per cent., and also that the present floating debt of the said county, incurred for the necessary expenses thereof prior to the first day of January, 1903, together with all accrued interest due at the date of payment or refunding, be liquidated and funded by issuing a new series of bonds to cover the same and to embrace the entire debt of said county incurred for the necessary expenses, as it existed on January 1, 1903, with the interest thereafter accruing." It is thereupon enacted that the board of commissioners "are hereby authorized and empowered to issue coupon bonds," etc., "that said bonds become payable on the 1st day of June, 1903, and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent., payable semiannually, and that they be issued only to liquidate outstanding bonds and for the necessary expenses of said county incurred prior to January 1, 1903, with accumulated interest." Provision is then made for the form of said bonds, and authority given to levy a special tax to pay the interest and principal when the same become due. By section 7 of said act a special board of audit is created to scrutinize, examine, and adjust, and report to the said board, all bonds, claims, and debts contracted by the said county prior to January 1, 1903, which are still outstanding, unsettled, and unliquidated. Said board is required to report to the county board of commissioners all such claims, bonds, etc., as shall be audited and allowed by them. The findings of the board of audit are made conclusive in regard to the purpose for which the said bond was issued or debt contracted. Section 9 of said act provides that immediately after its ratification the chairman of the board of commissioners shall advertise in some newspaper published in the county of Madison, and at the courthouse door in said county, for 30 days, the place and time when and where the said board of audit shall sit, and require all persons holding debts against said county incurred prior to January 1, 1903, to present the same before said board of audit. The board of commissioners are authorized to retire all of the outstanding bonds issued under chapter 398, p. 696, Pub. Laws 1887, with the interest due thereon, at their par value, and pay off and discharge all of the outstanding indebtedness of the said county incurred for the necessary expenses thereof prior to January 1, 1903, as herein provided, by selling so many of the bonds issued under this act as may be necessary for such purpose, and by applying the proceeds thereof to the liquidation of such bonds so retired and of such debts. Said bonds shall sell for not less than their par value. It is made the duty of the board of commissioners to place the bonds, when issued, in the hands of the treasurer of the county, whose duty it shall be to sell the same and to place the proceeds as set out in the act. It is further provided that if any creditor of said county, whose debts or claims come within the meaning of this act, or any holder of any bonds of said county, shall desire to exchange his bonds, coupons, or other evidence of said indebtedness, it shall be the duty of said commissioners to pay off the said creditors and liquidate the said indebtedness in the bonds authorized by this act, exchanging said bonds at their par value and canceling the evidences of indebtedness taken in lieu thereof. All of the bonds issued under this act shall be exempt from county and municipal taxation. Provision is then made for the special taxes provided for. It is further provided that if any officer of the county shall apply the proceeds of any bonds issued under this act, or exchange any such in any other manner or for any other purpose, or shall issue any more of the bonds than shall be necessary for the specific purposes of this act, or shall fail and refuse to perform the duties imposed upon him by the provisions of this act, he shall be guilty of a felony. By section 19 it is enacted that, if the bonds are issued, the board of commissioners of the county shall not levy a specific tax, as authorized by section 8, c. 822, p. 469, Laws 1901, but shall levy a tax on property and polls to pay the interest on the bonds, etc.

After careful consideration and examination of this record, and of the authorities cited by the counsel and my own investigation, I am constrained to differ from the majority of the court in the conclusion reached by them. I would be content to express my dissent, without saying more; but the reasoning upon which the judgment of the court is based is so variant from my views, and, as I think, with all possible deference, from sound legal principles and authority, that it seems proper and becoming to set forth the result of my thoughts and investigation upon the very important questions involved. To my mind the principles underlying the decision of the case are of vital importance in the administration of our state and county government. My strong convictions upon the subject must be my excuse for incumbering the record with my dissent. The questions presented by the record may be stated as follows: (1) Does chapter 289, p. 490, of the Acts of 1903 impose upon the defendant board of commissioners the duty to issue the bonds and dispose of the proceeds, when sold, as directed by the terms of the statute? (2) If so, is it within the power of the Legislature to impose such duty and to make its performance mandatory? (3) Will the court by mandamus compel the performance of such duty? The plaintiff maintains that an affirmative answer should be given to each of these questions, and its claim for relief is based upon this contention. That the questions may be considered free from complications, it will be well to keep in view the admitted and essential facts as they appear in the record. The indebtedness of Madison county, which is included in the provisions of the act, may for the purpose of this discussion be thus classified: (1) The bonds issued pursuant to the act of 1887, maturing in 1907; (2) the accrued and past-due interest on said bonds; (3) the present floating debt incurred for the necessary expenses of said county prior to January 1, 1903, and past due. The plaintiff's debt falls within the third class. It will be observed that by section 7 of the act a special board of audit is created, the members thereof named, and its duties prescribed. Neither the existence of this board nor its procedure is dependent upon any action of the defendant board of commissioners. On May 30, 1903, the special board, in strict compliance with the provisions of the statute, met, and the plaintiff's claim, together with others, was "presented, proved, and allowed." It was also ascertained and declared by the said board that the plaintiff's claim was "for the necessary expenses of the county incurred prior to January 1, 1903." The action of the board was duly reported to the defendant board of commissioners, as prescribed by the act. Demand has been made by the plaintiff that the bonds be issued and other proceedings had as provided by the statute. Thus we have fixed by admission of the defendant a valid indebtedness, incurred for the necessary expenses of the county, etc.

Has the Legislature commanded the payment of this debt by the means prescribed by the statute, or has it left to the discretion of the commissioners the payment of the said debt in the manner directed? The defendant says that the language of the statute is permissive, and not mandatory; that the words "hereby authorized and empowered to issue the bonds," etc., exclude the idea that it was the purpose of the Legislature to impose any duty or to require the issuance of the bonds, unless in the exercise of their discretion the defendant commissioners see fit to do so. The principle by which the courts have been guided in construing statutes containing the terms used by the Legislature, or other terms of similar import, was first announced in Rex v. Barlow, 2 Salk. 609, which the case states was an "indictment on St. 14 Car. II, c. 12, against church wardens and overseers for not making a rate to reimburse the constables. Exception was taken that the statute only puts it in their power to do so by the word 'may,' but does not require the doing of it as a duty, for the omission of which they are punishable. Sed non allocatur; for where a statute directs the doing of a thing for the sake of justice or the public good, the word 'may' is the same as the word 'shall'; thus St. 23 Hen. VI, says the sheriff may take bail; this is construed he 'shall.'" This case has been cited as authority, and the principle announced uniformly approved. In King v. Inhabitants of Derby, Skinner, 370, the report of the case is as follows: "Moved to quash the indictment against divers inhabitants in Derby for refusing to meet and make a rate upon the several parishes in Derby, to pay the constables' tax, first, because they are not compellable, but the statute only says that they 'may,' so they have their election, and no coercion shall be. Non allocatur; for 'may,' in the case of a public officer, is tantamount to 'shall,' and if he does not do it he shall be punished upon an information, and though he may be commanded by a writ, this is but in aggravation of his contempt." In Regina v. Tithe Commissioners, 14 Q. B. 459, Mr. Justice Coleridge, construing an act conferring power on the defendant, says: "The words undoubtedly are only empowering, but it has been so often decided as to become an axiom that in public statutes words only directory, permissive, or enabling may have a compulsory force when the thing to be done is for the public benefit or in advancement of public justice." "Permissive words in respect of courts or officers are imperative in those cases in which the public or individuals have a right that the power so conferred be exercised. Such words, when used in a statute, will be construed as mandatory for the purpose of sustaining and enforcing rights, but not for the purpose of creating a right or determining its character. They are peremptory when used to clothe a public officer with power to do an act which ought to be done for the sake of justice, or which concerns the public interest or the rights of third persons." Sutherland on Statutory Construction, 597. The principle is thus stated in Endlich on Int. of St. § 311: "There is, therefore, abundant authority for the proposition that such powers as are here under consideration are invariably imperative, and that it is the duty of those to whom they are intrusted to exercise them whenever the occasion contemplated by the Legislature arises; and having regard to this implied duty, the enabling or facultative terms in which the power may be couched, such as 'it shall be lawful,' are to be regarded merely as the usual mode of giving a direction, as importing that it shall not be lawful to do otherwise than as directed." McCrory, Circuit Judge, in Ralston v. Crittenden, 13 Fed. 508, thus states the rule of construction: "Even if the terms of a statute are permissive only, and mean no more than the words generally employed in statutes importing a grant of authority or power to a public officer to do a certain act, still it is well settled that all such acts are construed as mandatory, whenever the public interests or individual rights call for the exercise of the power conferred." In Supervisors v. U. S., 4 Wall. 435, 18 L. Ed. 419, the language of the act was: "May, if deemed advisable, levy a special tax," etc. Swayne, J., says: "The counsel for the respondent insists with zeal and ability that the authority thus given involves no duty, that it depends for its exercise wholly upon the judgment of the supervisors, and that judicial action cannot control the discretion with which the statute has clothed them. We cannot concur in this view of the subject." The judge cites the English cases and concludes: "These are the earliest and the leading cases upon the subject. They have been followed in numerous English and American adjudications. The rule they lay down is the settled law of both countries. * * * The conclusion to be adduced from the authorities is that where power is given to public officers in the language of the act before us, or in equivalent language, whenever the public interests or individual rights call for its exercise, the language used, though permissive in form, is in fact peremptory. What they are empowered to do for a third person, the law requires shall be done. The power is given, not for their benefit, but for his. It is placed with the depository to meet the demand of right and to prevent a failure of justice. It is given as a remedy to those entitled to invoke its aid and who would otherwise be remediless. In all such cases, it is held that the intent of a Legislature, which is the test, was not to devolve a mere discretion, but to impose 'a positive and absolute duty.'" In Galena v. Amy, 72 U. S. 705, 18 L. Ed. 560, the charter provided that the city council "may, if the said city council believe that the public good and best interests of the city require, annually collect a tax," etc., "for the payment of the funded debt of the city," etc., and the court said that "this power has not been exercised by the city authorities and they have made no other provision for liquidating the debts due to the relator. They have no other means of payment in possession or prospect. * * * The rights of the creditor and the ends of justice demand that it should be exercised in favor of affirmative action, and the law requires it. In such cases, the power is in the nature of a trust for his benefit, and it was the plain duty of the court below to give him the remedy for which he asked, by awarding a peremptory writ to compel the imposition of the tax." In People v. Supervisors, 51 N. Y. 401, the board of supervisors were "authorized and empowered" to hear and determine certain claims against the county and to provide for their payment. Earle, J., says that "the first question to be determined is whether this act was merely permissive or mandatory to the board of supervisors. * * * This relief would be quite illusory, if it were left to the absolute discretion of the board of supervisors of any county to refund the taxes or not, as they might see fit. * * * The purpose of the act, as well as the simplest justice, requires that we should hold that it is mandatory upon the respective boards of supervisors, unless there is something in the plain language used that forbids such a construction. The words 'authorized and empowered' are usually words of permission merely, and generally have that sense when used in contracts and private affairs; but, when used in statutes, they are frequently mandatory and imperative." After examining the cases he says: "These authorities are abundant to show that the language used in the act under consideration must be construed to be imperative." In People v. Supervisors, 68 N. Y. 114, the language of the statute was "that the said board 'may in their discretion' cause the tax to be levied." The same learned justice, speaking of the right of the creditor, says: "He has rendered a service for the public, for which he expects to be paid, and for which he ought to be paid, either by the town or the county. * * * Under such circumstances he goes to the Legislature, and it, knowing, as we are bound to believe, the facts, passes an act for his relief. The relief might be quite illusory if it was intended to leave it to the debtors to say whether they would pay or not. No act was necessary to enable the supervisors to pay for this bridge if they were willing to. * * * Hence it cannot be supposed that it was the intention of the Legislature simply to confer a permissive authority to do what they could do without the act, if willing. * * * Here was something directed to be done for the sake of justice, and in such a case the word 'may' is generally construed to mean 'shall.' See, also, Siford v. Morrison, 63 Md. 14. Smith, C. J., in Johnston v. Pate, 95 N. C. 68, says: "The term 'may' is often construed as mandatory when the statute is intended to give relief"—citing Rex v. Barlow, supra, and Mason v. Pearson, 9 How. 248, 13 L. Ed. 125, in which Mr. Justice Woodbury said: "Without going into more details, these cases fully sustain the doctrine that what a public corporation or officer is empowered to do for others, and it is beneficial to them to have done, the law holds he ought to do." Upon the foregoing unbroken line of authorities, which, if necessary, might be extended to almost every jurisdiction in the Union, it is clear that the language of this statute should be construed as mandatory. In the preamble of the act, the conditions existing in respect to the indebtedness of Madison county are recited, which are admitted in this record to be true. We have a debt contracted for the necessary expenses of the county, which it was the duty of the defendant commissioners to pay. The payment of this debt was demanded by every possible consideration. Public justice, the interests of the people of the county, and the rights of the creditor combine to demand relief. With all deference to the majority of the court, I think no stronger case could be presented for the application of the principle which has been recognized as controlling the courts of England and America.

It must be conceded that the second question presented by the appeal is more difficult of solution. I cannot think that it should be answered by the suggestion that the power is not vested in the Legislature, for that, "if the Legislature had this power, a casual majority could practically confiscate all property in any county by directing the issue by counties named in the respective acts of large amounts of bonds and at an excessively high rate of interest, regardless of the wishes of the taxpayers of such county." It is not necessary to cite authority to show that the Legislature has no power to compel or authorize a county to issue a single bond "regardless of the wishes of the taxpayers," except for necessary expenses. Smathers v. Commissioners, 125 N. C. 480, 34 S. E. 554. What constitute "necessary expenses" has been very clearly defined by this court. It is not easy to perceive how, in the light of the constitutional restrictions as construed by this court, the recognition of the power asserted in this act can bring about such disaster to the people. I most respectfully, but firmly, dissent from a canon of construction of the Constitution based upon the apprehension that the chosen representatives of the people of this state may not be trusted to discharge the duty imposed upon them by the Constitution, or be loyal to the trust reposed in them. We must look to the Constitution alone to find what powers are granted by the people to their agents. If the asserted power is granted, we may not, without doing violence to that instrument, prevent its exercise by indulging in grave apprehensions that it may be abused. The courts may declare what power they have granted, but they will hold their agents responsible for the manner in which it is exercised. The language of Black, C. J., in Sharpless v. Mayor, 21 Pa. 147, 59 Am. Dec. 759, must commend itself to the heartiest approval: "The great powers given to the Legislature are liable to be abused. But this is inseparable from the nature of human institutions. The wisdom of man has never conceived of a government with power sufficient to answer its legitimate ends and at the same time incapable of mischief. No political system can be made so perfect that its rulers will always hold it to its true course. In the very best, a great deal must be trusted to the discretion of those who administer it. In ours, the people have given large powers to the Legislature, and relied for faithful execution of them on the wisdom and honesty of that department, and on the direct accountability of the members to their constituents. There is no shadow of reason for supposing that the mere abuse of power was meant to be corrected by the judiciary. There is nothing more easy than to imagine a thousand tyrannical things which the Legislature may do if its members forget all their duties, disregard utterly the obligations they owe to their constituents, and recklessly determine to trample upon right and justice. * * * I am thoroughly convinced that the words of the Constitution furnish the only test to determine the validity of a statute, and that all arguments based on general principles outside of the Constitution must be addressed to the people, and not to us." Mr. Justice Iredell, to whose wise foresight and clear conception of the principles of constitutional law and limitations we owe a debt of gratitude, said: "If a state Legislature shall pass a law within the general scope of their constitutional power, the court cannot pronounce it to be void merely because it is in their judgment contrary to the principles of natural justice." In Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 1 L. Ed. 648, Judge Baldwin said: "We may think the power conferred by the Constitution of this state too great or dangerous to the rights of the people, and that limitations are necessary, but we cannot fix them. * * * We cannot declare a legislative act void because it conflicts with our opinions of policy, expediency, or justice. We are not the guardians of the rights of the people of the state, unless they are secured by some constitutional provision which comes within our judicial cognizance." Bennett v. Boggs, 1 Baldw. 74, Fed. Cas. No. 1,319. Nash, C. J., in Taylor v. Commissioners, 55 N. C. 144, 64 Am. Dec. 506, said: "Whether the Legislature acted wisely or not is a question with which we have nothing to do. The power being admitted, its abuse cannot affect it. That must be for the legislative consideration. It is sufficient that the judiciary claim to sit in judgment upon the constitutional power of the Legislature to act in a given case. It would be rank usurpation for us to inquire into the wisdom or propriety of the act." Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244; Harries v. Wright, 121 N. C. 172, 28 S. E. 269. In Norwich v. Com'rs, 13 Pick. 60, Shaw, C. J., says: "It will not throw much light on a question like this to put extreme cases of the abuse of the power to test the existence of the power itself." Pearson, C. J., in Brodnax v. Groom, supra. Certainly neither of these great judges can be suspected of entertaining views dangerous to the reserved rights of the people, or sustaining the assertion of doubtful powers by either department of the government. While we should guard with jealous care the right of local self-government, and find no power to impose burdens by way of taxation or otherwise upon the people, except when they have conferred it, we should at the same time be slow, save when our vision is clear, to set aside acts of the General Assembly. Again invoking the words of Judge Black: "We can declare an act of Assembly void only when it violates the Constitution clearly, palpably, and plainly, and in such manner as to leave no doubt or hesitation in our minds."

If I were permitted to speak my mind regarding the policy, wisdom, and justice of the act under consideration, I would find no difficulty in declaring that upon the admitted facts in this record the statute is wise, just, and promotive of the best and highest interests of the people of Madison county. Mr. Justice Montgomery in Smathers v. Commissioners, supra, says: "The county of Madison was indebted to various persons, the consideration being the necessary expenses of the county already incurred, and being unable to pay the same, and at the same time to conduct the ordinary business affairs of the county with its resources, obtainable through the taxes up to the full constitutional limitation," etc. This was said upon a record coming to this court in 1899 in regard to a part of the indebtedness referred to in the act of 1903. The history of the struggle with the indebtedness by the people of the county, as appears from the records of this court and the acts of the Legislature, shows that, unless in the way provided in this act they may care for their indebtedness and have time within which to pay it, the county will soon be bankrupt and unable to discharge its duties, powers, and functions as a part of the government of the state. There is no suggestion that these debts may be paid from any other resources than taxation. That they must be paid is beyond controversy. But the answer to the question presented for our decision must be found in the Constitution of the state, and not by considerations of this character. This court, by its Chief Justice, said, in Ewart v. Jones, 116 N. C. 570, 21 S. E. 787: "Under our form of government the sovereign power resides with the people, and is exercised by their representatives in the General Assembly. The only limitation upon this power is found in the organic law as declared by the delegates of the people in convention assembled from time to time." What, under our system of administrative government, are the relations of the General Assembly to the several counties of the state? and to what extent may the former control the administration of the latter? are interesting questions. It will be well to avoid the use of the term 'municipal corporation,' because there exist important distinctions between towns, cities, and villages, which come strictly within that term, and counties, which are sometimes called 'quasi municipal corporations,' but are, strictly speaking, neither. Dillon, Mun. Corp. §§ 22, 23; Moffitt v. Asheville, 103 N. C. 249, 9 S. E. 695, 14 Am. St. Rep. 810. Const. art. 7, provides for the division and government of counties, etc.; and section 14 confers upon the General Assembly the power by statute to modify, change, or abrogate any and all of the provisions of the said article, and substitute others in their places (except certain sections not affecting the question under discussion). The history of the state since 1876 shows that the General Assembly, at its first session after the ratification of the Constitution, did repeal each section (save the ones excepted), and substitute others essentially different. Acts 1876-77, p. 226, c. 141. Many other changes equally as radical have been made from time to time, and this court has recognized the absolute power of the Legislature to do so. Harris v. Wright, supra. The court said: "Thus was placed at the will and discretion of the Assembly the political branch of the state government, the election of county officers, the duty of commissioners, the division of counties into districts," etc. The power of the Legislature to establish, change, and abolish counties is declared by this court in Mills v. Williams, 33 N. C. 558. Pearson, J., speaking of different kinds of corporations, says: "The division of the state into counties is an instance of the former. There is no contract, no party of the second part; but the sovereign, for the better government and management of the whole, chooses to make the division in the same way that a farmer divides his plantation off into fields and makes cross fences when he chooses. The sovereign has the same right to change the limits of counties," etc. This court has always held that counties are not liable to an action for damages for injuries sustained by a defective bridge or other parts of a highway, whereas a city or town is liable to such action. The reason upon which this distinction is based is manifest. In White v. Commissioners, 90 N. C. 437, 47 Am. Rep. 534, Merrimon, J., discusses at length the relation which the counties bear to the state, and says: "They are subdivisions of its territory, embracing the people who inhabit the same, created by the sovereign authority, and organized for political and civil purposes. They are created by the sovereign, without any special regard for, or the solicitation, consent, or desire of, the people who reside in them," etc. They are not liable to be sued, unless the Legislature by statute gives a right of action. In Manuel v. Commissioners, 98 N. C. 9, 3 S. E. 829, it was held that, in the absence of any statutory provision, they were not liable to be sued for negligence of their servants or agents, as for damages sustained by one confined in the county jail. It is said that "counties are of, and constitute a part of, the state government. * * * They are in their general nature governmental, mere instrumentalities of government, and possess corporate powers adapted to their purposes." The distinction between the status and liability of towns and counties is illustrated in Lewis v. Raleigh, 77 N. C. 229. In Tate v. Commissioners, 122 N. C. 812, 30 S. E. 352, this court, discussing the authority and power of the General Assembly to command the commissioners of a county in respect to discharging the duties imposed as a part of the state government, said: "The defendants contend that the act is unconstitutional (1) because, while the Legislature may authorize and empower the county commissioners to levy the special tax for a special purpose, it cannot direct or order them to do so. This contention is unfounded. Counties are but agencies of the state government. * * * They are subject to legislative authority, which can direct them to do as a duty all such duties as they can empower them to do." See, also, Wallace v. Trustees, 84 N. C. 164. The question is exhaustively and ably discussed by Brinkerhoff, J., in Commissioners v. Mighels, 7 Ohio St. 109. He says: "A municipal corporation proper is created mainly for the interest, advantage, and convenience of the locality and its people. A county organization is created almost exclusively with a view to the policy of the state at large, for the purposes of political organization and civil administration in matters of finance, of education, or provision for the poor, and especially for the administration of justice. With scarcely an exception all the powers and functions of the county organization have a direct and exclusive reference to the general policy of the state, and are in fact but a branch of the general administration of that policy."

It is undoubtedly competent for the Legislature to make the people of a county liable for the official delinquencies of the county commissioners, and, if they think it wise and just, without any power in the people to control the acts of the commissioners or to exact indemnity from them. In Dennis v. Maynard, 15 Ill. 477, it is said that "the state does not allow itself to be sued, but it may hear, investigate, and determine its own indebtedness, and assume the debts to and from others; so it may direct the county authorities to ascertain and allow just claims upon the public treasury, or may ascertain and fix that amount, and direct a raising of means by taxation for its payment. The public county and township funds are under legislative control. * * * These local municipal corporations are created for convenience in the police arrangements, but their powers and duties remain subject to the legislative will through the legislative body." The identical question involved in this case came before the Supreme Court of Nebraska in Commissioners v. People, 5 Neb. 127, in which it is said: "That Jefferson county is indebted to the relators for the amount of the warrants in question will not be controverted; and when such is the case there is no doubt of the power of the Legislature to require the county to issue its bonds for the amount of its indebtedness." In Locomotive Co. v. Emigrant Co., 184 U. S. 559, 576, 17 Sup. Ct. 188, 193, 41 L. Ed. 552, Mr. Justice Harlan says: "The county of Calhoun is a mere political division of the state, created for the state's convenience, and to aid in carrying out within a limited territory the policy of the state. Its local government can have no will contrary to the will of the state, and it is subject to the paramount authority of the state in respect as well of its acts as of its property and revenue held for public purposes. The state made it, and could in its discretion unmake it, and administer such property through other instrumentalities." Taney, C. J., in Maryland v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., 44 U. S. 534, 11 L. Ed. 714, says: "The several counties are nothing more than certain portions of territory in which the state is divided for the more convenient exercise of the powers of government. They form together one political body, in which the sovereignty resides." "The revenues of the county are not the property of the county, in the sense in which the revenues of a private corporation are, and the power of the Legislature to direct their application is plenary. The county being a public corporation, which exists only for public purposes connected with the administration of the state's government, it follows that such a corporation, and, of course, its revenues, are subject to the control of the Legislature." New Orleans v. Water Co., 142 U. S. 79, 12 Sup. Ct. 142, 35 L. Ed. 943; Smith, Mod. Law Mun. Corp. § 756. "And, speaking generally, it may be affirmed that in any case in which compulsory taxation is found necessary in order to compel a municipal corporation or political division of the state to perform properly and justly any of its duties as an agency in state government, or to fulfill any obligations legally or equitably resting upon it in consequence of any corporate action, the state has ample power to direct and levy such compulsory taxation, and the people to be taxed have no absolute right to a voice in determining whether it shall be levied through their representatives in the Legislature of the state." Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) 1303.

Without further extending this opinion, I have reached the following conclusions: The state government having assumed the discharge of certain well-defined administrative duties in regard to opening and keeping in repair public highways and bridges, providing for the indigent, the insane, and other objects of her care, the administration of public justice through the courts, the punishment of crime, etc., involving the erection of courthouses, jails, and reformatories, has established, among other agencies for the better discharge of these duties and purposes of government, counties, and in a restricted sense chartered towns and cities, and committed to them, in the territory marked off, the duty of administering for the state these and such other necessary duties as may be assigned to them. For the purpose of enabling the state to discharge these governmental functions, the people in their Constitution have granted to the legislative department power to make all necessary laws, including the power to contract debts, levy taxes, etc., within, and controlled by, certain well-defined constitutional restrictions and limitations. This power may be exercised, either through agents selected by people of the entire state, or through agents selected by the people within the territorial limits marked off and designated as counties. These agencies are required, for the purpose of carrying out the general policy of the state, to provide the necessary means. In doing so, they may contract debts for necessary expenses and, within the constitutional limit, pay the same out of the ordinary revenues. If they find it necessary to exceed such limit, they may, with the consent of the Legislature, levy taxes to pay debts contracted for such purposes. It seems to me that it is clearly within the power conferred upon the Legislature to impose upon the county officers, who are in a certain sense state officers, the duty of providing for the payment of the indebtedness contracted for necessary expenses, which is equivalent to saying expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties and powers in carrying out the general policy of the state and discharging its functions. If the Legislature may command the authorities to levy a special tax beyond the constitutional limit to pay such debts, I am at a loss to perceive why it may not command them, with the consent of the creditor, to make provision by issuing bonds with which to raise the money to pay them. If the Legislature may direct the Governor and Treasurer to issue the bonds of the state to pay the expenses of the penitentiary and asylums, both being state agencies, I cannot see why it may not, in the exercise of the power drawn from the same constitutional source, direct the counties to do so. With the policy or wisdom of the statute we have nothing to do. In Edwards v. Commissioners, 70 N. C. 571, Reade, J., says: "But levying taxes is not the only way which the defendants have to meet the plaintiff's debt. A liberal construction of the statute upon which they rely enables them not only to give a creditor a bond for his debt, if he will take it and indulge the county, but, if he will not take it, then to raise money by the issue of bonds, and with the money so raised to pay off the debt." The manner in which the provision is to be made for paying the debt is entirely within the discretion of the Legislature. The people of the county are represented in an especial way by its own Senator and Representative; but as a part of the people of the entire state they are represented by all of the members. They must look to them to see that no harsh or unjust or oppressive burdens are put upon them. Within the orbit assigned them by the Constitution, they may act without interference or question by us.

If I am correct in my conclusions upon the question, the answer to the third must be conceded. When a duty not involving the exercise of a discretion is imposed upon a public officer, the power and duty of the courts to compel the performance of such duty by mandamus is clear. The Legislature prescribes the remedy; the courts enforce it. The power of the Legislature to establish boards of audit and other appropriate agencies to ascertain the amount of the debt and the consideration upon which it is based is not questioned. To what extent the commissioners are bound by its conclusions and excluded from litigating in the courts is not presented in this case, and I express no opinion in regard to it. I expressly refrain from expressing any opinion as to the power of the Legislature to compel, by a bond issue, the payment of a county debt contracted for any other purpose than necessary expenses. There are other questions presented upon an appeal before us in the case of Jones v. Commissioners, in regard to which I express no opinion here. My dissent is based upon the agreed facts in this record.

MONTGOMERY, J., concurs in the dissenting opinion.

WALKER, J. (concurring). The conclusion reached by the court in this case appears to me to be right. Whether, under our system of government and the special provisions of the Constitution relating to counties, the Legislature has the power to compel a county to issue bonds for an existing indebtedness, either for the purpose of liquidating and renewing it or of paying it, is a very interesting and important question. In solving it, we should not rely too much upon the decisions in other states, as the solution may depend, to some extent, at least, upon the laws of the particular state in the courts of which the question is presented, and also upon a general consideration of the powers of the Legislature under the state Constitution. We would not be safe in saying that it should be settled upon principles of general law applicable to such cases, without taking into account any local provisions of law, or any peculiar constitution of our local system of government, by which those general principles may be modified. In the view taken by me of the case, it will not be necessary to express an opinion as to the power of the Legislature to require a county to pay its existing indebtedness by issuing bonds, or to exchange new bonds for those outstanding and not yet matured. It can be well seen how the exercise of such a power, if conceded, might work injustice, and by one of the elementary rules of construction and intention to exercise such a power, if injustice may ensue therefrom, should not be presumed, in the absence of a clear and explicit declaration to that effect, but, on the contrary, that meaning should be adopted which will avoid such a result. Black, Int. of Laws, pp. 87, 100, rules 41, 46. A careful reading of the act in question, and a consideration of it, not in detached portions, but in its entirety, convinces me that the Legislature intended to confer upon the commissioners merely a discretionary power, or, in other words, authority to issue the bonds, if in the exercise of their judgment they found it best for the interests of the people to do so. Why construe the act as a command to the commissioners to issue the bonds, when it had not been definitely determined, and could not well be, that the creditors would accept the new bonds, or even accept payment in money in advance of the maturity of the bonds held by them, and when they were not bound to accept either? Is it not more reasonable to infer that the legislative purpose was to give the commissioners power to act in the premises, as the situation might be presented to them and according to their best judgment? It would be strange, indeed, if the Legislature should peremptorily order bonds to be issued before it had been ascertained whether the commissioners would be able to execute the order. But the language of the act itself is sufficient to show that the Legislature did not intend its provisions to be mandatory. In the title of the act, and in every section where power to issue bonds is given, there is not a single word of command; but every expression used implies discretion, and in the concluding section, by the use of the words, "if the bonds authorized by this act are issued," it clearly appears that a discretion was left to the commissioners, because there could be no such doubt or contingency, as therein implied, if they were required to issue them, whether they thought it proper to do so or not. Those words cannot be considered as referring to the possibility of a refusal by the creditors to accept the bonds, for the commissioners are authorized in that event to sell the bonds and pay the matured indebtedness. Indeed, the provision is that all of the indebtedness, however evidenced, shall be paid with the proceeds of the sale of the bonds (section 10), the creditors having the option to take bonds, instead of money (section 11), and, if the creditor so elects, it is then made the duty of the commissioners to give him bonds at par to the amount of his claim and in liquidation thereof. There is another view of the act which supports the construction that by it the commissioners have the right to decide whether bonds should be issued or not. In those sections which refer to the issuing of bonds, the words simply confer power and authority, and the same may be said of the title of the act; whereas, in the sections which provide for an exchange and settlement with the creditors after the bonds are issued, and which refer to the other duties to be performed under the act, the language is changed, so that the directions to the commissioners become positive and peremptory. It does seem to me that, if it was intended the provisions of the act should be mandatory, words more appropriate to express such an intention than those we find in the act would have been used. We derive little or no aid from decided cases in construing the act. We must examine the context in order to ascertain the meaning, and no two cases under the circumstances will be found to be alike. It is true the word "may" is sometimes construed as mandatory, when something is directed to be done for the sake of justice, or when the public interests or individual rights call for the exercise of the power conferred; but it is conceded that "the words 'authorized and empowered' are usually words of permission merely," and neither the word "may," nor the words "authorized and empowered," nor any other equivalent term, will be construed as imperative, if the context of the act shows that such was not the purpose. In the cases cited in support of the contrary view, the plaintiffs were attempting to enforce payment of their claims by a tax levy, and not by the issue of bonds, and to the relief sought by them they had an inherent right. It was really a part of the contract that the debts of the county should be paid in that way, and the legislation was merely in aid of the enforcement of this right. But creditors of this county have no right to receive bonds for their claims. That was no part of the contract. The law, when the original bonds were issued, provided how county debts should be paid—by taxation; and, if the Legislature had provided that a tax "may" be levied for the payment of the county's liabilities, the authorities cited would perhaps be applicable, and the courts could compel compliance with the requirements of the act, within the limits of taxation fixed by the Constitution. I do not think the cases relied on to show the plaintiffs' right to a mandamus will be found to conflict with the conclusion we have reached, if they are considered with reference to their special facts and the particular relief demanded. The words quoted from the case of People v. Supervisors, 68 N. Y. 114, namely, "that the said board may in their discretion cause the tax to be levied," when read with what precedes them, will be found to refer, not to a discretion to levy the tax, but to a discretion given to the supervisors of the county to decide whether the tax should be paid by the county or by the two towns specially benefited by the construction of the bridge, and they decided that it should be paid by the two towns. There was nothing in the way of paying the assessment upon the towns by taxation, and it was held that they should be compelled by mandamus to levy the necessary tax; and, so far as the ultimate question decided is concerned, the other cases cited are like that one. The principle of those cases is familiar; but it does not seem to me to have any bearing on our case, and should not affect the result. The reasons I have given are to my mind sufficient to support the conclusion of the court, and it is not, therefore, deemed necessary to discuss the other questions argued before us. It is fortunate that we have been able to reach a conclusion upon a consideration and construction of the act itself, which saves to the people of the county the privilege of local self-government. It may be that the Legislature has the power to control directly the action of the county authorities, and I have no disposition at present to controvert the proposition; but the right of the people of the county to manage their own affairs should not be abridged, except under the pressure of a plain and positive legal requirement, and when no alternative in the law is admissible.

BRIDGERS v. WILSON COUNTY COM'RS. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 12, 1904.) Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Moore, Judge. Mandamus by John F. Bridgers against the commissioners of Wilson county. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed. Connor & Connor, F. A. Daniels, and W. A. Lucas, for appellants. Shepherd & Shepherd and F. A. & S. A. Woodard, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This case is substantially like that of Barnes v. Commissioners (decided at this term) 47 S. E. 737. As we held in that case that mandamus will not lie to control the discretion given to the commissioners by the statute in the granting of licenses, there was error in the judgment of the court in this case directing a mandamus to issue to the defendants, commanding them to issue an order for a license to the sheriff upon finding certain facts recited in the judgment. Remanded, with directions to dismiss the action. Error.

CITY OF WINSTON et al. v. HUDSON. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 3, 1904.) Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; W. R. Allen, Judge. W. B. Hudson was charged with selling trading stamps without having first obtained a license, and from a judgment finding him not guilty the state and the city of Winston appeal. Affirmed. Watson, Buxton & Watson and the Attorney General, for plaintiffs. Glenn, Manly & Hendren and W. E. Crisp, for defendant.

WALKER, J. We have decided in State and City of Winston v. Beeson and Sperry & Hutchison Company, 47 S. E. 457, that the city had no power or authority under the provisions of its charter to pass the ordinance for a violation of which the defendant is prosecuted, because the term "gift enterprise," as used in the charter, did not embrace the business of the Sperry & Hutchison Company; they being the only words in the charter, as was admitted by counsel for the state and the city, which could by any possible construction apply to the case. This being the law as declared by the court in that case, and the defendant Hudson being charged with a violation of the ordinance in that, as a merchant, he received stamps from the stamp company and delivered them to one of his customers, who had bought goods from him, according to the terms of his contract with the company, it follows that in so doing he committed no criminal offense, and the court upon the special verdict correctly adjudged him not guilty. Affirmed.

HOWELL v. WILSON COUNTY COM'RS. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 12, 1904.) Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Moore, Judge. Mandamus by A. M. Howell against the commissioners of Wilson county. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed. Connor & Connor, F. A. Daniels, and W. A. Lucas, for appellants. Shepherd & Shepherd and F. A. & S. W. Woodard, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The facts in this case are substantially like those in Barnes v. Commissioners (decided at this term) 47 S. E. 737, and for this reason it must be governed by the principles stated in that case. The court adjudged that a mandamus issue to the defendants, commanding them to investigate the application of the plaintiff, and, if they should find that he is a fit and proper person to have license and that the place where he proposes to sell liquors is a suitable one, then to issue an order to the sheriff to grant him a license upon his paying the fees and taxes as required by law, or show cause why a peremptory mandamus should not issue. For the reasons given in Barnes v. Commissioners of Wilson, there was error in said judgment. Remanded, with directions to dismiss the action. Error.
